No. If you can somehow take her out of the mental realm... These days, many youngsters are very much immersed in the abstract realm of electronic media devices.

Many youngsters are continuously... It's always a pity to see, when I see the young people, children often, they are with their parents, they are on vacation, and what do they do? The children are going...

They're in some new place that they haven't seen before. They could take it all in. Wow.

Wow. But the parents don't seem to be guiding them either. They don't say, Let's touch this, look at that.

They let them just... I'm just imitating what I saw a few days ago, a family, the two boys, maybe 12 years old and 14. They hardly looked at each other or the world around them.

The complete attention completely absorbed by... As if the device was sucking up their consciousness. I'm surprised there's no conspiracy theory yet on the Internet about these devices sucking up our consciousness.

Maybe I shouldn't have said that. There is? Maybe there is.

In some ways it's true, but it doesn't need to be some evil thing behind it. We created it, so it is quite an obstacle. It takes you away from...

It completely takes you into your mind and into the world of mental abstraction. And it has an enormous addictive quality. Potentially it can also be used for awakening.

And this is why I'm happy that the Internet is being used here also to spread the teaching and why I did the Oprah webinars a few years ago. So to counteract the negative impact it has on human consciousness, there is also a possibility of using it in a positive way. So nature can be very healing and can bring balance into a person's life and also help take them out of excessive mental...

dwelling mentally in your mental identity. It can take you also into the body, also interacting with nature in some way, going on hiking, anything where you are in touch with the elements. Maybe you can take her on some trips where you both engage in interacting with nature.

And bring in inner body awareness also. So all those things are helpful. And then a shift may happen without you having to address it directly.

Sir, in one of your lectures, I recall you saying that when tragedy and devastation comes into our life, try in the first instance to accept it. And if you can't do that, try to accept how we feel about the occurrence and eventually the winds of grace will blow over us and we'll discover a deeper peace than we knew before. Then, in another lecture, I recall you saying something about this barren painting.

And I recall you saying that she's a bit radical in her posture vis-a-vis this thing because she says learn to love it the way it is, period. And it does sound radical compared to your position, but it is a position that a lot of people I know espouse, at least intellectually. What do you feel is the middle ground if there is one between you and this barren painting?

Thank you. Of course, barren Katie, she loves what is, and so she teaches what she lives. And it happened to her, it happened to her spontaneously.

And I've spent time with her privately and she truly seems to love whatever is. And this is her teaching. And my teaching is related to it, but I don't quite express it in such extreme terms.

I say many situations, you may not be able to love that situation, but you're always able to bring acceptance to it. And if you bring acceptance to it, there at least is a peace around the situation. So let's say you find yourself stranded somewhere, your car breaks down in the middle of nowhere, you walk through the rain, you can't find anywhere.

It's barren Katie can probably love it. She loves the feeling of the rain and breathing in the air. And every step is great.

Why should it be otherwise? This is what is. And you love it without even telling yourself mentally that you love it.

You just love the experience. Any experience, you love it. And that's how she, this is what happened to her.

And this is what for quite a few years people around her thought she was mad and she couldn't hardly talk to people anymore because there was no common ground anymore with ordinary humanity. But now she's able to interact again. And I find for most people it is easier in extreme situations not to try and love it because you cannot try and love a situation.

But acceptance is much easier. Acceptance is the realization that you cannot argue with the is-ness of this moment and if you internally argue with the what is because what is already is. And if you resist it internally, that is how suffering arises.

And when you observe that process, then you see how suffering arises and when you see how you create your own suffering and ultimately not the situation but you, your reaction to the situation, then you're closer to the end of suffering. And this is what the Buddha taught. He said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering.

By which he meant, I show you how suffering arises. And by, and when you see how suffering arises, how you create it, that is the beginning of the end of suffering. So as you bring acceptance to a situation, a certain peace arises, a peacefulness comes.

So let's come back to the same situation. You cannot perhaps love having to get out of your car in the cold and the rain and total darkness in the middle of nowhere. What do I do now?

Usually the mind would go into, and this is just a relatively insignificant situation. There are far more serious situations than breaking down a car in the middle of nowhere. This is what is.

If that is your realization, you don't have a mental commentary on that. You simply stay with every step and see, what can I do now? And that is acceptance.

And then you're more likely to do the right thing when you bring acceptance to it. And then you may find the acceptance deepens. And as you go about taking the necessary steps to end that particular situation, to remedy that particular situation, as the acceptance deepens, you may find that there is no clear dividing line between acceptance of what is and loving what is.

At some point, they merge into one. And this is why sometimes a human who accepts and then goes more deeply into acceptance suddenly finds that what we call acceptance has turned into loving what is. So acceptance, if it's deep enough, becomes loving what is.

So ultimately, they are intimately connected and ultimately one. And now, that was the last question for today. I'm getting a signal that we need to finish for today with a little meditation on stillness.

On time. Being in the present moment and on time. Being spacious but not spaced out.

Welcome back, everybody, here and elsewhere on the planet. Whatever time it is where you are, it's also the present moment. The present moment is a deeper truth than what time it is.

Two levels. Of course, we can't escape from time on this level. There is undoubtedly the reality of time because although you cannot ever experience time directly, you can only notice the effects of time.

If you leave an apple out for a few days or weeks, then you look at it every day and you notice the effects of time on the apple. It begins to shrink. If you wait long enough, it disappears completely, miraculously.

And then all that's left is a bit of dust. And then that gets blown away and that's time. You can do the same with yourself.

Take a picture on your phone of yourself and then wait a few years. With the apple it's a few weeks and you may have to wait a few years before you notice certain differences. And then you compare the two and say, What happened here?

Time. Assaulted by time. The body got assaulted by time.

If you're interested in poetry, a large part of Shakespeare's sonnets are about what time does to the human being. Quite pleasant to read. You become very much aware of impermanence when you read those poems, Shakespeare's sonnets.

So that's a spiritual reading. Although he doesn't say anything spiritual. But it is spiritual because when you are presented with the fact of impermanence and see it clearly and accept it, not go into a state of fear and say, Oh, I'm going to grow old.

Will you still love me? Will you still need me? When I'm 64?

No. I'm 64 now. And I sang that on my birthday.

Now when you look at the impermanence and accept it, then you can sense something in you from where you can see the impermanence, but which in itself is not subject to impermanence. There is something, let's talk about there's something in me that is the same now as it was 30 years ago. A sense of beingness that has nothing to do with the passing of time.

A deeper I, not the I when you say I, that can usually refer to the surface level of who you are. When a human being says I, usually they talk about their physical body, that comes first, that's always the first thing in your mind. And then comes the mental I, the psychological entity, the mind made entity, the person, the personality, the conditioned self, what the Buddha called the self.

And I think also Jesus called it the self, because he said deny thyself, which means recognize the unreality of the self. So there's the self, when a human says I, usually refers to that entity, the history of me, in other words me, which I sometimes call me and my story. That's where people derive their sense of I from.

But there is a deeper meaning and level to I, when I comes from a deeper place, it refers to the unconditioned I, the beingness itself, the consciousness itself, not the form that it has taken as a thought, but the pure consciousness itself, the pure awareness, the pure, just the presence. And that's not subject to time, but when you look at, do not close yourself or resist the fact of impermanence and you see it in front of you, you only really see it from the perspective of the timeless. I sometimes say if there were nothing but impermanence, you wouldn't even see it, notice it, because it would be like imagine everything on this planet were green, you were green and every object is green and everything you see is green, the color green wouldn't exist, because it only exists if there's something else too.

There would be no word for green and nobody would know that everything is green. So there is something in you that notices, that is a witness to the impermanence of the world of form. So when you contemplate impermanence, not through thinking, but from the pure awareness, space of pure awareness, then the space of pure awareness becomes more conscious of itself, so to speak, through contemplating the short-lived nature of all life forms.

So that simply means, in practical terms, when you look at impermanence, whether it's an actual thing that you see, it always comes to me very strongly whenever I look at an old photo in a book or in an antiquarian store or a junk shop or where they have old photo albums, whenever I look at an old photo and you see street scenes of people in 1920 or whatever they are doing and I always come immediately, there's a deepening of stillness for a moment and go, they're all gone now. All these life forms that you see on the photo have dissolved and been replaced by others.

You can have a street scene, I saw New York, the same street in 1920, you can still a little bit recognize that that's the same street as now, just filled with completely different people because all the people you see on the photo have dissolved. But the same consciousness has assumed slightly different forms and is living again and again and again in this dimension of time through these forms and expressing itself through these forms. Because it would be sad, one would have to weep looking at old photos and say, all these lives, what have they lived for?

Hasn't it all been in vain because they thought everything they did was so important and now they're all dead and gone and nothing was really that important. So if you come to strange conclusions and it could lead you to a nihilistic conclusion that it's all so pointless, isn't it? But that's not how it is.

You see that something arises in you that is deeply peaceful. Also when you contemplate death itself and surrender to it or sit next to it. I spent some time when my mother died sitting next to the body and the sadness came and then a very deep peace.

And a little bit of that peace is always there. The fact when impermanence is faced, there's something. I'm just pointing this out so that you can verify it in your own experience next time you're confronted with any sign of impermanence, which could be a dead leaf that's fallen from the tree or a wilted flower or an old photo or whatever it is and stay with that.

Or you watch a movie that faces the reality of death or old age. I have seen some movies like that, for example, The Notebook, a lovely movie. You see the same couple as youngsters and very old and she's beginning to lose her memory and they all come together.

It's beautiful to contemplate. It's spiritual because the contemplation of impermanence, if it's not rejected or interpreted in some way, come to some conceptual conclusion, no, just contemplate it and then something, feel very alert, something you notice, something arising in you that is deeply peaceful. You don't even need to interpret it.

You can just notice. If you don't run away from the fact of impermanence, something becomes deeply peaceful. Buddhist monks know that in some Buddhist traditions, the monks regularly go to the morgue where the dead bodies are and spend hours there in meditation.

And if you don't know the reason, then it looks very strange, you see. That's a morbid thing to do, isn't it? Of course it's not.

There's a deep reason for that. The death is all around you, which death means a form dissolves. It's much more obvious and therefore it can be a spiritual experience to go to India where death is not always hidden as it is in the West.

Let's hide the dead bodies, says the Westerner. It's all sanitized. And in India, somebody dies in public.

The bodies are being burned. And that's quite a, oh my God. There you see the reality of the impermanence of all physical forms.

And also, another fact is the old age, which is by the way what led to the Buddha's search for enlightenment when he was a young man, was the realization of old age and death and sickness. But old age, for the first time he saw consciously, he looked around. Well, the story goes that his father wanted to hide all these things from him because an astrologer had predicted that he would either become a great leader or a great spiritual master.

And his father wanted him to become a great leader and not a spiritual master. So his father, he must have known somehow that if he became aware of old age and death and sickness, then he would become a spiritual person. But at one point, the young man, the young Buddha, when he wasn't the Buddha yet, went out into town and for the first time, or for the first time consciously, saw a dying person and a very old person and a sick person.

And he asked somebody, what happened to these people? And he was already 25 or something like that. What happened to these people?

And somebody said to him, well, it's called old age. And his father wanted to surround him only with lovely young and beautiful people where they lived in the palace or mansion. And old age, what's that?

Yes, well, is that a disease? No, no, it happens to everybody. Then what's the point of it all, he said.

And that was such a shock to him that soon later he left it all behind in the search for something that is not subject to impermanence and death, the eternal, God, the eternal, whatever you want to call it. And it took a few years and then he realized it within. But it was that which brought about his search was the fact of impermanence.

If he had not faced that, it would never have happened. He would have become involved in the superficialities of daily existence for the rest of his life. So old age also is hidden mostly in Western countries because as soon as you get really old, you're usually in a sheltered place where you're being looked after, but you're no longer roaming about the streets and you're even separated from the family so that the children no longer live with their grandparents in most cases, as it used to be.

So the children are hardly aware of old age and occasionally might visit. So there's a separation. They're the old people.

And if you go to other countries, non-Western, you see old age much more because they're still around. They haven't been put away. So you see people in a much more realistic view of human existence than you would get in the West if you look around.

So impermanence is a beautiful thing to contemplate. And again, the most powerful way to contemplate impermanence is to face it in whatever form, because it's always the decay and the dissolution of form, to contemplate that and not think, not draw any conceptual conclusion. No, just be with it.

And be that which the awareness for it. And then you will notice a deepening and an arising of something that cannot be really put into words, an arising of a deep sense of peace and spaciousness. So that is how impermanence can become a spiritual, lead to a spiritual realization.

And they've known this for thousands of years, except Western people. And of course, a large part of the world is Western these days. One could almost say China is Western and Japan is Western.

Very powerful things to see. Sometimes people have filmed life forms like plants, how they are born and how they die. And what usually takes place over a period of several weeks, or days at least, is condensed into two minutes.

And you see the cameras on the plant that comes out of the soil. And it's a miraculous thing to see how it shoots out. Of course, it's speeded up.

It shoots out and then the bud appears. And then the bud opens. Sometimes it closes and opens because some flowers close at night.

And then you see that for a while. Daytime. Nighttime.

Daytime. Daytime. Nighttime.

And then, very quickly, it no longer opens, or it stays open and open. The more and more it begins to collapse. And then the entire plant collapses and disappears.

And that's an amazing, amazing thing to see. You could do the same with a human, except it wouldn't be practical because the cameraman would be dead before the human dies. But I have seen a wonderful, I may have mentioned it before, some of you know, a wonderful commercial that somebody sent to me.

It's from some Scandinavian country. The most spiritual commercial I've ever seen. And it's for beer.

Which beer, I don't know. So, on that level, the commercial probably doesn't work because nobody remembers. Don't remember what beer it is.

It starts with a, it's a kind of cartoon, but it looks lifelike. A baby shoots out of the mother's womb in a kind of explosion and goes up into the sky, screaming. So the baby shoots out of the womb, into the sky, screaming.

But as the baby travels upward, it already begins to grow. And by the time it's reached the highest point, it's already a fully grown man. And then the descent begins, and the scream, the voice, of course, deepens a bit.

And it continues to scream all the time. And then the fully grown man goes downwards and, of course, becomes old very quickly. All this is within less than a minute.

Becomes old very quickly, and just as he approaches the ground, is a very old man, and he shoots into the earth. And there's a gravestone there. And I watched that when my mouth opened.

Because there you see the reality of the life of form. And, of course, all it said was at the end, life is short, drink. Unfortunately, I forgot what to drink.

And that also makes you realize that on the level of form, nothing is all that important. There is something beyond the form. Beyond form, something that expresses itself through the form, something that grows somehow as the form faces its challenges in the world of form, something within evolves and grows into this dimension that comes from some other dimension, the formless, the one.

One could almost say, the one or God incarnating gradually into the world of form. I don't want to offer too much of an explanation of the universe because the mind cannot do that. You cannot comprehend through concepts what the purpose of the universe is.

You can get a sense of it in yourself, but not through concepts. You can, on a non-conceptual level, through non-conceptual intelligence, which is awareness, you can have realizations that you can never verbalize. Nor would you want to because you would know it would be immediately falsified.

That's why the writer of the Tao Te Ching said, the Tao that can be spoken of is not the true Tao. You can only point, you cannot explain the universe. Philosophers have tried, but of course it's absurd.

How can you explain the vastness of what is unfolding, the cosmos? I mean, even the earth is incomprehensible. The cosmos, how can you explain the vastness that is unfolding there through a few sounds?

Or a few mathematical symbols? Scribbles on a piece of paper? Or on a board?

I mean, it looks impressive, but is that the explanation of the purpose of the universe or the underlying purpose of it? Or words? How many sounds are there?

There are five vowels. A, E, O, U, Y, whatever. And these are the vowels that the vocal cords produce.

And then you have the other consonants that are produced by air pressure. And you put these together and then you expect to have some ultimate answers through that. But they tried.

That's good. That's fun. So this is all about the realization within you.

That's why you are here, why I am here, and why you are there, wherever you are. It's always here and now. It's about the realization of the formless dimension in you, which is, if you want to attach a word to it, just as a little pointer, it is a sense of deep and alive peace, an inner stillness, a space that looks like a not-knowing space, because no conceptualization happens, a space that you do not need or cannot fully inhabit continuously, because if you did, you would spend the rest of your life like that. And you would not need to do anything. If you totally dwelled there, you would simply be, and it would be joyful.

And if you lived in India, you could survive that way, because people would come and feed you, because they would see there is something there that is the transcendent shining through this form. And if you do it in the West, an ambulance will come, and you will be taken away. So it's the destiny for most humans is to find a balance between still being interacting and doing things in the world of form, but at the same time, being willing to do things rooted in something much deeper, or another way of putting it, sensing your own reality, the essence of who you are, as something, it's not a thing, something within that is far deeper than anything that you can do or perceive or think.

It's being, being itself. And so you find a balance between being. Being is experienced or known as the deepest I am.

When you say I, it can express that deepest level of being, I. And that is the eternal I that has nothing to do with you as a person. That is really where all your true sense of identity comes from, of who or what you are.

Even the sense of identity that is attached to a story, what really happens is the deepest sense of I is shining through the forms of the story, and you feel there's me here, there's an identity here. If you remove the story, then you can sense it directly, something very precious. But when it's associated only with a story, so it shines through in some obscure way through the story, then you think that is your identity, not the light behind it.

Because the story can only exist because it appears in the light of consciousness. So the light of consciousness, which is that essence, shines through whatever the story in your mind is about who you are, what you're telling yourself, the ideas that you have about who you are. How is it possible for you to have these ideas about who you are?

Because there's a light of consciousness or the space of consciousness in which these appear. So that is shining there and makes it possible for you to even have a story about yourself. So you could say the story is the film that runs through the projector and the essence of who you are is the light behind it.

And all that the film does, it obscures the light in various places. And by obscuring the light in various places, it creates the illusion that there are people there. And it creates the illusion that there's something important happening out there and drama.

And so everybody senses there's something very precious in them that they don't want to lose. Everybody senses there's something that I don't want to die. There's something so precious there.

But it's usually associated with the superficial level of the story, which is the film, not realizing that that preciousness is actually the light. So you confuse the surface level of reality, which could not exist and ultimately is not separate from the core of reality, the unmanifested, and then it is essentially the timeless essence. That which you touch in yourself when you realize the formless, sense it, is not just in you.

It is the core of all life. So you're not only touching the essence of who you are, it's the essence of all life, all other life forms, the very same essence. So it's the expression self-realization, but the true self that is realized goes far beyond any form.

So you get to the very core of the universe itself, in yourself. So it's nothing to do with some kind of selfish pursuit. It far transcends what you conceive of as you.

One could almost say it is a self-realization of the universe, when through this form the universe becomes conscious of its own being. So there are two levels, because you are the universe, obviously, you are an intrinsic part. Human beings sometimes think that they are in the universe.

You're not in the world, in the universe. You are the universe, you are an expression of the totality in this particular short-lived form. You haven't been put into it, you have come out of it, and you go back in, and you go out again, and back in, and out again.

This is the continuous movement of forms arising, forms withdrawing, and arising and withdrawing. So you are the universe. So there are two levels of what the universe wants, and this is not philosophy, you can simply verify that by looking at your own life.

What you want, the universe wants. So on one level, you enjoy the forms, and on one level you want to do something, create something, many of you feel you want to contribute something, create some new form, or somehow make a contribution, to bring something into this world, and that is the level of manifestation. The universe manifests through you, the creative aspect, you can become a co-creator of the universe, you can manifest, there are books about that, we may talk about that again, but not right now.

And also, you can contemplate the beauty of life forms, and appreciate them. We talked yesterday about looking at a tree, for example, and the tree finding itself, and its own beauty and sacredness through you, and knowing it's because ultimately you are not separate. So, when you look at things, and appreciate them, you bring a consciousness to them, that the tree is deeply connected with being, but the consciousness is not as evolved into this dimension, as the human consciousness.

So, in some sense, you can say the tree is closer to God, which is the one being itself, and an animal is closer to God, so to speak, than humans, because they are still more deeply connected with being. Humans have gone out into differentiation in the world of form more, therefore, their mind has developed, their mind can now create thought, and can now look at the universe through thought, and it has created a more developed, a stronger consciousness that goes out there, so it can do something that those other life forms, or ultimately they are all one, cannot do. So, when you contemplate at night here, you look at the stars, you look at, you walk around, you look at all the beauty around in the present moment, of course, it's the only place where you can notice things, and you go, oh, and there's a stillness that the universe is now enjoying its own creations, that's what's happening, and consciously contemplating them, it's not really you, because you are an aspect of the universe, so when you see beauty, the universe sees its own beauty, it's obvious, and when you appreciate the creation, then the universe appreciates what it has created, that's obvious. So, on one level, it wants to know itself, and through humans and other life forms, the universe wants to know itself, and it does that, it also wants to create more forms, that's the outward movement into differentiation, life on this planet is now far more complex than it was 500 million years ago, it was much more simple, and it's the complexities growing so quickly, that even if you go back a hundred years, life on the human level is much more complex now, than it was then. Now, we don't know for how long the movement into complexity can continue, because there is a point when the tree cannot grow any more branches, and they begin to collapse, and then the tree needs to simplify itself again, so if there's an excessive proliferation of complexity, at some point, there would be a collapse, and that's fine, that's how it's meant to be, and the world becomes more simple again, and then something new arises, but let's put that aside for a moment. So, there's the outward movement of the universe, which it wants is to create forms, and they are continuously being created on this planet, and I'm sure billions of other planets, life forms are being created continuously, it's like the play in this Indian term, Leela, which is the play of form, on some level, it's a playful thing.

To the universe, it's not tragic, the fact that one fish gets eaten by another fish, one minute after it's born, to the universe, that is not tragic, because the very same life essence, immediately, is there again in another form, and another form, and another form, so the universe enjoys the play of form, and it wants also to become more conscious of that, and that happens through the humans. So, on the one hand, there is the outward movement, which is creation, manifestation into form, and then there is another movement, and how do I know that? Just look within, and you will find the two movements in yourself, which could be expressed in the most simple terms by saying, on the one hand, you want to do things in your life, and create things, and be active, on the other hand, you also want to be deeply at peace.

There is something that draws you into deep, you want the peace of God, as it's called sometimes, you want the peace, you want a sense of absolute fulfillment, you want to feel most clearly and strongly who you are, essentially, and that is the movement into being, being and doing. So, one is the outward movement of the universe, birth, birth, birth, and another one is the return movement, which humans call the spiritual path. The spiritual path, essentially, is not how to manifest a big house, or whatever you want, that's not spiritual, that's more, it's to do with the outward movement of the universe, so it's not to be condemned, it's just, I sometimes say, the two movements, as far as contemporary teachers, if you want to call them that, is concerned, the outward movement is most clearly expressed by Tony Robbins, when he goes, you can do it, you can do it, you just go out there and do it, and that's what the universe also wants, and Eckhart says, be, be, and that seems to be the other movement, the return journey. Of course, the fact that both exist means, yes, they both have their place, and it is possible, actually, for a human being, and that, I would say, is how we are meant to live, is not to get lost in the doing, because eventually you would become insane, yeah, I'm still doing, I'm still doing, I can't stop doing, I just have to stop doing, and there's the next phone call, and there's the next deal, and now we create this, and you don't lose yourself in being, as I think we already pointed out, you go, oh, if I had a choice, because I more represent the being, I'd rather be lost in being than in doing, but there's a balance, now, not every human needs to be right in the middle, and very few humans can be right in the middle, where they are effective as a doer in the world, without losing their connectedness with being, with being rooted, still rooted in an inner, there's an inner space or core of stillness while they do. Very few, I said to Oprah, you may be one of the few who is right in the middle, because she is connected with being, but she's always constantly doing, she's doing so much, I would collapse if I lived like her, she just doesn't stop, but she's not lost in doing, she returns to stillness, so she's kind of in the middle, for most humans, they can't be in the middle, nor would you need to be in the middle, most are either tending a little bit more towards there, the being, or a little bit more towards the doing, and that's fine, and this is why humans differ, not everybody needs to be totally balanced between doing and being, and I have the expression in A New Earth, I use the expression frequency holders, to describe humans who live much more on the level of being, and are not very interested in doing great things, they are happy to have a life of simple things, perhaps they are gardeners, perhaps they have a job that provides a sufficient income that they pursue, and they don't feel the need to go beyond that, and that's fine, I call them frequency holders, because their job is to be present in whatever they do, and with whomever they interact, to bring presence into the simplest action, traditionally those people lived in monasteries, but nowadays very few people live in monasteries, but there was in the past, or of course in Tibet, a section of the community lived in monasteries, so the frequency holders traditionally were monastics, but our modern civilization has little place for monastics, many monasteries have closed down, and the others are sparsely populated, and so these humans feel perhaps, I would say, 80% into being, and the rest is the things that they do, and awareness flows into whatever they do, but the state of consciousness that you embody has an influence, affects the totality of consciousness, so those frequency holders are important, also they are as important as the doers, those who are 80% into doing, and perhaps just 20% still connected with stillness and being, they are as important because they present a point of stillness within the totality of human consciousness, that's why I call them frequency holders. The danger, if you are a frequency holder, there is a danger if you are a frequency holder, and there is a danger if you are more of a doer, if you are more of a doer, the danger is that eventually you get lost in the doing, and if you are 80% into doing, then before you know it, you may be 90% into doing, and 100% into doing, and you are lost, and that can happen. If you are a frequency holder, and predominantly rooted in being, the danger is that instead of remaining on the, what I call, on the level above thinking a lot of the time, which is what awareness is, you have risen above the thinking level, you still think, but you have access to the level of awareness, and the awareness flows through you, which is above thinking.

And if you are a frequency holder, sometimes because of the type of life you lead does not contain enough challenges, if you lead a very protected life, job security, pleasant surroundings, many gardeners are frequency holders, you work every day in this lovely garden, your job is relatively secure, you have a little place to live, you have enough to eat, and you are just wonderful, you hold the presence.

But it can happen that after a few years, because of lack of challenges, because challenges are wonderful things, they bring about, they shake you awake, lack of challenges, without the frequency holder realising it, gradually he or she seeps below thinking, is still peaceful, but the alertness is lost, and you become like somebody who is getting tired and is peaceful because he or she is tired, not because they are awake and alert. And that can happen very gradually to a frequency holder, without him or her even noticing it, but after a few years, it's all good, it's all fine. It's nice, they are still very nice people.

I'd rather be with them than with somebody who is completely lost in doing. But these are the dangers associated with the doing, and the danger associated with somebody who is more into being. You will know, most of you probably know, whether you are more drawn towards doing or more drawn towards being.

I would say that the majority of you here go a bit more into being, otherwise you would be at Tony Robbins' firewalking. Or perhaps some of you have been there and done that, that's possible too, and realised, oh, this is not quite the fulfilment that I was looking for, that is possible. Another thing that happens to some humans is that there are periods in your life that can be several years, it can be ten years, sometimes more or less, there are periods in your life when you are moving more into doing, and then it's followed by a time period when you go more into being, that is also.

So there is on the one hand the natural inclination more towards doing or being, and then there is a temporal factor that applies sometimes to humans. Now traditionally, of course, the being has been associated with growing with old age and where it naturally belongs because an 80-year-old who is still frantically doing there is something not quite right. How is the stock market doing?

80-year-old, how is the stock market doing? Okay, buy this, sell that. Or the 80-year-old woman looks in the jeweller's shop, I'd love that diamond ring, it would look so great.

Okay, at that point in life if you haven't gone into being at an earlier stage of your life, then it's time even for the doer when you reach a certain age, even for the doer it becomes time to embrace being and make that the predominant dimension in your life. So eventually if they live long enough every human eventually to lead a complete, fulfilled human life that is lived in the way it's meant to be lived according to the purpose of the totality every human in old age has to move into the being dimension. And again, this should be common knowledge in our civilisation, but it's not.

And it's tragic on that level that our civilisation still knows so little about the possibilities of old age and how the flowering of consciousness can happen, even to the greatest doers, if they get old enough let's see what Donald Trump does when he's 85. He may move into being. So it's good not to attach too many concepts and judgements to a person because they may go the other way.

So if you fix somebody and say, this is how he is well, maybe right now, but who knows. There's a every human life is a journey and of course the one human life is a small part of a much larger journey. So see where you belong as regards doing and being.

And they have to be reconciled. Some of you maybe this afternoon when we have questions and answers, there may be one or two questions about doing and being and how to reconcile them or even you may be so much drawn equally this way and that way and so you totally hear, okay, I could do so much but on the other hand I just want to be. What do I do now?

So that has to be one has to look at individual cases. I spent a lot of my life as a frequency holder so much so that I was regarded as useless by the doers and a failure a loser Now that's a nice label, isn't it? And then life said, okay you're not only you can't remain in the dimension of being mostly life said, come you're also meant to do and at first reluctantly and then I surrendered to it and I said, okay I'll go out and give talks and I'll write a book and now of course one could say I'm doing quite a bit but all the doing that I do is of course it's almost a paradox I go and do and give talks but it's all about really it's more about being than about doing Now what this civilization as a whole needs more undoubtedly is the being dimension it does not need much more doing because there's so much doing already, we are out of balance already on that side of doing very much so so if we do even as a collective as a civilization if we do more and more and more eventually we just create more and more chaos because continued doing without some connectedness with being creates an insane world and eventually makes you insane so the civilization that is disconnected from the source of course goes into more and more doing and you know that stress so many people suffering from stress it's all created by the civilization there's no stress out there it's humans created for themselves and so that is already a mild form of insanity to be stressed means you lose connectedness with being and there's an element of fear in it and you get very upset and very quickly you get negative and angry that's all part of stress and then you create the world that corresponds to that state of consciousness so the world is out of balance undoubtedly and to regain the balance it needs to go into being finding the connectedness with being the good thing is we return to being because humans once had natural connectedness with being a long time ago when they lived a more simple life one with nature the golden age that's the subject of many mythologies in many cultures speak of a golden age that once Indians also talk about the golden age and then gradually deteriorated which really means the gradual deterioration is a gradual disconnectedness from source or unawareness of source of the one and now we are returning, this is why we are here we are returning to that but it's more than a return always when you have lost something and then regain it it's more than just going back to what was before there's an added dimension now when humans return to connectedness with being they return with a full knowing that wasn't there before when it was your natural state in paradise, as it's called mythologically the garden of Eden when you lived in virtually continuous joyful, pleasant there was no problem as such, there was no stress there was just simple doing alignment with nature, ego hadn't developed yet so there was no problem and there was just the present moment there probably might have been already some language simple words perhaps but almost certainly no past and future tense I'm told, I don't know if it's true that the language they speak in Bali whatever language it is has no past and future and that's why people there are actually relatively happy compared to the rest of the population so of course if you have no past and future that's very helpful, there's only this moment and that's already the portal into being so we come back to where we started with the present moment and it's always coming back to the simplicity of that don't forget your practice here the present moment practice of noticing everything around you so that it everything then becomes helpful everything takes you into present moment awareness present moment awareness and immediately the being dimension arises and if you want to be balanced then you discover gradually you have to work it out in your own life discover that it is possible to be in present moment awareness predominantly in your life and nevertheless be effective also as a doer you can you have to experiment with that start with simple things first you start with whenever you do non-challenging activities that you tend to do repetitively and see if you can stay connected with the present moment awareness even while you do when you're going from A to B be present with every step and if it's not a step, be present behind the wheel of your car be present as you drive I enjoy driving because it's a very peaceful thing every light that you stop at it's a peaceful moment and you look around and it's so interesting there's not only the vibrancy of the red light it's light, it's vibrant it's a manifestation of life also the red light and then you look, the humans are crossing the street everybody looks different and there's a tree and there's the sky and every time you stop at a red light it's a slightly different arrangement of humans and trees and sky and other cars and you're just there as the aware presence for all that and there's a peace you don't get any faster to your destination by thinking I should be there already and then let your mind pull you out and then you go and your entire body becomes tense I need to be there now but you're here now so every all these routine activities can be vehicles so that you can allow present moment awareness to flow into the doing and here we talk about doing simple things, routine things and then the next step is to see if you can stay present when small challenges come that normally would have pulled you into some kind of reactivity your mother-in-law calling and when you hear her voice then you know, okay I need to be particularly present now and alert because if I'm not, I'll be pulled into the same old reaction and we'll play out the same old drama that we always play or when you meet with your relatives or you visit your parents then you bring an alertness to that whatever you do, present the moment and then something new perhaps, you want to create something new whatever it is, build up a new, something, a business build up some enterprise open a store to sell chocolate whatever open a coffee shop sell liquor spiritually, coffee shop is probably better than selling beer because at least coffee makes you more alert I must admit there's a little story which I might have told before when I shifted from being totally anxious and depressed and confused person to being a very being peaceful and feeling the wonderful sense of every cell is alive with life and at night I would enjoy lying in bed and whereas before I was getting bored when I couldn't go to sleep and of course I couldn't go to sleep because I was bored and the mind was thinking about whether I would ever make it in this world and how dreadful my life was and it can't go better because you don't see how it's going to get better and so whatever the mind does, I was totally identified with it and then suddenly after the shift just lying in bed in the deep enjoyment of being, of aliveness and I was almost sorry to go to sleep eventually and for a while I would drink coffee before going to bed so that I could stay awake and continue to enjoy so if you then create, you may have some vision of what it is that you want to do in this world perhaps bring something new in if you are more on the side of doing then you're a bit more towards that side and that's fine, see if that is if it comes out of that peaceful place that vision that you have not from an egoic place where you think when I finally reach that goal that I have then I'm going to be really happy and fulfilled and that is not the motivation that leads to fulfillment whatever you create needs to come from a place of fullness already and then it's a pleasure to do and then you don't lose yourself in the doing and so the state of fullness is a deep connectedness with the present moment and realizing to feel that peace and aliveness, there is nothing that I need to add to my life so whatever I do, I don't do it in order to feel better about myself or in order to find some happiness at some point some relief from my unhappiness that would be stressful to do in that way but something arises that wants to be created through you, whatever it is and then you do and it flows from the fullness of being, which means you can always tell if you enjoy the doing while you're doing it, then you come from the right place, if it becomes stressful then the goal has taken over which is a mental projection and you're no longer connected with being when I say when it becomes stressful it does not mean there cannot be an intensity to the doing, even when you're connected with being there can be an intensity of focus which every creative person probably is familiar with when the creative process happens there's an intensity of focus which goes...

and there's enormous joy in that too when something is being born, whatever it is I remember when I was writing The Power of Now or A New Earth there was this intensity of focus that could even look from an outsider looking at you when there's such intensity of focus he or she might even think that you are stressed but there is no stress in it there's just that intensity it transcends who you are as a person it means a power is moving through you and something is being created that's the joy of the creative process so as long as there is joy in whatever you're doing then you are connected intensity may be there, but that's an aspect of joy too it is joyful to be in that intensity when stress arises that's a sign you're losing either you're beginning to lose the connectedness with being or you're doing the wrong thing perhaps it was an egoic desire that impelled you to want to create that new bank on Wall Street let's set up a new bank okay there could be such a thing as an enlightened bank or a banking system, it hasn't happened yet who knows, that could be the case but those things are more likely to be egoically motivated but a simple thing is stress you're not aligned anymore with universal purpose because it's only when the doing arises from universal purpose and not just egoic purpose then the creative flow is there so you have to find your own I'm just giving a few hints you have to find your own way there watch out for stress and losing yourself in the doing so perhaps in the afternoon we can interact a bit more and talk about maybe some of you might tell us what you're doing already or whether you're finding it hard to find the right avenue for universal purpose how to be more deeply aligned with universal purpose this is a question for many there was a time when I felt there was not enough, I felt this deep connectedness with being but it wasn't manifesting externally in any big way at all I was reaching a few people who came to me for spiritual guidance and the years went by and that was fine I was more deeply in being than in doing and yet I felt there's more that I could do so the pull into doing came in and I remember after a few years of working with people and sometimes giving talks in people's living rooms, they would invite me in invite friends and I would talk and at some point I gave a weekly talk in a B&B, the owner invited me in and whoever was staying at the B&B would come and listen and at some point this pull into more doing came in out of being, and when that pull came the thought arose, I could do more there's a lot there that the world needs and wants I'm only reaching a few people, that's fine but the pull came, so I went into a church in a tiny village in Somerset, near to where I lived in England, and these old village churches some of them 500, 600 years old 700 years, a very old church in a tiny village, and I sat in that empty church I love empty churches I sat in that empty church and all I said, I was very still and all I said then was, all the words came I'd like some acceleration please and then I went back home and 3 months passed I didn't notice any acceleration at all 4, 5, 6 months passed and then after about 6 months, one morning I woke up and I knew, I have to move I couldn't question it because it was so strong and I also knew where to I have to move to the west coast of North America Why? and I didn't act on it at first because sometimes these things come as just powerful thoughts, but not from the deepest place and if they're not from the deepest place they come and then they disappear but there was a peace associated with it a powerful sense of peace and purpose and then it stayed the next day I still said, I have to go and a week later, I have to go and if I had stayed, I probably would have fallen ill because I would have not followed the call and then I got ready to sell everything and get rid of, I had a little cottage sell it, and that took a few months and then finally I got a plane ticket and I thought at first, California west coast must mean California but I didn't know anybody in California well I knew one or two acquaintances but somebody had just visited the place where I lived in Sussex, who was from Vancouver and he said, come and see me I told him I was coming, come and see me first and then spend a couple of weeks and then you can go to California so I flew out of Vancouver, he put me up at his mother's home he was a little bit of an outsider too, he lived in the basement of his mother's home and was writing a spiritual book there but his whole family thought he was mad and there I was and I sat there in his mother's spare guest room and said what am I doing here and I didn't know, I stayed for two or three weeks then I took a bus to California on the Greyhound bus to San Francisco and there I knew one person and at first I stayed in a kind of small hotel and then I went to a meditation group that had been organized by that person in Palo Alto the acquaintance and during the meditation, there were about 15 people she said we have a visitor here from England and he's looking for a place to stay and I said a few words I did a little meditation with them and afterwards a man said I have a guest room ok, I'll come with you then so I stayed in his guest room in Menlo Park and still he had his business I was alone most of the time in his apartment why did I come out here how long is the money going to last where am I going after this no home, no life insurance no pension plan not even relationships anymore I left them behind and then after two or three weeks there suddenly the impulse came to buy a notepad yellow notepad and then on the kitchen table I sat there and the pen and then suddenly a strong energy stream came through and I wrote the question came, what's enlightenment what is enlightenment and then and that was the energy stream that became the power of now and I had old writings with me that I had written casually over the years things that came to me during counseling sessions some of those I read again and I said oh some of this is not bad at all and some of it I incorporated into the more empowered writing that was happening then and some of it became incorporated into the power of now but that was when the stream happened and that went on for three months after which my visa stamp expired I had to go back to England and so the writing happened every day during those three months first in Menlo Park and then I found another place in Sausalito and after three months I had to go back to England of course I had no home to go back to so I stayed in a commune which is quite interesting in itself and there I thought I would continue to write but nothing happened, I couldn't write I could only edit what I had written and so after two months I bought another ticket and went back again to Vancouver this time, again to Vancouver first and even after Vancouver the writing came back, the stream came back so anywhere on the west coast would work one more time it happened and then I knew beyond any doubt there was a reason why I had to leave England because for some reason the energy field there was not conducive to that particular creation that had to happen I needed the dynamic and peaceful and yet dynamic particular energy field that is there on the west coast which doesn't mean everybody needs that so don't all go off to the west coast so I still have a connectedness with England for some reason I still feel very much, I love the country and the people and the land and yet the creative process for some reason could not happen there but the answer then to my request, Acceleration came a few months after the request had been uttered, voiced and the Acceleration was at first the creative process and I thought that was it, little did I know that was only the beginning of the Acceleration and then the book came out after three years and then the book grew through word of mouth for one year and I could see, oh this is wonderful everybody seems to love it at that time everybody loved it because it got into only the hands of those people who were ready for it and then Oprah suddenly discovered the book and then of course it got into so many people's hands some of whom were ready for it and some were not and then not everybody loved it anymore but many people still did and then the Acceleration came and grew and grew and I almost thought, oh dear so you be careful with what you ask for so a request uttered from a place of stillness can sometimes be quite powerful if you feel it's coming not from the personality but from something that wants to happen through you something, when you say I want Acceleration it's not really the I self, the egoic self that wanted Acceleration when the words came the universe, the totality, the consciousness wanted the Acceleration and that led to the words asking for the Acceleration and that was part of the coming into form of that energy movement and this is a wonderful thing when you notice something that comes up from a deep level within you and then you say it but it doesn't come from the surface level of your mind so you may get a vision of what it is not so much what it is that you want to create but a more apt way of putting it would be to say a vision of what it is that wants to be created through you that the larger whole or the totality wants to create through you so it's not the question of what I want it is the question of what the greater whole wants the totality of the universe or consciousness and then the creative process is not only enormously empowered but is also a joyful thing so not that on a personality on the level of the little person of course you always experience even in the greatest things you create you always experience that every situation you go into, every new situation has always a polarity to it so as the acceleration came and it accelerated and accelerated I lost some things that I loved very much like not being noticed by people I loved always being in the background as just the observer of everything and suddenly I found instead of being the observer I was being observed and so I had to surrender to that I realized that comes with it so you can't keep your privacy and this is a small sacrifice to make for the person who would rather remain invisible and that's just how it is there's always something you need to surrender to and I've since talked to other people who have become famous in Hollywood or elsewhere and they said for a long time they longed for fame and when they finally achieved fame they realized, oh, is that it? It's not what I thought it was and it's not really making me happy at all at first it gives an acceleration and then there's a huge downside to it and some of the famous people especially actors and so on when it comes to them very early they go quite insane and some become very unhappy they take drugs, they can only survive with drugs even great artists they get overtaken by the energy stream that comes through them and such as happened to Michael Jackson for example there was this enormous energy coming through and he couldn't really fully integrate it into his life, the energy that came with the creation and he probably didn't have much spiritual guidance it didn't reach him in time if he had continued to live a little longer he probably would have had some spiritual guidance and be able to accommodate, to live with it without being swept away by this enormous energy that came through him the moment he started performing in his normal life he looked quite ineffective you wouldn't have thought there was a powerful there wasn't a powerful person there it didn't look like a charismatic powerful person but the moment he moved or sang something came through this also is a creation into form this is the outgoing movement the universe wants to create through humans and when it does sometimes powerfully it really pulls you along perhaps one day one could have a retreat for people who are coping with very powerful creative energy streams that are going through them that would be an interesting retreat please continue to use your particular situation here as part of your practice not only nature which we already pointed out but use the interaction with other people which is one of the joyful things that you have here use the interaction with others also as part of your practice and when you talk to others you engage in conversation be aware of not only the thoughts that lead to the words but be aware of yourself as the underlying the stillness or the awareness there was a teacher in Russia he was Armenian but he lived in Russia and then in France he was an early 20th century spiritual teacher and he had a term called self-remembrance and what he called self-remembrance was not as you might think remember your story remember who I am and my life story nothing was like that at all self-remembrance was a term that he used for being aware he never put it like that but what he meant was being aware of awareness to feeling the awareness in you even while you do things and even while you speak and one of the ways in which that effects the way you interact with others when you have said what you had to say you stop and there is a stillness after that if you don't have that you may have observed it in other people not here of course if you don't have it there are people who talk and one thought leads to another and another and another there is a stream and they never come to a stop you listen to them and they continue to talk it's one thing but then it leads to another and there is no gap ever and this is particularly difficult when you are trying to leave because you are trying to find the slightest gap that gives you an opportunity to say OK, I have to go now but the gap doesn't come and so you sit there waiting and there is a stream of thinking it goes on and on and on and perhaps finally they start coughing or catching breath OK, I have to go now so it's easy to get drawn into a stream of thought and pulls you along it can also happen when two people are having a conversation they can mutually pull themselves along so they are totally in that they are both engaged in that stream one stops talking and the other one immediately picks him up and goes, oh yeah and often it sounds terribly important the same stream you can have when you listen to people on the radio they talk and talk and talk and what they are saying is quite meaningless it's just words and when you listen to that in a foreign language you think they must be talking about something terribly important what are they talking about?

nothing much, just gossip and whatever so what I am saying is be careful not to be drawn along with the mind so that you are not in the grip of thoughts it's wonderful to have thoughts but it's not wonderful to be possessed by thoughts so as I sometimes put it the difference is between having a thought and a thought having you so or you could call it an opinion opinion is a little group of thoughts or a sentence or a perspective or a viewpoint but it's a thought form and again, it's not somebody even said it once I saw it quoted most people don't have opinions opinions have them they don't know that so that means to be in the grip of thought completely identified with thought which brings me back of course to what I quoted yesterday the Zen master who said to practice Zen the main thing to do is stop cherishing opinions now he used opinions in a wider sense it really means any mental perspective any mental position, any mental viewpoint any thought and when he said stop cherishing I think he meant stop identifying with, don't seek yourself in it, it's the self when the sense of self goes into the thoughts then you are in the grip of thought and that's what we call unconsciousness unconsciousness is to be totally in the grip of thought and then you do whatever your mind tells you to do and when you are in the grip of thought you lose empathy with other humans because you are then in the grip of conceptualized reality in the head and when you are in the grip of conceptualized reality you lose the ability to emphasize and to feel the aliveness of other life forms around you you get very much trapped in an encapsulated sense of self with a strong sense of separateness a sense of separateness that even that separate self wants to even emphasize it loves therefore to condemn others and to criticize others and it loves doing that all the time because the more it can criticize and condemn others even if it's just through gossip of how silly they are and what they did again and shouldn't have done all that kind of stuff when it can do that it immediately feels superior and more separate look at all these people and of course the pattern is so strong that you can have a group of people who are gossiping of somebody who happens to be in the bathroom and then that person comes back from the bathroom and then another person goes to the bathroom and then they start gossiping about that person it can become quite extreme so to be trapped in a conceptual reality you lose that ability the thing that makes you human the thing that the one thing that really defines you as a human or fully human being is the ability for compassion and empathy and to feel the aliveness of others and to feel that there is something beyond the personality that you share with the other life form with other humans but even with other life forms there is something that you share and what that is we could call that life but not the life form the underlying one life, we could also call it consciousness there is a consciousness even when you look at a dog or a horse into their eyes there is a consciousness there and that is no different a different level of manifestation yes, but the essence of that is no different from the consciousness in you there is only one life, one consciousness manifesting through all the life forms in different degrees of manifestation and that you can no longer sense in other words you are trapped in the world of form, thought forms and when you are trapped in the world of form you no longer know what you do to use the words of Jesus some of his last words they know not what they do, forgive them for they know not what they do when you are trapped on that level of form you no longer know that you are inflicting suffering on others because the others to you are lifeless you have made them lifeless through conceptualization by attaching labels to them and if they have been lifeless you lose all empathy and compassion you can either insult them or you can do all kinds of things to the degree that even violence becomes possible in the more extreme cases well the more extreme cases in 180 million cases in the 20th century alone therefore you can see the connectedness between the enormous violence inflicted by humans on others because they lost empathy through conceptualization and the collective mind and there is a connectedness with you talking to somebody in the dining hall and losing yourself in a mind stream a much milder form of the same dysfunction here we have one extreme, violence but a milder form is to lose yourself in the mind stream it doesn't mean that you immediately are going to attack that person hopefully not but it could happen if you are totally trapped in there the other just becomes another mental position to you conflicting with yours the enemy so let's go to the root I read yesterday the Burmese leader whose name I can never quite remember everybody knows who I am talking about she is visiting Europe at the moment and they asked her why did you never condemn the military that imprisoned you in your home for 20 years or so why did you never condemn them and she said condemnation does not bring about change we need to look at the root of evil condemning it does not bring about change or condemning people who perpetrate things she didn't even say that by the way she only said condemnation does not bring about change we need to get to the root of what creates that we need to tackle the root and that's very wise and that's why the greatest leaders Gandhi, Nelson Mandela and her few others they never condemned other humans they just embodied a more awakened state of consciousness so the temptation to condemn others is always egoically motivated even though it might look terribly rational to condemn all those evil people they are not in essence evil they represent a stage in evolution, the unawakened stage so any kind of condemnation of other humans is really, there is always ego there which doesn't condone, doesn't mean you condone what they do you see it but the important thing is what is the root of it and the root in the first instance is always to be found in your own mind because you are not separate from others and if we go through this shift this awakening from identification with form then the world is beginning to change not the other way around maybe the expression not from the top down by creating new organizational structures no, from the bottom up your state of consciousness if then at some point new organizational structures are created, that's fine they are created out of the new consciousness but you don't create the organizational structures first because egoic things will go into them and there will be another ego creation so this is the transformation the shift in consciousness that happens in you brings about the new world or the new us it's so simple we have a little stillness I mentioned this morning Gurdjieff the spiritual teacher early 20th century Armenian by birth, lived in Russia and then in France and then I got distracted by something else he had a technique that he called the stop technique and I got tempted to use it right now as I came onto the stage the stop technique was he had disciples I don't have disciples but when his disciples were gathering and doing whatever they were doing sitting, talking, he would sometimes come into the room and then he would shout, stop and everybody had to freeze whatever they were doing, however they were standing they had to freeze and that was an attempt perhaps a desperate attempt to help them to become present of presence and he called that self-remembering stop because they were all immersed in the mind stream before he said it no presence at all and stop was to produce that deeper sense of presence and get them out of their mind he also used movement almost a kind of dance to help people become present you can also apply it to your partner have an agreement and if you notice that your partner is immersed in his or her mind or mind coupled with an emotional field you can say stop but you have to have an agreement first it's easier of course to see when it's happening to somebody else than when it's happening to yourself another agreement that I sometimes recommend is there is another version of being totally identified and that is the pain body which occasionally arises in humans as you know, a pain body is an accumulation of old emotion consisting often of fear or anger and that frequency of unpleasantness and pain going back sometimes to early childhood and perhaps even beyond early childhood so it's regarded as a byproduct of the ego it becomes associated with the ego as the ego grows and it has a life of its own like a little gremlin I think in the gremlin the gremlins have the stage when they look cute and then later they look really evil and I don't mean the cute stage it's the gremlins at the later stage that's the energy of the pain body and when that takes you over of course you are in the grip of it and if you have an agreement and you notice it arising in your partner in many relationships pain body episodes come periodically and this is called drama in the relationship when you are completely unconscious one pain body provokes and brings up the pain body in the other person and usually the pain body is triggered by something relatively small and brings up a reaction out of proportion to the triggering event and then by that you can recognize that this is the pain body so it's a small event that brings up a lot of old emotion and magnifies the importance of that small event and that is the triggering event and so it's very helpful to have an agreement with your partner that if you notice the pain body arising the earlier you catch it the better sometimes it comes so quickly before you know it, it's already there especially if it's anger you say something some innocent remark almost and then the pain body that's ready to awaken because it hasn't fed on somebody else's emotional reaction enough it needs to take in more food in the form of energy vibration that corresponds to its own vibrational field and it's easy, it reacts it just waits for some excuse and anything you say could be slightly off and it goes how dare you say that and the other person and then before you know it the two pain bodies have come up energizing each other through the drama it can take a few minutes an hour, who knows and then it could also go on for a day or two the drama on and off until finally they have energized themselves and each other enough and then it subsides again oh ok, let's make up and it's like the thunderstorm has passed but unfortunately it will come again when the pain body feels it's time to feed again pain bodies, they are linked into your mind and they have an intelligence they use your mind, it's the emotion as you might find it strange that I talk about an emotion as if it were an entity but it is a little bit like that it's an energy field like every thought every thought we could regard as a kind of psychic entity it's a thought form and thoughts also thoughts can be like a virus in your mind a thought can proliferate, it can occupy your mind it can do so in a harmless way like a tune that you can't get out of your mind you have to hum it all the time and that's a relatively harmless way of a thought occupying your mind or becoming like a virus but other thoughts can be quite harmful obsessive ideas can get hold of your mind and they refuse to go now if there is enough awareness in you it's not that much of a problem because there is still that field from where you can see the thought you are the space for it if there is no awareness you are at the mercy of an obsessive thought you are not necessarily declared insane there are many people who are at the mercy of obsessive thought and are still considered totally normal it's only when it goes to an extreme and you start becoming a problem to the people around you then it becomes a clinical thing but it starts as a normal thing many people are considered totally normal throughout their lives, are still plagued by obsessive thoughts which are like entities that are created through mind activity and there they are stuck and you can have an obsessive thought occupy an entire collective energy field of a nation an obsessive thought, for example, there was Russia or China or wherever a country gets obsessed with one particular way of looking at things and so you had China when the cultural revolution happened suddenly everybody had as if something had gone into everybody's mind everybody has to think in exactly the same way that was the thought that the collective virus that had taken possession of people's minds anybody who deviates from that would become eliminated millions were killed in the middle ages it was a religious obsessive thought anybody who deviated from the norm would be very dangerous there was a thought police virtually any priest that said anything that somebody high up in the hierarchy disagreed with would be easily killed imprisoned, tortured, killed oh dear it's quite insane so thoughts can get hold of you as happened in China when children would report their parents it was a very widespread phenomenon would report their parents to the authorities because their parents had said a few sentences that were not totally in agreement with the great shamans little red book and everybody had to dress in boiler suits and that lasted a few years and finally that obsessive collective thought pattern disintegrated slowly it's still stuck in a few people's minds but not that many anymore and so yes, they are like both a thought and an emotion they are like little entities with a limited life span and so the pain body has a little bit of almost an autonomous thing like a thought too and it wants to survive in that form so it doesn't want to dissolve it doesn't want to die as the pain body it never really dies because the energy that's trapped in there when it dissolves in the field of awareness gradually the energy that was trapped in the pain body actually becomes freed and becomes life energy again so the anger or the fear that was constituted in the pain body that was in there you don't need to eliminate that because it's life too, it's life energy too it's just kind of frozen, stuck and so in the field of awareness when you know when it arises in you this is the pain body and you don't even need to verbalize it you're there as the witness then a transmutation begins and it can no longer then perpetuate itself by feeding on either one or two things that it primarily feeds on one is people close to you it pushes their buttons it has that cunning intelligence of the gremlin and it goes and then it pushes your partners it knows what the sensitive buttons are in your partner and it pushes those sensitive buttons and before you know it if you don't know what the pain body is doing the reaction comes so it's good at manipulating the other in order to get the same thing back that it lives on and so you need to be very conscious you need to recognize it before it starts to feed the most common and favorite feeding ground for pain bodies is families that's where they thrive at work sometimes too but the favorite thing is families or even more favorite is the intimate so called intimate relationships so it feeds on the reactions and the drama but if there's nobody around to feed on it can still feed it feeds on your thoughts when it's ready to arise it can be triggered just by one little thought that is slightly negative you get up in the morning and everything is fine you get into your car and then in the traffic something happens and you suddenly say what a real idiot and that can be the trigger for further negative thoughts how dreadful life is anyway and most people are so stupid and then it goes on one negative thought leads to another before you know it you are immersed in a stream of negative thinking and the pain body actually feeds them because thought is energy it feeds on your thoughts every negative thought it gobbles up like a gremlin so the emotion rises into the mind then your mind activity is controlled by the old emotion of the pain body so you are not thinking the old emotion is using your mind thinking through you and using your mind renewing itself through your thought activity the vicious circle and that's where people get into that extremely negative self talk for a few hours whatever a day or a whole night what a dreadful night of talking to yourself and more and more becoming more and more convinced how awful your life is or how dreadful some people around you are or were to you 20 years ago when it happened and you remember all these awful things whatever scenario the mind creates as long as it's of a negative kind then the energy of the pain body gets replenished the old emotion replenishes itself until it has done so efficiently and then it subsides and then you get a little bit of relief for a while until next time so if you live alone you don't have a partner then it will use your mind also some pain bodies use both they use your mind to feed on when your partner is not around or preferably use your partner to feed on it and so it's good to have an agreement again this is why we started to have an agreement with your partner when you are both conscious you can't enter the agreement when the other partner is already beginning to be in the grip of the pain body and then make that suggestion it's too late so if you have that agreement then I sometimes recommend to have a little sign that tells your partner that he or she may be coming in the grip of the pain body you notice it's starting in him or her and then you go oh well maybe this is not the right way it has to be something subtle maybe a word or whatever and there is no guarantee that that's going to work by the way because the agreement that you made with your partner when your partner was conscious will not necessarily apply anymore if your partner loses consciousness and this is how many people make agreements when they are relatively conscious and the person who breaks the agreement is not the person who made the agreement because the person who breaks the agreement is the person who is in the grip of certain mental emotional patterns this is how it happens, alcoholics they often create havoc in their families and then when they are sober again they say this was definitely the last time and I promise you on my life I promise you it is not going to happen again and of course they are totally sincere they totally mean that they are not trying to deceive you and yet it happens again but the person who made the promise that was there was some essence shining through awareness shining through the person and therefore the person was able to make that promise and then that essence becomes obscured when the addiction returns and the real being that made the promise the essence becomes so obscured that he or she isn't even there anymore so it's not that he or she breaks their agreements no, the essence becomes so obscured that the pattern then controls them and this is why it happens again and again and again and so whether or not it works helping your partner when you notice pain body arising we'll have to try it out and the most important thing obviously is to know it in yourself more difficult, self knowledge self observation requires more presence than the observation of somebody else you can observe easily when you observe somebody in conversation or whatever, how they get drawn into a mind stream and become totally identified with their mind stream and how they lose consciousness by trying to be right and so on, easy to observe in another but when it happens to you not so easy to be awake then and say, hmm, what's going on the stop technique, easy to apply to others but to oneself, not so easy but when it does happen, it's a wonderful step forward in the direction of fuller consciousness when it does happen, it's a wonderful thing when you can suddenly become aware of a pattern such as the pain body in yourself or a certain mind pattern that is repetitive and causes you perhaps a lot of suffering some kind of negative self talk that tends to be repetitive in your mind about yourself or somebody close to you and you see how it makes you suffer you can feel the emotion that goes with it and at that moment you realize this is not a reality that is making me suffer what is making me suffer is not some reality what is making me suffer is my thoughts that is an enormous insight that on many, many, many majority of occasions what makes you suffer is not the event or whatever your thoughts tell you it's your thoughts that make you suffer and you can easily see that in a situation if you don't think that anymore about it the situation is quite neutral OK, he cheated me out of 5,000 dollars you can dwell on that and see how dreadful he is and most people are dishonest anyway and then become distrustful of everybody you meet from then onwards and all kinds of things that the mind gets into conclusions that become fixed ideas all kinds of unnecessary baggage and self-talk that you carry around that obscures the way in which you relate to others the way in which you perceive the world it's all mind baggage I call it huffing and puffing about stuff and it's nothing, it's just an event there it is, this is what happened and the suffering is in the thought and the emotional reaction to the thought rather than in the event in most cases I'm talking about psychological suffering if somebody injures you physically of course then there is pain we could call that suffering I use the word suffering as a psychological layer on top of what could be physical pain so many philosophers and so on have had that insight that it is not it's thinking that creates a lot of the suffering in humans which is psychological suffering on top of any physical suffering they may have so it's the psychological me entity that gets strengthened through the negative thought processes and you have to observe it in yourself in any situation where you feel upset or angry or anxious see what is it that creates the upset what is it that creates the anxiety what is it that creates the anger what is my mind what kind of thoughts is my mind producing and when you see that you a lot of the time you create your own suffering that's a wonderful insight and if you can be there in the moment when it happens that's the beginning of the end of those unconscious mind patterns and then you are no longer in the grip of them and gradually then awareness replaces habitual and compulsive identification with thinking always and it's patterns amazing realization so self observation is vital to have enough awareness so that you can know what kind of thoughts your mind is producing and even that millions of people still don't have that not enough awareness to know what kind of thoughts your mind is producing being totally in the grip of every thought that comes that occupies your mind and becomes part of the illusory self wherever it wants to take you amazing and that's of course the work of a teacher that some of you may be familiar with, Byron Katie her work consists mainly of looking at a thought that arises and asking yourself is that true, is that really true can I really know that this is true, that he's a jerk do I know that this is absolutely true and of course at first you might say, of course it's true but if you look more closely you can see well, there may be aspects to him that are not jerk not a jerk in some ways, my ex let's say my ex-husband, she says, he was such a jerk and he made my life, he created so much suffering and what he did the story goes on and on how do you know that what you're saying is do you know that this is absolutely true what you're saying about if you look closely at a thought you see it's almost only a fragment and then you say, no, I don't know whether this is absolutely true or not so greatly her work helps you disidentify from thought and bring awareness in instead of following every thought where it wants to go where it wants to take you come with me, says the thought I'll show you a lovely place I can take you to and then you get hooked in and you follow it and then it pulls you in and before you know it your total attention is in there and you go off into dreamland which sometimes becomes a nightmare and then of course you create out of that unconscious state you create your reality that becomes the way through which you perceive situations in your life, around you the way through which you interpret other people totally distorting who they are through all the accumulated stuff in the mind getting a totally distorted view of others this is the human condition which could be summarized as lost in thought lost in thought so this has been the human condition up to recently, although there have been starting thousands of years ago already isolated individuals who saw the reality of that and then a few got it here and there there were pockets of awakening briefly here and there little pockets of awakening but it never became a widespread thing it's perhaps for the first time now that it can be a more widespread awakening in humanity and this is why this teaching and other associated teachings of a similar kind are so important the awakening is happening on the planet we don't need to ask now is everybody going to awaken, that seems very unlikely etc, etc, yes that's true but it's enough that you awaken because then everybody creates their own world so what we collectively call our collective reality is just the sum total of millions of individuals creating their own world you inhabit your world and the way in which you create your world that depends largely on your state of consciousness that's why you may remember the story that I told about the man coming into a new town asking the old man who was sitting there, what are the people like here and the old man says, well what were the people like where you used to live and so the first man who comes in says, they are all dreadful and then the man says, well here is much the same because the old man knows your state of consciousness determines what reality you perceive and experience and the next man, of course you may remember the next day comes, asks him, I want to move here, what are the people like again he asks, what were the people like where you lived before lovely people and the man says, very much the same here so I had a talk for ETTV just before coming here oh by the way, Stephen who just made an announcement before I came on said Eckhart created ETTV I'm sure you didn't believe that some dedicated people created it and all I do is just sit on a chair and then there is a camera and then I talk as you know I would not be capable of creating ETTV but I did a talk I had a dialogue with the actress Susan Sarandon in New York before coming here she is very open to the spiritual dimension and the first thing I asked her, why do you live in New York because she has lived most all her life I think in New York although she travels a lot and she says, I love the people here they are so open and so helpful and so alive and I love the energy and I heard many stories that the people are horrible from other people and she said the people are the way you expect them to be and what you show them, they reflect back to you which is very true and also the little experience I have of New York is quite good so I enjoyed the intensity of energy and the little contact I had with people was good so again to a large extent your inner determines the outer especially as far as human interactions are concerned in extreme cases you cannot immediately go into a place of complete deep unconsciousness and insanity a place where there is continuous violence which is simply a magnified form of usual unconsciousness you cannot go into such a place and expect because you are there absolutely present that they are not going to shoot you well, it could happen that they don't shoot you it could be but the likelihood is that something negative will happen so you have to listen carefully to see where you go what energy field you go into and they are not horrible people they are just a little bit more a magnified version of normal insanity that's what it is so with the pain body then this is a very wonderful thing to realize that there is a pain body in you and then it becomes your your little a challenging thing that helps you that pushes you into presence any challenge whether coming from within or without is actually helpful because without that we would go to sleep just look at movies when you see a movie you are interested because at the beginning or at some place close to the beginning of the movie something goes wrong and that determines then what happens but something has to go wrong I'm using a kind of generic expression on some level something must happen that is challenging to the protagonists, to the characters in the movie I call that something goes wrong and this is why you watch the movie if you watch a movie where nothing goes wrong you will go to sleep they are just a lovely family having breakfast together he goes to work, it's all harmonious gets home, then they go on a vacation go on a hike, the camera follows them everything is so wonderful two hours, everybody would be asleep and in your own life of course you complain when something goes wrong that it shouldn't happen the mind says this shouldn't be happening but of course it's a challenge and what works in the movie also works in real life because if it's a good movie then the protagonists the characters by facing the challenges undergo some inner transformation either they generate strength or energy that they didn't have before or they discover their egoic patterns they become, after going through turmoil and challenges in the end perhaps they become more fully human or they find compassion or whatever some change happens as a result of the characters facing challenges and so challenges are helpful there would be no spiritual awakening if you were not being challenged by whatever your challenges are so we can welcome in the words of Byron Katie loving what is that's a big one but let's start with accepting what is and perhaps then gradually that will take us to loving what is and just bring an acceptance to the present moment because what is must be happening now there's nothing else so loving what is is loving the present moment in whatever form and if you can't love it you can at least say well here it is and if you start arguing with it mentally that's the unnecessary baggage that's when thoughts get hold of you and it is that that creates whatever 80% or 90% of the suffering in your life is created by the mental baggage through which you approach situations and not by the situations themselves and it's a wonderful thing when you encounter how often situations that happen that before would have been labelled as bad by the mind and you would have complained about them and difficult people and so on, the world is full of them as you know so how wonderful it is when you discover suddenly that you can be in a place of neutrality towards events and immediately accept that this person didn't do what he was supposed to do you paid the plumber $200 and it's leaking again oh ok, it's leaking again so I think we'll get a different plumber and there's no complaint how dreadful plumbers are these days and you can't get anybody to do the right thing anymore and they're all really out to cheat you and the story goes on, simple this is the obstacle how can we go around it or transform it into something that works no reaction, no complaint just facing, this is accepting what is in action it doesn't make you into a passive person once you take action on the basis of acceptance you become very effective if you're in any business and you become free of reaction you become very effective in what you do because immediately a higher intelligence comes in which comes from presence the presence that is obscured whenever you get into a mental emotional reaction it obscures the higher or deeper intelligence that dwells in you which would be ready to act and live through you but it can't because the little me entity with its reactivity is lying there on top of it it says I'm going to control this situation I'm going to tell him what I think of him it can be very simple you look a moment of stillness there's an energy field and then you see what the situation requires and then you take action and you don't create every time you react from the conditioned mind the egoic mind, you create a further reaction in the other people with whom you are dealing so you strengthen their ego through your ego and then you get all the fighting that goes on but without it you don't strengthen the other person's ego the other person's ego exists suddenly in a kind of vacuum and he says he didn't react what's going on? it collapses without opposing it it very quickly collapses and then you can experience the miracle of sometimes unpleasant people suddenly showing that there's also a pleasant person hiding underneath but of course it's not a person a little bit of their essence shines through so this is the presence in action we started off with the pain body and of course that is still relevant what we are talking about have an agreement with your partner and even more importantly see if you can find on what occasions your pain body tends to arise when you lose yourself in the emotional negativity what is it that tends to trigger it and once you know that as a questioner yesterday said it was money and that's the case with many people because money is associated with fear and many pain bodies consist of fear fear of survival and so on and you can know as I already pointed out whenever you begin to deal with money you become very alert like you're walking on eggshells or something ok, now I'm going to call my bank manager and see what's going on and be very alert feel the energy field in your body and then talk from there or you you could even have a conversation with your partner to see when it is that we tend to have drama what particular situations pull us into unconsciousness it's an adventure it's the inner journey and it's a wonderful adventure and a highly interesting movie now in a bad movie things still go wrong but everything is resolved only on the external level nothing changes in the characters and the protagonists now those may be entertaining too just entertaining, but there's no particular depth to them you can watch that there are some good action movies but there's no depth if what goes wrong does not produce a change in the character and of course in movies the possibilities movies can contribute also to an awakening because when you identify with a character identify means you become one with it if the script is good and the acting is good you become a little bit one with the character there is such a thing as you may remember from college suspension of disbelief it's a term that means when you watch something on stage or in the movies everybody knows that this isn't really happening but you voluntarily suspend your disbelief and then you pretend that this is happening and then you identify with the character that happens in a good movie or play to some extent also in literature when you read and if this character undergoes a transformation in consciousness it may be very minor but then a little bit of change happens in you also because you have identified with this character who then faced problems and challenges and through them either generated more power and aliveness or preferably became more conscious one way or another and then a little bit of that you take home with you then that stays with you there is a transformational element in certain movies and of course one of my favorites in that sense that most of you have seen it's about a little animal that creeps around here too and eats the grass groundhogs, groundhog day which can be summarized now in one sentence for those who haven't seen it it's about a character with a massive and huge ego who dislikes everything and everybody and he gets stuck in one day he wakes up every morning the same day and has to experience the same things and the same unpleasantness that of course he generates and he suffers, he tries to commit suicide several times and he does but he wakes up again the same morning until something in him shifts and it's not explained fortunately because in movies that doesn't work it has to be shown and the viewer has to draw his or her own conclusions and in the end he says he comes into an acceptance which means a complete transformation from what he was before he accepts, he becomes a force for good on that particular day that he is forced to repeat and everybody begins to love him in that town where he is stuck that he hated before and finally he says to the woman whom he experiences also every day oh, this is a great place let's stay here and the next morning he is free to go and it's only so only when he comes to complete acceptance then the shift happens that he doesn't even need anymore it's lovely, if you haven't seen it or you saw it years ago without perhaps fully understanding what it is about, then I recommend you watch it again let's see if there are any questions and we'll do it the same way as before we have one hand of fate in this section and another hand of fate who is the hand of fate in front you are the hand of fate oh, she's going away is there somebody behind also two people

thank you Eckhart for being such a wonderful teacher to me I've been in the path for decades and occasionally I kind of lost heart and I thought I would never make it and you brought me so much closer to it and every time I listen to you, you do that so, thank you so much for that but that's not the question I know you are familiar with this quote because I think I heard you they said that democracy is the worst form of government except for all the other ones you quoted that that's one thing, the other thing is I get the feeling, although maybe it's just a thought that we're in the process of destroying the planet some people say it's too late already we overpopulated it, we polluted it and so, sometimes I like to think what is the solution to this problem so, somebody else said that the best form of government is an enlightened monarch and I was thinking and this is a little bit of a it's a little bit of a Dalai Lama kind of a question but I was thinking, suppose you were an enlightened monarch and you have absolute control of this little planet what would you do to try to save it and try to sort of lead us in the right direction sorry if it's kind of a

there have been occasionally in history as you mentioned, I'll come to the other main part of the question in a minute very rarely in history there have been a few that could be considered almost as enlightened rulers, monarchs or emperors but for example Marcus Aurelius, the Roman emperor who lived around 2000 years ago who wrote this wonderful book that is called Meditations which is really, was originally because it was never meant to be published with deep insights but unfortunately enlightened rulers have children who then become rulers and quite often the children of enlightened rulers are quite insane

I want to sort of maybe kind of I sort of know that, I want to suspend that part of that

I know, me too

suppose you were an enlightened ruler and you would last forever

yes so what would I do, that's the question I could not really do anything other than what I'm doing now which is transmit consciousness help becoming an opening for consciousness and that is then those people who are close to me and you are close to me here the consciousness is not transmitted but of course the same consciousness is in you it calls forth that awakening so the awakened state needs to spread into those close to you so the first thing I would then have some people close to me and make sure that they are relatively if not 100% awakened free of identification with mind and from there they go on and have others so I would not try to do everything because you cannot impose enlightened government on a non-enlightened population it won't work you will immediately have a revolution it sounds wonderful for example prohibition they said alcohol is so harmful it does so much harm to people and we are still selling it to people they are destroying themselves through alcohol doesn't it make more sense to ban the sale of alcohol and of course yeah let's do that so we all know what happened during the time of prohibition so you cannot impose from above one would have to use force in many cases which would be counterproductive and it would lead to the opposite of what you wanted to create one can only spread consciousness to other humans who are then going to take action the consciousness the very basis for the transformation of the world is a shift in the individual consciousness if there are enough individuals that go through that shift then they no longer create the insanity that has been to a large extent human history until now they don't create the violence and the warfare and so on anymore but it starts with us here so I would not suggest that we look to another solution that is quicker than what is happening here you might say ok but do we have enough time to save the planet I believe there is an acceleration of awakening now and although there may be short term very serious problems coming to us challenges which will be part of a more massive awakening that's how I see it you already saw it on a smaller scale in the 60s there was quite an awakening as far as spirituality is concerned it kind of probably started in California and then into many other countries there was quite an awakening that was coincided with teachers from the east coming, meditation happening enormous things that weren't happening before but it all accelerated because of some huge so called bad thing that was the Vietnam war that was happening at the same time and so many youngsters withdrew their identification with the collective in the states here most strongly my country identifying with my country being proud of my country feeling you are one with my country and they suddenly found it very difficult to do that because they could see that their country was doing very insane things and so they withdrew and in the 50s in America everybody was still childlike almost everybody everybody was confident and optimistic we can do no wrong and of course they had the second world war the difference between right and wrong was more clear there than perhaps in any other war and the suffering generated by the Vietnam war and insanity accelerated the awakening partial awakening in many humans and I believe if it hadn't been for that awakening in the 60s we wouldn't even be here now and probably the power of now would not have been written because it's all connected it's a stream of awakening which sometimes becomes obscured again and then opens up again there are times when you think have they not learned anything when Iraq happened haven't they read history and even recent history so the only thing to save is consciousness it's not so much what to do there are countless humans who will be responsible for what to do there cannot ever be one human who tells everybody what to do because the world is extremely complex there are so many areas where action is taken so the decision making process cannot flow from one individual it would flow out there and meet innumerable obstacles and then what does the enlightened monarch do he says this and this and this needs to be done and they refuse to do it because they don't realize that this is necessary so they refuse to do it what does the enlightened monarch do then you have to do it I force you to do it and the enlightened monarch becomes a dictator so it only works if the population there needs to be a certain percentage at least in the population of humans who embody if not a fully awakened state the awakening who are sane, just sane it's enough so there are sometimes politicians where you say compared to most others they look quite sane there was Gorbachev years ago in the Soviet Union and I heard even some people said oh is he enlightened but he looked like the Buddha because compared to him all his predecessors compared him to his predecessor he was like the Buddha because his predecessors were totally immersed in their collective mental conditioning and no matter what you feel or think about the current president and certain things that he should have done and could have done but didn't do this may all be true and of course I also ask myself can't he see that Afghanistan is not going to work ok there may be a pocket of unconsciousness in him but the general state of consciousness that he embodies is still far superior to almost any other politician that you see one can argue with many of the things that he does we don't know how much power he even has there are so many forces around him but when you observe the underlying state of consciousness there is still a non-reactivity there there is little ego that you see there is a facing what we have been talking about there is a facing a situation in a non-reactive way and seeing what is it that we can do about it and then he explains what it is that needs to be done so I still enjoy actually watching him in action because I can sense there is still this underlying consciousness more conscious than most it seems so perhaps this is the best that we can have at the moment it is a miracle that that is there that he is still there thank you ok the hand of fate I am not allowed to choose only the hand of fate do we need somebody here front also

hello I call you ET because you are from another planet and my question is about God I lost it and what I now see was a mental construct of mine coming from my very southern Spanish background Catholic is gone and nothing replaced it so I am wondering so I don't know if that is the reason why I am one of those compulsive doers and I think that my doing comes from my heart but I don't think if I think I find an empty hole there where my mental construct was so I don't even know who to pray to or what to pray to so that divine intelligence that the Christians say instead of creationism doesn't work I am a scientist as well so I don't believe that we wear a big band into all our complexities or soul or psyche I don't think it was just coming from the amoeba it is just not enough so that left me in a very confused state and I don't like to be confused because it is very confusing

it is a transitional stage you are leaving behind one particular state of consciousness that perhaps was comfortable while it was there the belief that there is a God and it becomes of course a mental concept you believe that there is a God who controls events who has the power to do that and then of course the mind begins to question at some point and we have all the old famous dilemmas come up if there is a God who is omnipotent we have had this many times but this is how people gradually tend to lose their belief in an omnipotent God somewhere when they start thinking ok, if there is a God to be God, He, they usually call Him He

if there is...

yes, and a beard I think it has to grow a bit if there is a God He must be omnipotent because if He is not omnipotent He is not God ok, so we have sorted that out and then the next step the mind says if there is therefore an omnipotent God but He does not prevent the enormous amount of suffering that is happening on the planet then He is either indifferent to human suffering or maybe He is even enjoying it in which case He does not have the goodness that I would usually associate with God if He is a God, He must be both omnipotent and absolutely good and if He is omnipotent and absolutely good how is it that this omnipotent and absolutely good God allows all that evil to happen and all the suffering to happen this is the question that traditionally arises for humans who are beginning to step out of that very comfortable mindset which of course is upheld by the centuries of beliefs collective beliefs that humans have had and still represented by the church and so on as long as you have that belief then it is comfortable, you know where you belong it gives you a sense of a little bit of safety although it does not really free you from fear and then you begin to doubt you say, ok, absolute goodness and absolute power and yet He is allowing all this to happen and for many people this is how their traditional belief structure begins to crumble because they don't have an answer for that and when they go to the priest, the priest will say we cannot question the way God does things we just have to accept that this is what God does and yet it is hard, you can't do that with the mind you start thinking more and more and so of course there was the philosopher in the 19th century Nietzsche, the philosopher he shocked everybody when in one of his books he wrote God is dead of course it is a contradiction in terms if there is a God, God cannot be dead because God would be totally timeless and so on but what he meant was really the concept that we have created of that supreme being is dying that was the early stage then the mentally created concept this is about realising something within you that traditionally has been called the divine but it is also about giving up the belief that somewhere there is an entity that is the controlling giver of good as somewhere in space or time or wherever traditionally people look upwards when they look for God it must be somewhere and you grow out of that and you realise that all the religious people they venerate a mental concept of God but they never touch, they never realise the reality of the divine and I'd like now to replace the word God with something else that is less confining because the word God immediately implies somebody and usually a male figure otherwise you have to say goddess and then he becomes female so God immediately implies an entity somewhere and people traditionally have even believed that God is very much like a human because it says somewhere in the Bible at the beginning God created man in his own image and people didn't understand the real meaning of that and they took it at a superficial level and therefore thought he must look like us and then they imagined this controlling entity looking like us like a human, like a man and then they thought if he looks like us he must have the same emotion that we do he gets angry and he's jealous and so then created out of their mind they created a God that they thought he gets angry and jealous the unconscious behaviour that humans exhibit they attribute also then to God and say oh you have to be careful because he has a bad temper so they create out of their very limited understanding they created a mental construct but throughout while these things were happening throughout there were certain individuals who realised that there is a reality to what we call God that is far deeper than any of those images that we have created and they realised it within themselves and there was a teacher 2,500 years ago in India who later was called the Buddha the one who is awake and he was born into what was already a Hindu culture Hinduism is older than Buddhism so he came out of Hinduism which had belief in God less limited by the way than the Christian belief but with limitations too with a heavy mythology they asked him is there a God? they asked the Buddha please tell us because they realised the Buddha was a deep presence there and the thing is the Buddha never answered that question and in the scriptures it says he kept noble silence I am going to give a bit more of an answer than the Buddha but the Buddha kept noble silence he didn't say there is a God and he didn't say there is no God and there is a wonderful depth in that because it is only when you go into the deeper levels of your being that you realise that what traditionally is called God that you are actually an extension in form, a limited form that which animates you the consciousness that expresses itself for a very short time as that particular human being in that particular physical form in that particular psychological form the consciousness that animates that without which you could not exist that consciousness is one could say an emanation of the one source consciousness that is at the core or the source of the entire universe that has no location of course in space or time is the unmanifested which means it does not manifest in the world of form it is the eternal, timeless, unmanifested source of all consciousness and all life, life and consciousness are the same very much compared to the sun the sun could be you could compare although the sun has a location in space and time so it's not the sun, it's just we can give an analogy it gives of itself and you could then say every life form is animated by the light of the sun so the consciousness that you are not the thought forms but that which makes the thoughts possible is an emanation of that one underlying consciousness which is continuously born into short lived life forms and seems to for some reason enjoy that so there is not we are here to realize that even if we only get a glimpse of it we become free of the image of a controlling entity which really that is like humans that belongs to a more childlike stage in human evolution that kind of image so you are leaving that behind so instead of believing in God you are beginning to sense in yourself you got it but for those who hadn't got it yet laughter laughter laughter instead of believing in God which is a workings of the mind you step deeper into yourself and you can sense your essential reality as a presence yes, a divine presence the emanation from the one source you transcend the personality and you sense that in yourself that cannot really be named anymore because you realize when you name it that is definitely not it so you lose your belief in God and you begin to find the reality of God in yourself

so even if I screw up I can always tap into it again

[Speaker 1] (8:30:16 - 8:31:47)

yes, when you screw up then you see what you did from that place of consciousness what in colloquial terminology is called screw up means you act unconsciously and humans have been doing that throughout history that is why history is screwed up laughter so we act as we connect more to the transpersonal the transcendent dimension within ourselves we screw up less and the more that begins to live through us the less suffering we create suffering we otherwise create for ourselves and for others look at tradition if you look at the history of just Christianity middle ages created a lot of suffering in the name of God they tortured people in the name of God they believed in God it was an absurd form of insanity so here we are this is the next stage in the evolution of consciousness now you feel a little bit it's a little bit like a child that's growing up and feels a little bit sorry about losing childhood that's you yes

thank you, you might have saved my life

laughter applause applause

[Speaker 8] (8:32:14 - 8:33:21)

hello I've had some thoughts and when you said this morning I don't really have a question as much it's just something I wanted to share and that is that in your ETTV and I have not seen it and I'm not sure where it's going but I would love to see awareness television you're talking about children with devices where is that all going and how can we turn the internet or television into something more meaningful I would love to see we have a big screen TV over my fireplace that looks like I'm there and if I could just see animals and no documentary, I don't need to know I don't need to see them fighting I just want to see them, observe them and a church, when you said a church I was thinking the exact same thing an empty church there are so many things I wish we could see I don't need to be there, I'm not going to go to Africa but I would love to just look in the eyes of an animal that I'll never get the chance to see

peaceful images appearing in your living room a succession of peaceful images nature, animals maybe beautiful, serene buildings, temples, churches and it could even be downtown New York if that's something I would choose I want to just look and watch that with nothing but hearing the sounds and just to focus on improving my awareness I think it would just be a great thing

[Speaker 8] (8:33:39 - 8:33:54)

[Speaker 1] (8:33:54 - 8:34:51)

I was a few months ago in a hotel I don't remember where and there was a channel in the hotel television that was actually on when I came into the room for the first time and that channel was showing beautiful landscapes it changed every 15 seconds or 20 seconds or so and so all this beauty appeared a lake, mountains, trees nature usually, very often when you come into a hotel room the TV is actually on, sometimes it's the hotel channel usually the first thing I do when I go into a hotel room I switch off the TV if it's on but this time I didn't switch it off and I left it on for an hour because it was so pleasant perhaps you can create that my other issue is I'm a bit of a frequency holder so I was hoping if I put it up there laughter laughter

[Speaker 1] (8:35:02 - 8:35:32)

laughter well I'm not a doer either because as I said I didn't create E.T. TV either but I know somebody who is a doer her name is Oprah I will see her on Friday in Chicago I may just briefly mention it with just one sentence just put a thought into her head and see what happens

thank you for doing all that you do my question is about how does one pay attention to the future while making choices and everything around you is changing constantly the future of course you need to consider on a practical level where you make plans or you project a timeline and you can write these things or do it on a computer screen but that has its place and you're not losing yourself in the future but you're giving your fullest attention to what you're doing in the present moment let's say you know what it is that you want to achieve in a certain course of action I want to achieve whatever do you have a business or what is your occupation I'm a life coach life coach, good, well that's a very good occupation giving your fullest attention provided that you know what it is that you want and what it is that you want is really what is it that one wants to manifest through me we talked about this yesterday the true question is not so much what is it that I want but what is it that wants to come through me what is it that wants to be born through me into this world and so you have to look at that in the present moment that's not dwelling on future and then you might get a realization not perhaps immediately of where you want to take your life your so-called life your external life okay, let's say I want to create you're a life coach so who knows, maybe you're happy doing what you're doing and you continue doing that or you might feel something wants to I want to create a retreat center where people can spend some time and learn about how to live for example, that might arise and then you look at what is the next what is the first step that is required you focus on it the focusing itself is an important part of manifesting you focus on the vision which is all present moment you don't focus on I want to achieve that at some future point you hold the vision in your mind which is all present moment and you hold the vision in your mind as if it were already a reality and this is an important part Jesus briefly talked about that too he said when you pray for something, feel as if you already had it and that's of course when you read books about manifestation the good ones will also tell you that the most powerful thing when you want to manifest something in the so-called future is to feel that it's already there so what would it feel like to have this healing center where people come, just an example the healing center where people come spend time and learn how to live consciously and you can feel you can feel already the fullness of that it feels good so you are not doing it in order to feel better about yourself or about life when you finally achieve it the creation needs to come from a sense of fullness in yourself and not from a sense of neediness of insufficiency or of lack I need to have that to feel happy and fulfilled or get recognition manifestation comes from a place of fullness and when that place of fullness Jesus also he used the expression the fullness of life he said I want you to have the fullness of life that seems to be a contradiction to what the Buddha talked about the essence of life as emptiness and if you look at the surface only of words then of course if you are a scholar you say they talk about the exact opposite, Jesus says fullness and the Buddha says I want you to realize emptiness and of course they are talking about the same no thing, exactly the same no thing from a different perspective because the emptiness is the unmanifested source of all forms which already contains everything in itself in that emptiness so it's just another word for it there is no contradiction whatsoever when you feel empty there is an intense field of aliveness in that emptiness that has no form it's just vast spaciousness and in that you don't need anything, you don't need the healing center but you might enjoy creating it it may want to be created through you and out of that joyful realization of that presence that the fullness of life you begin to take action talk to this person and you may find when you are tuned in in that way you often get approached with just the right you meet just the right person at the right moment or the right synchronistic you run into somebody and say as happened to me when I mentioned yesterday after giving a talk to a class at University of California I suddenly realized it would be wonderful to reach more it's so satisfying to reach all these youngsters they are much more open than I realized I thought they had to suffer a bit more before they would be open but many of them are actually open and I thought it would be good to teach to talk to more of them and a few days later I got an email from Yale that's a strange coincidence I haven't had an email in years from places like that that's beautiful and I got it personally I got very few emails how it reached me I don't remember, somebody must have given somebody a phone number my email address it's very strange but it's beautiful and when you are tuned in in that way coincidences seem to happen to support what you are doing and when it does happen it feels it's a kind of confirmation that this is the right path it's more than what I want to do it's what the greater whole wants to do and from there you are present moment centered you have the vision but now in the meantime every action you take will be just one step at a time towards the vision and you know very well that when you achieve your vision you are not going to be any happier than you are now

[Speaker 4] (8:44:22 - 8:44:55)

Thank you Vielen Dank my question has to do with location you spoke this morning about the energy field in western North America you had to come there in order to have that book getting out of you and I have been living in New York City 14 years which is full of nice people

[Speaker 4] (8:45:03 - 8:46:17)

all kinds of people and I had in April I teach yoga and in April I had a sudden ending of many classes and I had, I can't even say it's a thought I can't even say if it's a thought or a feeling but I have lately coming up in my consciousness you need to go, your time is over here but I don't know if it's too much a mind, an egotistical thought that I want to go somewhere to get something because now I am challenged with the situation even though I have been right now I am having the best time in my life it's the best moment of my life right now right here, it's wonderful, it's amazing and this loss is not a loss it's a gain because I have discovered something of the dimension of being I am very grateful but I am not sure if I need to go somewhere to be more useful to be more given so right now you are still in New York where are you living?

Manhattan

[Speaker 1] (8:46:28 - 8:52:37)

and so as you deepen now and perhaps this being here has contributed to a deepening in you see if you still feel that when you go back and pay attention to how you feel about the energy field of Manhattan when a deepening happens often places that before we thought we can't possibly be here they become okay but not necessarily the deeper you are the more the easier it will be for you to know whether or not it is right for you to continue to live there there was a time very similar in my life to what you just described for many years I lived in London and a time came when something within me no longer seemed to be aligned with the energy field of that big city it just as if there was a shrinking back I could feel it energetically inside as a kind of shrinking whenever I went out into the traffic and the subway and the masses of people but for many years I enjoyed London but the time came when something didn't feel right anymore and that feeling continued and then finally I realized I have to leave I was seeing I lived on very little then I was seeing people who would come for counseling occasionally and I got into my old car and I drove out into the countryside looking for somewhere that felt right and I reached Somerset the county of Somerset and for some strange reason I reached this strange town called Glastonbury which is an alternative center where lots of spiritual people and weird people in other words people like myself they visit there they live there so it's very much unlike any other town in England except perhaps one or two that are a little bit similar Totnes in Devon is a gentler form of Glastonbury and there my car broke down and I could never use it again after that and so that's where I then began to live of course first I had to catch a train back to London and get rid of everything so that took a few months but that's where the car broke down and that's where it felt right at the time to be there it happened to be quite a magical place in many ways with spirituality that goes back to pre-Christian times it's been a spiritual center and a place of healing for thousands of years going back to pre-Christian religion and so that's how it happened in my case so I finally went but the realization whether you need to leave it may come to you something coming into your life that also tells you where to go you may not necessarily have to go into your car and wait for it to break down because your car is probably better than the one I had and it may take a long time before it breaks down so see what it feels like as you return now with more presence and more awakened consciousness see what it feels like now or if the feeling continues that it doesn't feel right to be there then you can focus on begin to see where is it that I might want to live where does it feel right do I already know a place somebody may bring something to you some bit of information mention a place, invite you somewhere come and spend a few days here somebody says in that way it may happen for you but cannot predict in what way or you may feel compelled to go somewhere that you have heard of or you might feel good about nobody can predict how you will be taken out if that's meant to be for you how you will be taken out don't so I asked myself when I was walking along the streets of Manhattan a few days ago whether I could live here and I said yes I could yes I had to ask Laura is there a difference from a spiritual point of view or from becoming aware in the fields of energy that are supporting awakening more than other places so that's part of the question is there on the west coast of the United States is there more support to awaken than on the east coast

yes, this depends on the individual there is no way of saying that this particular place is for everybody, would be more conducive to spirituality than another person it might be the opposite coming back to London, all my spiritual transformation and the shift in consciousness, it all happened in London so I cannot say that London is not conducive to spiritual realization it's a powerful place in many ways there is a powerful energy field there and it's closely related to my spiritual path both before the awakening happened and after and the awakening itself happened in northwest London and yet a time came years later when it no longer felt right to be there, it doesn't mean that for other people it's not absolutely right to be there

first of all thank you for this book obviously it's not read at all in 2008 this was a huge puzzle for my awakening the journey with Oprah and yourself so thank you so much my question has to do with how you mentioned nature and how it compels us in and how we actually reflect its own beauty through us observing it and I wonder if the same parallel can be drawn through us as humans without ego also when you mentioned specialness and uniqueness I'm trying to sort those all out because I feel like we also perhaps without ego being involved can draw or perhaps feel compelled to draw people so that they can also see the beauty in us and there's an analogy I wonder if I could offer perhaps help me there is a field of flowers and perhaps poppies and there are some flowers who strive to be taller healthier and the bee then goes to those flowers and prolificates the field with those flowers isn't it then in some ways okay for the human men to strive to be its best and then it prolificates the consciousness of humanity or is this considered egoic

okay well in the same way that when you contemplate a tree or a flower you reflect back to the tree its own beauty and sacredness and aliveness so the tree through you becomes conscious of itself in the same way I don't know if that's the answer to exactly your question you can reflect back to another human their own reality who they are beyond the ego when you meet another human with another human whether it's a brief encounter or whether there is more of a relationship you can reflect back to them who they are beyond ego by yourself being more of a presence than a person when you are with them we already know what that means being more of a presence than a person in the presence of another human with another human means as you look at this human or listen to what they say there is a spaciousness in you in addition to perhaps having some thoughts about the other human occasionally perhaps not even that there is a spaciousness in you through which you look at the other human you give them that space and this means you reflect back to them who they are beyond ego and this is what happens here I am not here as a person it would be absurd for this person to think that you had come here to see me I mean, what for? you don't want to see the window frame you want to see the light that comes through the window you are not interested in the frame so nobody comes to see a window frame but people love the light that shines through which is the unconditioned consciousness so if I ever thought people came to see me that would be a very stressful thought so they want the spaciousness because it is a reflection of who they are in their essence so this is what happens here but everyone, am I answering your question?

[Speaker 2] (8:59:05 - 8:59:19)

yes, but doesn't the garment that we wear and the window frame have some essence as well doesn't it have a purpose doesn't it have something without ego yes, doesn't it have a place in itself

the form is honored also in that presence you honor the form of that human there is the physical form there is the makeup of their personality you don't say get out of the way no, it's acknowledged that is there also that's the form and the form is shining through the form so in many ways the things that you talk about are of the level of form usually with the other human so both levels are acknowledged if this is not the full answer ask me again

[Speaker 2] (9:00:05 - 9:00:34)

I guess because I feel that in some ways we focus of course on the essence and I understand that and I wonder if when I look at nature and I don't feel there is also anything wrong with encompassing the physical form and the essence they are not really separate

[Speaker 1] (9:00:35 - 9:02:57)

what we call beauty is a combination of the form and that which animates the form shining through the form without the form it wouldn't be there so it's a combination ultimately the two are together as the ancient Buddhist texts tell us form and emptiness, emptiness and form they are really one so it's not really a duality you actually love the form as you reflect back the essence you also love their form I love the human form I love sitting in a cafe and looking at all the humans that come and go and sit there and contemplate the multiplicity of the human form it's beautiful or wherever in big cities talking about New York and the humans that inhabit New York not only is there the multiplicity of races and all ethnic backgrounds from all parts of the world it's quite a unique thing quite a unique place and they all come there and they all participate in this high intensity energy field everybody has some important business to do and they're all running around and they create this high intensity and I found it very enjoyable actually I felt like floating in a sea of energy as I was walking along the streets Madison Avenue almost being carried by this no thought in my head just loving all these forms energy forms it's quite beautiful you can only really love the form when you are in touch with that which is deeper than form if you're not in touch with that which is deeper than form you don't really love the forms that you see you either fear them or you want something from them but you're only free to love them when you are in touch with that which is beyond form and from there you can love the forms

I feel that you're right then it becomes a celebration

a celebration of the multiplicity of life maybe one or two one more depending on the length of the answer we have some more questions tomorrow so don't despair and if your question is not answered tomorrow then of course you go to the best place where to receive an answer which is within, in the stillness

first of all thank you very much it meant a lot to me my son actually introduced me to you

how old is your son? 26 good work

so I guess my question is yesterday you mentioned and you talked about it today too, pain body and yesterday living a life of fear with the world the way it is and the economy the way it is a lot of people are gripped in fear and so you talked about being gripped in thought and so I was wondering how do you deal with the grip of fear and what's the best approach to take to get out of that grip of fear and become aware and productive do you experience that from time to time? are there particular occasions when you feel it most strongly?

[Speaker 5] (9:04:33 - 9:04:35)

yes

an interesting starting point is to see what the relationship is between certain thoughts that you think and the emotion of fear to see are there certain thoughts that I think when you feel the fear look at your mind what thoughts is my mind creating right now what are the thoughts telling me what kinds of thoughts are floating around in my mind and you may find that there are thoughts concerning the future some possible future scenario something about yourself at some point and you may find that a lot of that fear is not created by a situation you find yourself in unless you're facing a dog that's about to attack you but that probably happens rarely or you're in some place and you're about to fall off the ledge this is actual fear in the presence of imminent danger but I assume you are not you're not a soldier I was in the Marine Corps the Marines as you know if you're in an actual battle situation then there may or may not be fear perhaps in the immediacy of battle you're forced into such presence there's no fear or there may be fear but if there is fear there then that is not what we call psychological fear that is an instinctive reaction to imminent danger but what you're facing now I assume is not an instinctive reaction to immediate danger it's a fear that lives in you and first thing to discover whether you are creating it at any given time by certain thoughts that your mind is producing at that moment you may find maybe you know the answer already right now or maybe you have to wait until the fear rises again and then look at it because it's surprising how often humans are not even aware of what kinds of thoughts they are thinking that even happened to me when the shift happened this is just aside from I'll come back in a second when the shift in consciousness happened and I suddenly felt so peaceful and I didn't know why the present was so enjoyable but I didn't even call it the present I just said peace, it's so peaceful and everything was so lovely and that was of course in London and I could walk around the center of London and find everything so peaceful and only later I discovered when I talked to a monk a Zen monk who said well Zen is really about the cessation of the thinking mind I thought oh, now I understand why I feel so peaceful because ever since it happened I haven't been thinking that much and there's actually vast spaces in me of no thought, of just perception but I didn't even realize that that's what it was I didn't perceive it as the absence of thinking, I perceived it as peace so you could say I didn't really know what was going on in my mind and suddenly I realized all the peace is associated with the cessation of thinking but no loss of consciousness whereas usually the cessation of thinking is associated with loss of consciousness when you stop thinking you go so observe whether your mind is creating certain thoughts that create the emotion of fear then it is also possible that the fear lives in you as an accumulation of old emotion and that from time to time it comes up and creates fearful thoughts so there is always a relationship between the emotion and the thoughts so make sure that the link between the thoughts and the emotion of fear is broken, severed and you do it by becoming aware of the fear when you feel it indirectly in yourself as an energy vibration one could say, whatever it feels, it's hard to describe because you can't see it you feel it in yourself, it's somewhere in the body it affects the body and feel it rather than allow it to arise into your mind and give rise to thinking but be aware to see whether whenever you feel it whether that is perhaps the result of certain types of thoughts in your head so in other words are you creating the fear that you feel by your thoughts which is the case for many humans or, which can also happen is there an accumulation of fear in you that goes back to the past that from time to time you feel more strongly than at other times, it comes up and it then tends to go into the mind and lead to fearful thoughts so it can be thought creating fear or fear living in there perhaps going back many years in your life and from time to time but usually some link happens then with your thinking and that link needs to be cut which is not a violent process at all which is a very gentle thing you do it simply by being the space for the fear to feel it and to accept that right now this is what you feel now this might seem not very helpful to say I accept that right now this is what I feel, but what it does is when you accept whatever you feel right now it creates this acceptance that you bring to it implies there is an awareness suddenly around it it's a space of awareness that then begins to surround the fear, that's what acceptance does so in the same way that you accept because whatever arises in the present moment whatever arises in the now externally you might as well say yes to it because undoubtedly there it is it is what is in the present moment so you might as well say yes if you don't say yes to it it's a form of insanity almost but it's quite normal to argue with what is the same applies internally, what arises internally you can't deny that there is fear and if you say go away, it won't work so what does work is to say ok, there it is, I can feel it and by being the awareness around it which comes through acceptance acceptance means you kind of step back you are not totally in the grip anymore you step back from the fear so to speak internally and suddenly there is an aware space around it which we call acceptance and so the fear continues but when you then are conscious of it you hold it in that field of consciousness it cannot renew itself by using your mind and thinking fearful thoughts and in that way whenever you feel the fear arising accept it that this is what is right now you don't even need to call it fear anymore you just feel what it feels like and accept that kind of feeling it's a strange frequency and you may then find if you do it often enough that gradually the energy that was trapped in that fear becomes freed and you feel more alive because when the energy sometimes an enormous amount of energy is trapped in a person's fear and when that is freed that very same energy that was trapped there becomes part of your sense of aliveness and actually fuels your conscious presence so you don't need to want it to go away anybody can experience that even people who are maybe not burdened by excessive fear normally when there is anxiety or something like that let's say you have to give a public talk and many people are anxious beforehand stage fright because they are projecting themselves mentally into that situation and it's very problematic because it's not happening now how are they going to receive me?

what am I going to say? are they going to like what I say? what if and so on when you feel anxious and you become totally present with the anxiety so that it's not using your mind anymore you just feel the anxiety and accept it completely then it can often happen that the anxiety becomes high intensity energy and you suddenly go from suddenly go from so fear when it's totally accepted can sometimes quickly become transmuted into intense aliveness so the way then beyond it is the acceptance of it hold it in that space of consciousness and feel it fully don't fuel it with your thinking and be very careful so that when your mind creates more of it by thinking certain thoughts that you need to recognize that is called dysfunctional thinking which is usually associated with projecting some kind of future because obviously there is nothing to fear at this very moment but there may be something tomorrow to the mind so see what your mind is creating how that contributes to the fear it may contribute a lot or it may be that the fear lives in you but either case if it's your mind make sure that you recognize the futility and the dysfunction of those thought patterns and then take your attention into simply feeling what you feel so don't create more of it by unconscious thinking observe if that is the case observe how your thinking creates more fear more fear, more fear and so good luck that's your spiritual practice everybody has their tailor made spiritual practice and that is an important part of your spiritual practice and the second part of the question is how do you deal with regrets you talk about the present moment a lot of people deal with regrets as well

yes, so fear is usually associated with thoughts concerning some projected future and regret is associated with thoughts concerning something that happened in the past and in either case you are identified with those thoughts and you take them to be virtually reality you don't recognize that those thoughts are simply thoughts when you are identified you believe the thought is a reality so when you regret something your mind is formulating a certain story an interpretation of certain events that happened in the past you did something that perhaps you think was wrong you know now that it was wrong but at the time you did not know that otherwise you wouldn't have done it that would be called guilt which is also related to regret but these are all thought forms that perpetuate the past in your mind and they are imbued with a sense of self anybody that has guilt which is associated related to regret, it's not quite the same but it's related to regret guilt means there was something in the past that you feel you did and that you realize now that was wrong to do perhaps it created suffering for other humans it was wrong you realize it now because now there is a consciousness there that wasn't there at the time this action happened so at that time you were in the grip of unconsciousness compared to what you are now and to personalize that actually creates more ego you have to forgive yourself in the same way that Jesus pointed to on the cross when he said forgive them for they know not what they do sometimes you have to say I forgive myself for I did not know what I was doing when Jesus said they do not know what they do in our terminology that we use here he would have said don't hold it against them because they are completely unconscious that's what he meant they are completely unconscious if you forgive yourself I was unconscious then I was in the grip of certain emotional mental streams and there was not enough presence in me to act otherwise recognizing that this happened because you didn't know what you were doing that is part of the forgiveness and there is no self essentially in it, who you essentially are has nothing to do with that it does not mean that sometimes people still have to undergo karmic retribution for certain things but there is no sense anymore that I, who I essentially am did that, no let's now, thank you let's now go a little bit more silence and we have more questions tomorrow unless they have all dissolved dissolved in the stillness I got mail welcome again wherever you are, here or elsewhere we are in the tropics now that may slow you down a little which is a good thing there is a Zen saying which goes hurry slowly but what that really means is not that you necessarily slow down on the external you can both be fast on the internal and be still on the inside I briefly mentioned that before at some point and then of course you are not stressed you are still very effective in fact more effective and yet there is always that still core that still space if it has to be fast you can move fast there was a Greek ancient Greek philosopher Heraclitus

There was a Greek, ancient Greek philosopher Heraclitus, or Heraclitus, who became famous, well, his most famous saying, he was a pre-Socratic philosopher, which means before Plato, before Socrates. The pre-Socratics are wonderful, but their teachings only survive in fragments, and one of the surviving fragments by Heraclitus is the saying, in ancient Greek, I don't know much ancient Greek, but I just happen to know this one, Pantave, which means everything flows, or everything is in flux. And he's also known for his saying, you cannot step into the same river twice.

So, he very much was aware of, like the Buddha, too, of the fleeting nature of all phenomena, the continuous fluctuation of forms, and I'm sure he also taught that if we get attached to the fleeting forms, then we suffer, although I don't think those fragments, I don't know if there are any fragments that say that, is the emphasis of his teaching is on the impermanence and the fleeting nature of all phenomena, and then, I don't remember one generation before or after him, there was another philosopher, Parmenides, who said the exact opposite, he said, all change is an illusion, nothing ever changes. And if you study philosophy at university, they'll tell you these are two totally conflicting views of reality, but if you enter the spiritual dimension, then you realize that they are both right. One refers to the dimension of being, which can be realized within, where you find that point of absolute rest, which however is not dead, but vibrantly alive, that which Jesus called fullness, which Buddha called emptiness, that absolute stillness, like the very center of the hub, the wheel, is still, and everything else revolves around it, and so that's the still point, where nothing ever changes, and from there, once you realize that that is actually the essence of who you are, seeing from there, you look around, and then you see something that many of those people who had that realization, when they looked out upon the world, said, oh, this is a bit unreal, it all looks a bit unreal, because it's very much like a dream, all these forms, tomorrow, of course tomorrow will be, when it happens is now, we know that, but we have to use these words, tomorrow you'll wake up somewhere else and then you'll make a, was that a dream, or did that happen? It dissolved, the experience receded and dissolved, and at some point, there will be nobody left who remembers this experience, it could be many years from now, until the last person here dissolves, and even their descendants, to whom you told about your wonderful Omega experience, they remember that their grandfather talked about being at a place called Omega, and he realized his true identity there, but then they die too, and finally, no trace is left of this particular experience, it's dissolved completely, but what does not change actually is there is a consciousness that has emerged through the various forms into this dimension, and then, because it has emerged more fully here, expresses itself more fully through other forms, so there's an essence which is not to do with the word of form, everything on the level of form eventually dissolves, dissolves, dissolves. So Parmenides realized, as did many Indian saints and gurus, teachers, they said, it's all an illusion what happens out here, and then of course other people come and they read what they said, and then they repeat, they might even start giving spiritual teachings, so they have read that it's all an illusion, and then they say, it's all an illusion, but when you look at them in their daily life, they get extremely upset about things when they happen, where's the illusion now? Some Zen masters sometimes when the disciples said, all is one, everything else is illusory, sometimes the Zen master would hit you, and then the disciple gets, why did you do that?

Well, if all is an illusion, then where does that anger come from? So it's not true until you realize the truth of it, it doesn't become true because it needs to be true for you, not as a mental concept, but as a realization in the depth of your being, and then you can say, compared to that vibrantly alive stillness that I am at the center of my being, so to speak, or the being beyond form that I am, compared to that, it all looks a little bit unreal, that's how I would put it.

I wouldn't say it's all an illusion because on its own level it has a certain reality, you can't deny that, but it feels a little bit unreal and a little bit insubstantial but quite pleasant and interesting, the continuously changing forms of life. So everything flows, yes, everything moves, and yet nothing moves, ultimately Parmenides said it's an illusion, but it's a pleasant, it can become a pleasant dream, that's the transition, I call it a lucid dream, you know, you may have experienced at night in the middle of a dream, suddenly you realize that you were dreaming, and that's quite an interesting one, wow, this is a dream, and then you might even have thought, I can do anything, I can try out anything, but usually what happens is very soon you wake up, it's the continuing to dream and being aware that it is a dream, usually they're not compatible, and then very quickly you wake up out of the dream, and lucid dreaming happens, we use it as an analogy when you are rooted in that sense of spaciousness, you're spacious inside, there is an aware presence in you beyond the person, and from there whatever unfolds in your life is a kind of dream, you're no longer totally attached to it, in it, like the dreamer who doesn't know he or she is dreaming, you're totally in the grip of the dream, when you know you're dreaming the dream changes, the nature of the dream changes, so the realization of being, which is what this is, the realization of being also changes the way in which you dream the dream of everyday life, as you have a spacious relationship with the dream of everyday life, in other words, nothing that happens is any longer of absolute importance, it still is of relative importance, but it is not of absolute importance, of relative importance is whether you live in a tent, you're homeless and live in a tent or on a park bench or in a pleasant house, of course in relative terms it does make a difference to your life on the level of form, whether you have a nice family around you or whether you have nobody, in relative terms it makes a difference whether your body is healthy and vigorous or your body is fragile and getting old, makes a difference, whether you are successful in the world or completely unsuccessful in the world, there's a relative difference to your life experience of course and perhaps you would prefer to be successful, when these things are regarded as absolutes then each one of these things has the power to make you either happy temporarily or quite unhappy, when you see them as relative then anything that happens on the level of form still matters to some extent but as I put it, it matters but it does not matter absolutely because there is always a space within you from where whatever is there unfolding on the level of form is witnessed and allowed to be, there's always that dimension in you that is not really touched by whatever happens on the level of form and then you discover the amazing thing that even when you're homeless you can be very deeply peaceful and even when you have lost everything that deep peace remains, it might even become stronger but you may also find because you then embody that deep vibrantly alive peace, you may also find that that also emanates from you into the world and so it does influence the way in which you experience life and how other people and life situations respond to you, so if you're homeless and sit on a park bench and feel this absolute peace, of course you may think okay I may need to take some action, see if I can get a roof over my head and find somewhere to stay, fine, but in the meantime you're sitting there, happened to me for a while and then somebody comes sits next to you and asks a question or says something and then you give an answer and there's perhaps a tiny glimpse of something spiritual in your answer or in his question and suddenly you find teaching is happening, somebody gets drawn to you and then he comes back, this happened to me, he comes back the next day and sits next to you again and wants to ask another question and then that's the beginning of your career as a spiritual teacher. It also happened to me several times that as I sat not knowing, at that point I wasn't totally homeless, I was staying sleeping on somebody's floor but during the daytime I would still sit around on park benches and then I looked in my pocket, oh I've only got two pounds left in England and suddenly somebody comes by and says oh he recognized me from a job I'd done before, oh you're just the person I need, I need some language classes, can you teach me German, I think it was, at that time my Spanish was so good I could even teach Spanish but I couldn't do that now probably, so he needed I think both German and Spanish, okay for two weeks you teach me for three hours twice a week and that was enough to keep me going for another two or three, and then always at the last minute the universe came, it was supportive, so circumstances then are there but there is a space around them and there's always, there's present in you the transcendent dimension and that's a wonderful sense of freedom and the paradox is that as this transcendent dimension is present in you, it affects even the circumstances of your life, but that's secondary, Jesus used the words for that when he talked about that, he said all those things that you thought you needed, seek only the one thing that matters, there's only one thing that matters and seek that, pay attention to that, all the other things that you thought you needed will be added unto you and that's the experience, this adding unto means you no longer need it for your sense of identity, for your happiness, for your sense of fulfillment, to give you a sense of who you are, usually people look for all kinds of stuff to give themselves a more complete identity and those things, you don't need those things anymore because your core identity is consciousness and that can be realized at any moment, it can only be realized in the one moment, in the vertical dimension now. So, and then the little, it's almost as if the universe had a sense of humor or irony when you really don't need it anymore on the level of fulfillment or identity and then the universe says, oh, here it is. When I had a big ego in my 20s and so on, of course, I was unhappy too with it, it goes with it, to be a great spiritual teacher, wow, that I would have given anything, my ego would have and then something happened and the need to be anybody in particular dissolved and I was happy, very happy, being nobody in particular.

In other words, we could say I was happy being a valley whereas the ego, the egoic self wants to be a mountain, the egoic self wants to stand out and say, me, look at me, how successful I am or if it can't do that, it says, look at me, how miserable I am, definitely more miserable than you. It wants to, in some way, it wants to stand out, be special through knowledge, through possessions, through appearance. Some people hit you over your head with their knowledge, they are so highly educated and they throw it at you so that you feel very small.

That's one way the ego could, or others show off how much better they look than you or in a very subtle way, the spiritual image, seeing yourself as a spiritual, highly evolved spiritual being can also be part of the ego, to have an image of yourself as highly evolved. It always involves comparison with others, when you, the ego always compares itself with others. So when you, you have to be alert to it, in case it happens to you, when you detect a subtle sense of superiority or inferiority towards others, when you see somebody here at Omega and you see, well, I'm so much more spiritual than this person, or if you look in admiration and you see, wow, they've gone a long way further than me, they're so much more evolved than me, will I ever reach that point? So, comparison, a sense of either inferiority or superiority, always associated with ego, because beyond ego, there's just a sense of aware, spacious beingness, and that doesn't need to compare itself to anything or anybody. And so that is really the need to stand out, to exist, one could say, because to exist means to stand out, X means out, ist comes from stand in Latin.

To exist means the need to express your opinions, when it doesn't really matter what your opinion is, because there's no decision-making process involved, you just have to express your opinion when things are being discussed. You can feel how it pushes forward into your mind, and you cannot stop yourself. And that's part of wanting to be defined in form more strongly.

The ego wants to define itself, its form identity, more strongly, and so it uses all kinds of strategies to enhance its form identity. Another one of, as we know, is criticizing others, because when you criticize others, you strengthen your form identity as a superior being, because the implication is, of course, when you criticize somebody, you are superior morally or intellectually, whatever, to that person that's being criticized. So it's an unconscious attempt of the ego to enhance its form identity.

Another way in which the ego strengthens its form identity is to regard people as enemies, to say, he is such a, what he did to me, to use, you make people into enemies, you make situations into enemies. When you complain about a situation you find yourself in, why don't they, they should have gone in your head or out aloud. Again, even complaining about a situation you find yourself in or a place, a location where you are, the complaining strengthens your form identity and you are making the situation into a kind of enemy.

And many people spend a large part of their lives converting situations that they find themselves in into enemies. It's an ego pursuit. It's quite insane.

And so they spread a lot of unpleasantness because whoever they come into contact with gets infected by their energy field of hostility towards things that are around them. So these are very rigid egoic identities and it's all unconscious. But it's all an attempt to get a stronger sense of me as opposed to other.

As I sometimes put it, the ego tries to emphasize the otherness of others. And even collectives do it, nations do it sometimes towards other nations, the collective mind of one nation makes the other nation into absolute devils. This has happened a lot in the past.

To some extent still happens, maybe a little bit less so when you look at the propaganda, the nation's first world war and so on. It's an attempt to make the others like that's like the other, the neighboring nation, they are all evil. Or you make a race, another race into they are all evil and we are the good ones.

But that goes back thousands of years where when tribal identities, when humans lived in smaller tribes and the neighboring tribes were sometimes regarded as not even human because they were a totally different tribe. They were conceptualized already then, that was very much there already, conceptualizing other humans as the other. And so when you have the other and emphasize the otherness of others, then you get a stronger sense of your own self.

But that self is an illusory sense of self. But to the ego, which is the illusory sense of self, it's very satisfying to do that. And that's how a lot of the insanity happens that we see in human history.

So it's, but it's all related. That can be traced back then to simple things like feeling the need to complain all the time about people and things and situations. All the ways in which one enhances unconsciously one's egoic identity, wanting to be somebody, not liking to be overlooked.

If somebody don't give me enough attention, get very angry. You know the saying that the sentence that just precedes an act of violence, they say, hey, I'm talking to you. But you give me attention, I'm here, here, look at me.

And if you don't give them attention, then they'll hit you. Then they'll get attention. I'm talking to you.

Oh dear. And all the spiritual teachings emphasize try, instead of trying to be the mountain, see if you can become comfortable with being the valley. The Tao Te Ching actually talks about the valley spirit as the essence of the Tao, the valley spirit.

Being nobody in particular, or Jesus saying, when you are invited to a feast, don't sit, don't sit at the best seat, seek the lowest seat when you are invited. And this is a parable. It's not literal, to be taken literally.

He's not advising you where you're going to sit at a dinner party. It's not that. It means something else.

It points to something else. Seek the lowest place means do not seek to emphasize your form identity. Be comfortable with the simple beingness, which might include not emphasizing your form identity.

I talk about that a little bit in the New Earth also. At first it feels strange when you give up the need perhaps there's a discussion, people are putting forward their point of view, you have a point of view and then as an experiment you decide you just drop it and just be there as a presence. At first it seems that you are beginning to disappear and then you find there's a, you sink down to the bottom so to speak, instead of being up here, you go and at first it's a little disconcerting when you don't emphasize the me, but then suddenly there's a, you can sense a peace and then you can actually sense true power.

True power is, comes from a different place when you are rooted in the, in the beingness, the aware space, you sense an enormously powerful energy field that is not, has nothing to do with the world of form and you can rest in that and that's a, that's a wonderful thing. You're then free of the ego and have become, have accessed true power in yourself, but not power in the way the ego would think of power, power over somebody else or power as having more than a deeper sense of power to get to the source of life, to source of all life within yourself. And then you don't, the wonderful liberation is you don't need to emphasize the me anymore.

And so one sometimes sees, occasionally I've seen in movies, characters in movies that are virtually egoless, whether this was happened accidentally or whether the screenwriter knew what he or she was doing, I don't know. Well, on the one hand you have certain characters that are pre-egoic like Forrest Gump or The Hobbit, and then you have, they haven't gone through the egoic stage yet, they are pre-egoic, therefore connected more with the totality of life and the source of life. And then in some movies I've seen characters who are actually egoless and seem to have gone beyond, there's even, I may have mentioned it before, there's an older movie that I saw in the 80s, with the adventurer, the man that always plays the adventurer that goes out seeking treasures and so on, Indiana Jones kind of movie.

I think it was called The Jewel of the Nile. So if you ever can read it, The Jewel of the Nile has one character in it who is supposed to be a Sufi master, a spiritual teacher. And that Sufi master in Egypt, I think it is, that Sufi master, normally when these masters are depicted in movies, they're huge egos because that's how the scriptwriter or the director thinks of a master, so you've got your massive presence.

And this master has no functions without any ego whatsoever in a childlike way, and it's quite wonderful to watch. I also noticed, one can sometimes watch movies from that point of view. There was another movie called, I think it's called The Fastest Indian or something, it's about a motorbike race with the famous English actor Anthony Hopkins, based on a real person.

The character that he plays in that movie also functions virtually without ego. He's never reactive. He immediately goes with the situation.

So it's wonderful to watch. So you don't need to really try to tackle the various manifestations because there are so many ways in which the ego manifests. If you examine them one by one and try to get rid of them in your life, that doesn't work and you don't need that.

You need to focus on that which is beyond the mind, which creates the ego, which is focused on space, on awareness. And then in that, the ego naturally begins to dissolve. But also you become more aware of it when it does appear and you can smile at it.

Oh, there it is again. And for a while it has a momentum, it will reappear. And before you know it, you've gone name dropping and you've said in order to enhance other people's opinion of who you are, you say like, whatever.

Oh, I just got a phone call from Oprah. I just had to mention that. I didn't.

I'm just such an example. And sometimes it's totally invented. There are people who invent all kinds of things to enhance other people's opinion of who they are.

Or you drive in a big car because you want to be seen by others with the roof down. Now, of course, these are more rudimentary manifestations of ego. Most of you are beyond that.

But wanting to be seen by others, it's totally meaningless because all that others see is a man or a woman sitting in a car. It has nothing to do with anything. But to the ego, it's a kind of food to be admired or envied by somebody else if it's only for a second and they have no idea who you are.

By observing my dad when I was a child, I learned a lot about ego. Often 50% of what he said about when people were visiting us and I noticed very quickly, that's not true. I didn't know it was called ego, but I just knew why does he invent these things to make himself more interesting.

But it was a great need to be more, to stand out more in the eyes of others because the ego loves to see its reflection. It sees itself very often through the eyes of others because it's part of the self image. Quite amazing.

So, I had an early teaching there and only much later realized, oh, that was called, that was the ego. You may remember in New Earth, I talked about the old, the ancient saying, this too will pass, which is again coming back to impermanence, the fact of impermanence. This too will pass as a reminder that whatever happens is fleeting.

And this little reminder, this too will pass, it's like having a bird's eye view of what's happening in your life situation. A bird's eye view gives you a larger perspective and you see the, again, relative and absolute, you see the relative unimportance of whatever you think is so important in your life situation. You could also look up at night into the starry sky and become still and see the vastness of the heavens, the stars, and not just the stars, more the greater sense of awe that comes when you look at the stars without interpretation is the vastness of space that you suddenly sense.

The spaciousness of it, that is where the sense of awe derives from. Oh my god. And the timelessness of it because you know that several thousand years ago it was virtually the same.

And a few thousand years from now it will still be virtually the same. The changes that take place over such long periods of time that it's virtually eternity that you're looking at. And again, that gives you a sense of perspective of the relative unimportance of your life situation.

Whatever happens in your life situation, you remember I contrast life situation with life. Life situation is past and future, whatever happens in it. Life is vertical dimension, is now.

And it's not ultimately to do with the level of form. You drop down into consciousness itself and realize that is who you are. And your life is always now and your life situation is in past and future, relatively important but not absolutely important.

So there are ways of, there are another access point into the transcendent dimension of the vertical, of course, is to be aware of the impermanence of all phenomena. That's, before we have questions, mentioning that, what I'll try to do now is to show you something on the screen as an entertainment. If it works that it's with technical stuff you never really know whether it will work or not.

I mentioned yesterday the commercial. The only mistake I made, it wasn't for beer. It was actually a commercial for a video game, but that hardly matters.

That only comes at the very end where it says life is short, play this. So let's see if we can get that on the screen now. It's very short.

I hope everybody can see the screen and I also hope the sound is there with it, which is an important part of it. So the most spiritual commercial ever. And I don't even know whether those who produced that, whether they knew that or not.

So now you had to look at your life. So if any questions remain after this. So let's see that we have two hands of fate, your hand of fate and then there's another hand of fate over there.

I'm not allowed to choose. The hand of fate chooses.

[Speaker 5] (40:48 - 41:00)

Thank you. Thank you, Eckhart. Years ago I had visions.

I would close my eyes and I would see all text just moving in front of my eyes.

[Speaker 1] (41:01 - 41:03)

What do you see? Visions.

So I still don't know what was it about. I still don't know the language. And I saw a lot of other things, predictions for myself.

I saw my thought forms, the entities.

Entities?

[Speaker 5] (41:21 - 41:45)

Entities, yeah. So and all of a sudden 15 years ago it stopped completely. And right now I don't even see dreams.

I don't even have dreams at night. So my question is what happened and how can I get it back because life without it is quite boring.

Okay.

[Speaker 5] (41:50 - 42:12)

My guess, I didn't accept this gift because I didn't act on it. I didn't ask questions. I was I didn't even consider myself worthy of this gift.

So maybe I didn't accept it. So right now I'm trying to accept that I didn't accept and accept that.

[Speaker 1] (42:13 - 59:28)

So you haven't had any visions for some time now. 15 years, not even dreams. 15 years without visions.

Okay, okay. Let's see. I've been 34 years without visions.

Visions, they have their place. It's usually a stage in one's development. It can be associated with spiritual awakening because sometimes the mind seeks to what is happening at a deeper level.

In the same way that when a dream is created at night, you're asleep. And very often the dream is associated with certain emotions. And it seems to the dreamer that the dream creates the emotions.

But very often the opposite is the case. There is a certain emotion left over in you while you're asleep from the previous day or from many years back, if the pain body, whatever it may be. And the emotion is felt while you sleep.

Not dreamlessly, but intermediate sleep. The emotion is felt and the mind, always now you may have noticed the mind always seeks to interpret what's going on. So when you feel an emotion and you're in the intermediate stage of sleep, the mind is looking now for an explanation for the emotion that you feel in the body.

And this is then how the mind creates a dream that corresponds to the emotion in order to justify, to explain the existence of this emotion. And to the dreamer, however, it seems that what happens in the dream causes the emotion. So if you feel fear in that intermediate stage, this is only the beginning of my answer, so be patient.

So if you feel fear inside you, then the mind seeks to interpret the fear and then creates a dream where you're being chased by some awful monster and you feel fear. But cause and effect are confused, the fear was already there, then the mind attempts to explain it and give it an image. And so it also happens when a person now begins to grow or deepen spiritually, sometimes that you sense something arises within you which the mind cannot interpret but seeks to interpret.

And so it often happens that saints and spiritual people sometimes have visions. You may have visions of Jesus, you may have a vision of Krishna, you may have a vision of some other spiritual figure and it usually somehow relates to your cultural background or your personal background. But those are attempts of the mind to interpret something deeper.

Powers of prediction or clairvoyant powers, these things can also happen, they're well known in Indian spirituality where they are called siddhis. Siddhis are powers that develop as a by-product of spiritual awakening. For example, you might know what somebody else is thinking or you can suddenly have an insight into what's going to happen next.

These are spiritual powers that happen and all the deep teachings and teachers say, do not give these things too much importance because if you give these things, accept them when they are there, but if you seek these things and try to make them even stronger or want more of it, that will lead you astray from going to the source and finding yourself as the formless and timeless one source beyond form. So when these things arise, acknowledge them but don't let them take you away into that because then you might, there are some wonderful psychics in this world, they're extremely good at telling you, maybe not all the time but when it works, they can see, they can tell you what your grandfather said on his deathbed or whatever and this is very wonderful.

It's not necessarily associated with the true spiritual awakening, maybe just halfway down. So when it happens, it's wonderful. The visions are not the essence of the spiritual path.

They sometimes come as a by-product on your spiritual path but the essence of the spiritual path is actually stillness and stillness is not interesting as you said it. Visions are much more interesting. Now, but the term interesting is a conceptual term that refers to the world of things that arise and especially things that can be conceptualized easily.

So for example, a discussion between people may be interesting. Some drama may be interesting. A movie is interesting.

Observing a huge city and what happens there might be interesting, what people do there. Now what's not interesting is to watch a sunset. Nobody could say, what an interesting sunset.

Now because that exists in a different, when you really pay attention to a sunset, and this is just one example, it could be at nighttime looking at the vastness of the sky. Now it's only when you try to interpret what is that constellation and what is that star, what are they called, then it becomes interesting. But if you simply watch, which is a different way of perceiving it, you are there in awe of the vastness of it, you cannot say anymore, isn't that an interesting sky?

No, there is a dimension that is much deeper than interesting. Interesting is a relatively superficial dimension. It has its place.

Occasionally it's nice to look at interesting things or experience interesting things and it continues to happen anyway on this surface level of your existence. Things are interesting and things go wrong and it makes your life interesting. As I said the other day, whenever something goes wrong in a movie, it's only then that the movie becomes interesting.

So you cannot have a movie, two hours of a sunset in a movie, but you can go to a, you don't need a movie for that, but you go to a real sunset and you watch and there is this majestic spectacle of the sun, the vastness of the sky, the changing colors, the mind stops when you watch that. You cannot really see it unless the conceptual mind stops and then something is deeper, touched more deeply in you and responds to it from a deeper level. We can't call that deeper level interesting at all.

It's not interesting. We have left interesting behind. We have gone deeper where there is a power that is much more vast than interesting.

Don't worry, you can go back to interesting after the sunset or the sunrise or the starry sky. But interesting is only one level of existence. Now if you are stuck on the superficial level, then you will always be looking for the next interesting thing to get your mind into and this is a normal human existence where you see what's the next stimulating thing that I can get into, says the mind.

It's always looking out because it cannot sense the inherent deep sense of aliveness within. It seeks a substitute for the sense of beingness and presence that is the essence. It hasn't found that yet.

So it looks for substitutes and in a deeper sense, you know that Buddhists talk about reincarnation. In a deeper sense, reincarnation happens whenever the mind identifies with something because then the consciousness that essentially is the mind, when you identify with a thought or you look at an interesting thing on the computer screen or in a book, a magazine, a book or talk about interesting things or interesting TV program, an interesting political discussion, interesting spiritual speculations.

What about what did the Buddha ever incarnate on planet Mars? Isn't that so interesting? Let's talk about that and all kinds of theories about it.

He said he did and then somebody else said no, he didn't and all that's the mind which the consciousness that you are reincarnates every time it into thought forms every moment. So that's the reality of reincarnation, it can actually be experienced. You don't have to speculate, is there such a thing as reincarnation?

That's interesting to think about but when you look in your immediate experience, you realize that whenever you identify with form, a thought form, an interest and they're all interesting. All these thoughts are relatively interesting compared to the non-interesting but much vaster beingness. So when you go into a thought form, consciousness incarnates.

Incarnate means assumes a form, is born into a form. Oh, let's think about that. Or you see a vision, oh wow, isn't that so beautiful and that happens in your mind of course.

It's a form that arises, everything happens in your mind, a form that arises. This is so interesting. And then of course the vision disappears and that's oh, it's gone.

I hope I get another one soon. It comes and goes. As everything in the world of form, it comes and then it goes.

And so there have been saints who have had visions for a few years and then Jesus suddenly no longer appears to them and they became desperate without realizing that they were actually meant to transcend that stage now where you don't, they don't need the vision anymore which is some form that arises because who you essentially are is a formless. So become comfortable with the non-interesting dimension which is not boring. Boring means you're still on the level of the mind and it just cannot incarnate into anything interesting at this moment.

And then the mind gets very restless and bored. Oh, what can I do now? But of course before long it will probably come up with some problems that you're having.

And so suddenly your life is interesting again. So become comfortable with the visions not being there and see what happens when you accept that right, this is not interesting and then allow yourself to go deeper. Remember the sunset and you may actually want to watch the sun or sunrise or contemplate nature, sit somewhere surrounded by nature without trying to pick out things and say, oh, what's that?

Let's see. I think that's called such and such. Or you may carry a book of birds and then you look, this looks like, or you, this looks, oh no, it isn't.

It's something else. You see, it's a totally different way of perceiving than sit there and not conceptualize and simply go, wow. The first way of perception that I just described is interesting.

The second one is not interesting, but it's much more alive really, much deeper to go like. The same when I visit other places where there are ancient buildings such as temples or cathedrals, it's wonderful to go into them. And again, there are two ways of experiencing those places.

There is an interesting way of experiencing a cathedral, an ancient cathedral or a temple. And the interesting way is you have a guidebook or you put things or you rent this little commentary that you put an earphone on and then you switch it on and then it tells you exactly the history of each thing and the entire building and it becomes very interesting. Or you have your guidebook and you go, okay, now what's it?

Oh, this goes back to the year such and such and the meaning is such and such. Fine, that has its place and it makes your visit interesting. Usually I don't do that.

I go in and just look. And I know many things on the interesting level I'm probably missing. But there is then another level of perceiving the entirety, the totality of that space which far transcends and is actually deeper than any bit of information you could have about that place.

Not that there is not, there is a place for information too. If you can have the two in your life, that's even better. But most people, once they start on the informational level, they get completely absorbed by it and they lose the spacious way of perceiving which is not interesting.

So it's very easy to get drawn into the interesting way of perceiving and thereby losing the much deeper, non-interesting, spacious way of perceiving life. So when you go into a cathedral you can try out both, go in and just perceive, just watch everything in that alert spaciousness and then you are not only aware of what it is that you are seeing, you are also aware, probably there is some stillness in that space, you're also aware of the stillness that surrounds you and you're aware of the space itself, not only of the things that are in the space, you're also aware of the space itself, both the stillness and the space. And the guidebooks never mention that. They don't say, now the space here, what can they say about it?

Nothing. And they can't say anything, they don't mention the stillness either. So these vital things are missed when you look at a guidebook and perceive on that level, the interesting level.

So interesting in your life has its place and I'm sure in many ways your life will continue to be interesting but go deeper than interesting, it's much more alive, which means deeper than the visions too.

[Speaker 5] (59:29 - 59:32)

Okay, I'm just asking for acceleration please.

[Speaker 1] (59:36 - 59:43)

Thank you. Okay.

[Speaker 6] (59:57 - 1:00:07)

Hi. Thank you for being here. My name is Margot.

I came from Israel.

Oh, can you get a little closer to the microphone? You come from Israel?

[Speaker 6] (1:00:14 - 1:00:22)

Israel. And I have a question. Why we still need, why we can't give up suffering?

[Speaker 1] (1:00:23 - 1:00:27)

Why do we still need suffering? The suffering.

[Speaker 6] (1:00:27 - 1:00:31)

Why we still cannot give up suffering.

[Speaker 1] (1:00:31 - 1:00:49)

Does that question apply to humanity or does it apply also to yourself?

[Speaker 6] (1:00:49 - 1:00:55)

I thought about it and speak about humanity and exactly in our space.

[Speaker 1] (1:00:55 - 1:00:56)

Yes.

[Speaker 6] (1:00:56 - 1:00:57)

I look around myself.

[Speaker 1] (1:00:58 - 1:01:06)

Yes. Do you find in your own life that you still cannot give up suffering or have you given up suffering?

[Speaker 6] (1:01:07 - 1:01:08)

I'm in the process.

Okay. A question is always more immediate and more powerful and the answer to a question like is more powerful when the question is why can I not give up suffering completely and then it becomes more relevant because you have to then find the answer in yourself and observe in yourself when you still suffer and as you say you're beginning, you're no longer suffering the way you did before. You're beginning to step out of it but it still arises from time to time and so when it, the fact that you're beginning to step out of it means there is an awareness that is arising.

You're not totally unconscious anymore except from time to time when you still lose it so to speak. So it's the answer to the question really you can find in yourself to observe in yourself how you create the psychological suffering that we speak about, how it is created in your mind. That is a more important observation than why you are creating it.

The how can more quickly lead you to the end rather than trying to figure out why. I can tell you briefly why but the how is more powerful to ask how does it happen because when you see how it happens you're very close to the end because you're making it conscious. Whenever suffering is created it's done unconsciously.

You don't know you're doing it to yourself except afterwards. So why is it created? Because the false sense of self that arises through identification with the mind creates suffering because it prolongs its existence, it strengthens its existence, it opposes things, it is not aligned with life which is always now and it's non-alignment with life for example by arguing with what is internally that's a great source of suffering, by dwelling on things that happened long ago and recreating those things in your mind through thinking is a form of suffering, by looking at situations through the excess baggage of the mind and huffing and puffing as I call it while they happen and take things personally instead of immediately saying yes to what it is, is suffering, but it keeps alive the false sense of self and so as long as the false sense of self is in control it will create suffering as one of its favourite ways of keeping itself alive. So the more important question is how does it happen? Observe then what kind of thoughts your mind is creating and how the body responds to the thoughts that your mind is creating with an emotion and so the two come together and suffering arises.

So if you are there as the witnessing presence when it happens that's the beginning of the end of it. So we know why it's the false sense of self gets stronger, you can have an entire victim identity in your head, that's the suffering. So the Buddha said it is desire which causes suffering, now desire of course implies future, you cannot desire something that's already here because it's already here, desire implies an absence, it also implies future because whatever you desire must come to you or you're hoping that it will come to you in the future.

So desire implies non-presence and having the focus of your attention on some future point and so that is one of the great causes of suffering to lose the present moment. So how to go beyond, whenever suffering arises you could notice in even small mild forms of suffering you will immediately know that somehow you lost the present moment, you lost yourself in the mind. So it can act like an alarm clock for you when you get upset or whatever arises, oh I must have lost the present moment and then bring your attention back to the present moment and when you fully accept the present moment you are aligned with the present moment and there is no suffering.

There may be a situation that you need to deal with but you don't bring the level, you don't impose on it the suffering and important thing is here, important aspect of that, to differentiate between the situation and your reaction to the situation. Now many people can't do that, for them the situation that arises and their reaction to the situation, they experience it as a single phenomenon. A simple example would be, you wake up in the morning, it's raining and cold and you look out of the window and you say, oh it's another dreadful day that thought arises and you feel an emotion that goes with that and of course that thought leads to another thought and the emotion leads to another corresponding emotion.

You don't realize here you have the rain and here you have your reaction but you experience it as a single phenomenon and this is only one example, there are many more examples, hundreds you could give. If you can separate by being aware enough, if you can separate a situation and your thoughts about it or your reaction to it which is thoughts and emotions, if you can separate them then you can see suddenly the situation is actually as it is. The rest is the suffering that I create about it in my mind.

That's an amazing realization, disentangling your reaction and your thoughts from the situation and suddenly you see the situations actually become quite simple and easy, they're neutral but you do not mix them up with reactivity and that disentanglement, as one could call it, is part of the spiritual path and is quite a revelation for people to suddenly discover that life can be much easier than they thought it would be or could be.

I would like to ask about trauma or post-trauma and it's a personal question, me and my family and I'm like about 10 years in the spiritual way and it really saved my life. I was really, I can say just one sentence, since my first child was born I was extremely in worries and anxieties. I'm also from Israel so the situation which was the past is holocaust and wars.

So the post-trauma is not like it's cold outside, it's really your children are suffering from anxieties, panic attacks sometimes, not all the time and it's the huge sadness like a cloud which follows me. So this way really helped me a lot. Still, there's a lot of sad hours, like many times I can't enjoy myself, like I think, oh I'm enjoying here and there's my children suffering and I really stop and try to discern the situation like I'm here at Omega and I have a wonderful time and really everything is wonderful this minute but the other, like this minute even, it's so combined together, the joy and the fear and the happiness and the sadness. So can I be really present with like post-trauma and these kind of things and there's other work that I do with the post-trauma.

Thank you.

One important practice of course is to be aware of what kind of thoughts arise in your mind at any moment so that you are not being dragged along by your thoughts but you are there as the presence and especially detect negative thoughts that cause you unhappiness. As more awareness arises and you realize there is a dimension in you that is deeper than thought and also deeper than whatever emotions arise or thoughts and emotions arise in that vast spaciousness of presence. So you can pick from there, you as the presence can become aware of what thoughts your mind is creating instead of being those thoughts and you need to be alert enough to observe the kind of thinking that happens in your mind and when a thought arises that causes you unhappiness notice that and realize that is not something that you want, that is something that you can do without and that is actually a dysfunctional thought. When you recognize a thought as dysfunctional then you are no longer invested in it and it tends to subside and perhaps a minute later another one comes and again you see it as it has no useful purpose in your life except to make you unhappy, to worry about your children.

Worry is a word that we use to describe thinking that makes us unhappy, usually unconscious thinking, you don't know that you are doing it, you are so in it that you become it. So worry is a way, the word worry describes thinking that is dysfunctional and makes you unhappy. Wonderful thing happens as more awareness arises, thinking still happens but you are beginning to be aware of how often the unhappiness that you feel is caused by thoughts that you think and then these thoughts once you recognize the process, these thoughts you can let go of them, it is a relinquishing, relinquish them because you realize they are futile, they have no purpose whatsoever and then gradually you reach a stage where thoughts lose the power to make you unhappy and that's a wonderful step to reach in spiritual evolution when the thoughts you are thinking, even occasionally still old patterns of negative thoughts can come in but they are immediately recognized and then they subside, your mind can no longer make you unhappy. It is not situations mostly that make you unhappy, it is your mind that makes you unhappy. Now in addition to that, this is the unhappiness that you create, that your mind creates in the present moment.

There is also an unhappiness that lives in you that goes back much further in time and you describe it as something that almost follows you or you carry it around with you and of course as you know I describe that as the pain body and that is also something that you need to be aware of and realize what it is so it cannot take over your mind, I talked about that yesterday, so that it cannot take over your mind, this emotional heaviness, it's not pleasant, it doesn't feel so good, so that it cannot take over your mind again and again and renew itself by making your mind think thoughts that correspond to its vibrational frequency which is unhappiness and suffering. And I also, I already wrote about it and talked about it, pain body has a personal aspect to it and pain body has also a collective aspect to it and very often they become a mixture of two, it is not always easy to see which part of it is your personal, derives from your personal life and which part of it derives from the collective energy field where you live, the cultural surroundings where you live or things that go back into your more distant past, you can trace it back if you want genetically, there's probably pain body somewhere in the DNA which scientists haven't found a pain body in the DNA yet but we are only at the beginning of understanding these things and probably something that is far beyond anything that means we can see on the physical realm that scientists don't know anything about yet. So there are certain places where there has been a lot of suffering and of course your country has had a lot of suffering especially the people who then came to your country have got an enormous amount of collective suffering that goes back generations and so that does not immediately dissolve and everybody who lives there partakes of that and some aspect of your personal suffering will be the collective suffering but the vital thing it is only you, only the individual can begin the process of dissolving that. Without the awareness, without the consciousness it does not dissolve, you could wait forever, it just reincarnates and is passed on from generation to generation.

So it takes one person to be aware enough to say as the expression goes, the bucket stops here, is the expression. So it is up to you and what the work that you do, the work that you do is vital, is absolutely vital not just for yourself because it affects many people that you don't even meet because you are all connected on a deeper level, all the humans are connected, all humans on the planet are connected, all humans in a particular energy field such a nation are also connected in some way so you dissolve not only your personal pain body by bringing awareness to it which implies acceptance when it does arise and that's a very interesting position to be in to feel this heaviness, this burden arise in you without any longer making it into a personal problem but simply say oh there it is again, I can feel it and let's see if I can accept that this is what I feel right now, can I say yes to this and usually you find well yes I can and there it is. Now an interesting shift in consciousness happens when you accept something completely whether it's an external phenomenon or an inner phenomenon.

When you accept something completely, I already mentioned it briefly the other day, a space arises around it, that is what acceptance is. Acceptance means you kind of step back from it so to speak and you become the space for it. At first there's very little space, there's still this enormous heaviness that you feel and when you accept it at first you feel just a little bit of space around it, this is part of the acceptance but as you continue to accept and make it your practice, gradually you find the space around it gets bigger and it, let's call it it, seems to begin to shrink as the space, whether it shrinks or not who knows but relative to the space it seems to shrink. So as you continue to practice acceptance, so instead of thinking I must get rid of this, why is this happening to me or even let it rise into your mind and control your thinking, no, be there, be the space for it and gradually the space becomes actually quite big as you continue to practice and then that which arises is no longer that big.

In other words you, because you essentially are spacious awareness, consciousness, not the form, you become bigger than it, well you always were but you didn't know it, you become bigger than it, much bigger and even if it never left you, but it will gradually become transmuted, but even if it never left you it wouldn't be so bad anymore because there is that vast spacious stillness around it and that's the process and there will be a time when you will be grateful for the very thing that you are talking about now because it is this very thing that pushes you to the spiritual dimension, without it you wouldn't go there.

It's not a question but I would like to, I think you are needed in Israel and I would like to invite you to come because I'm sure.

I think the time is coming close when I will go because I had a few invitations already so I hope that it will happen very soon.

[Speaker 3] (1:22:39 - 1:22:39)

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (1:22:56 - 1:23:12)

Hello Eckhart, before I start I'd like to just stand here for a little bit and be present and to soak all of the sin and to feel the connection that you are offering all of us in a way without the mind involved if you don't mind.

Wonderful, yes, thank you. We are not waiting for you.

[Speaker 2] (1:23:23 - 1:27:35)

I spent the last two mornings writing and trying to figure out what I wanted to ask you. And this morning I did a meditation and I realized the mind wanted to know. I have been on a journey for the last three years of intense immersion into the spiritual world and I have tasted everything you have spoken of.

And I realized that that's from where I wanted the question to come today. And the funny part is that the people, there are a few here that know me, probably smiled when you spoke this morning because some of the questions were going to be about dream and illusion. And this morning I was speaking about lucid dreaming and lucid living and I sat there and I smiled because I knew that I was speaking through you to me.

This feeling is incredible. And my question to you is I have experienced this and I know that while I am within this reality of dream of which I truly believe. On the way over here I said I am truly the creator, the dreamer of this dream and my ego came and said no, you are creating an illusion of creating an illusion and I said I have you.

Because there is any answer to am I creating the illusion of creating the illusion leads back to I am creating it in one shape or form. So to get next, while I am here I experience this dream and do all the things that you have so beautifully shared with us on how to realize truth. But to realize the truth that I have experienced through deep meditative states of disillusion, of the illusion and being okay with it never happening again but knowing of tasting it that it is a thirst that is unquenchable at this point.

And that's okay because I am enjoying drinking it. And I know that everything I have read, heard and said has been myself speaking to me to teach myself things that I already know and to be able to apply within this illusion. It brought me to the Manduka Upanishad and now I am reading A Course in Miracles which a dear friend of mine shared with me you are very familiar with.

And in there it talks about a gap. And for me that gap is the experience of the dissolution of the truth, the real truth at whatever level it is I am experiencing it here and to have nothing else besides that. And then the illusion and getting so close to the dissolution of the illusion that I can get within the illusion and that gap to jump over.

And when I read in there and I am on page 600 so I am about to start and I know that I have created this for me to experience it to know for sure because you can only know through experience, truly know. So my question to you, I am sorry you took a long guess. Yes, my question to you is.

I think we are finally voting. My question to you is, is your experience of what the teaching of A Course in Miracles is, will that be the gap to which I will be able to bridge to experience, to experience myself without it being a temporary or short lived experience within the illusion. The son coming back to the father.

[Speaker 1] (1:27:38 - 1:32:57)

The one thing that is still a little bit of an obstacle is of course your mind. And the attempt of your mind to understand more, to understand more about the process and so on. So the next step for you and to provide to many of you who still have this strong impulse to understand.

Let me quote since you talked about A Course in Miracles. Let me quote one sentence from there that applies to you particularly at this moment which is, sounds almost as a little insult to the ego. Your understanding is not a powerful contribution to the truth.

A Course in Miracles. And when you realize that, you relinquish your need to understand. The deepest spiritual teachings come from the place of relinquishment of understanding.

And then the deepest teachings, the teachings that come through you will deepen. It's only when they no longer come from your mind, eventually your mind can become an instrument for the deepest dimension. But the necessary step now is to not believe that in order to reach full awakening, whatever you want to call it, the end of the illusion, that further understanding is necessary because that will only draw you into more illusion.

Because any understanding on that level will be a particular perspective and no more than that. And will be a fragment, will never embrace the whole. So the next step is to relinquish looking to thought for anything.

And allow yourself, have the courage to drop down below thought and absolutely embrace inner stillness and the presence that is there. And from there, if anybody asks you, what do you know now? Nothing.

This is how this teaching happens. It seems that I know a lot, but I don't. It doesn't come from the level of conceptual knowing.

It can only start when you become comfortable with not knowing. And that's the depths. You have to go into the depths where you become comfortable with not knowing any answer or anything at all, even about yourself or what level you have reached.

Because all that is the form identity. And you become, you no longer know, as somebody, a questioner the other day said, I no longer know who I am, and I said, that's great, that's very good. Because you become comfortable with not knowing, you relinquish that, you realize that your understanding is not a powerful contribution to the truth, and then you become absolutely present and still.

And then, from there, life unfolds. There may come a moment then that you need to know something. Perhaps somebody comes and asks.

And then you may find an answer comes from the depths. And you didn't know that you knew that. It comes from a much deeper dimension.

But it can only come when you become comfortable with not knowing, and especially when knowing is not required, which is a lot of the time, when you're going about, walking from here to there, going shopping, knowing is not required, you can just be the presence most of the time. And then there are occasions when there's something that wants to be known, either because the situation arises, whatever it may be, and then an answer comes, if it's needed. Stop trying to work things out mentally.

And there's something much more powerful in you than that level. It can be a wonderful servant, but go into the stillness, I know you are able to do it, go into the stillness, become comfortable with not being anybody in particular, and really not knowing anything.

Thank you.

Thank you, sweet Eckhart. You've touched on something that arose in me to ask, and it's about the mind. And if you could talk some more on that.

As an entity. I read Power Now, I read that phrase, you are not your mind. I'm an engineer.

That stopped me for a little while. And I'm working on it. But you've talked about several entities, the pain body and the mind, and how they come together.

So if you could talk a little bit on the mind, help me. I don't want to say understand. And a second portion of something I'm working on is to give up the self.

But then there's karma, which has a self identity. So how do those play together?

Well, let's not make it too complicated. The mind basically is thoughts that arise. And you are familiar with thoughts that arise.

Are you able to, from time to time, sense a space between two thoughts when you're not thinking?

Yeah, that's karma.

And that's the important thing, that that arises more and more, so that spaciousness comes into your thinking. So your thinking is interspersed with spaciousness. That's really all that's needed.

Then what happens is, thinking can fulfill a very useful function in your life, as a wonderful tool to deal with the physical world, and to create things, even to manifest things in the physical realm. But until or unless your mind activity, which is thinking, is interspersed with presence, until or unless that happens, when it is not interspersed with spaces, so to speak, spaciousness, then it is an opaque entity, because there is then only a continuous stream of thinking and mind activity. And that continuous compulsion to think creates an illusory identity that consists of a bundle of thoughts to do with who you think you are, and your so-called problems, and your so-called life situation, and your so-called history, and your so-called future.

This is a bundle of thoughts. All kinds of thoughts go through the mind continuously in the absence of spaciousness. It's a continuous stream of self-talk, which sometimes splits itself into two.

It might say, I, or it might talk to itself as you. And the other one is the I, but it splits itself up, sometimes into three or four, and you can have an argument in your mind. And you're on the road to, of course, insanity then, but it happens a lot in the absence of spaciousness.

So without spaciousness, mind is all you have, or think you have, and your entire sense of self, identity, who you are, is derived from certain repetitive thoughts. Let's say there's a basket of certain repetitive thoughts in addition to the other thoughts, which also repetitive, but perhaps don't necessarily contribute to your sense of identity, but there's a basket or bundle of thoughts that recur, that tell you who you are, and they form your sense of identity. And that sense of identity is always a little bit fragile, it feels easily threatened by others, it's often on the defensive, and usually there is a sense in it of I'm not quite enough yet, or there's something not quite right with this situation, something is missing here in my life, or in this situation, it can never really acknowledge the present moment, because the moment you acknowledge the present moment, you have to become present, which is a different state of consciousness, when you suddenly go and you really look and perceive and listen, suddenly thinking subsides, and the spaciousness is there. And that's the present moment, therefore, is a wonderful portal, as I call it, into spaciousness, out of the egoic mind, which is an illusory sense of who you are.

But that's all you have in the absence of any spaciousness whatsoever. And so, that entity is quite dysfunctional, it is then when thinking actually creates more problems than it solves. And it loves to create problems, because the more problems it can create, the stronger its sense of false sense of identity is, it loves that, it doesn't know that it's not true love, it's an addiction, it's an addiction to problems.

And if ever you should be in a situation that is very peaceful, let's say you suddenly arrive on a tropical island, well, we're tropical today, but you arrive on some tropical

South Pacific island, and you're surrounded by, you're in paradise, well, this is almost paradise too, anyway it's paradise, but in conventional terms, and you would sit there, and for a while it would, oh, isn't this wonderful, but the egoic mind cannot tolerate peace for very long, it would very quickly come up with something that is a problem, either something that is here that you're making into a problem, or something that you're just thinking about, and suddenly it says, oh, it's not peaceful. The same in a relationship, the egoic mind finds it hard to have prolonged periods of peace in a relationship, we need to have some drama, because we don't have a relationship without the drama, except those relationships that have become so deadened, that both are completely closed, and then you just go about the routine business of your life every day, we don't have drama anymore, you watch TV every evening, you go to bed, and you probably haven't looked at your wife or your husband in years, you haven't really even looked at them, they've become part of the furniture, that can happen, can happen, but the important thing is, you understand now what the mind is in the absence of spaciousness, and how dysfunctional it becomes, and as spaciousness comes in, and this is your job, this is all really you need to understand about the mind, the important thing is, invite spaciousness into your mind in daily life by using those things that I described, a conscious breath, sensing the inner body, just paying attention to what is in the present moment, because that's all there ever is, so you pay more attention to it because it's life itself, it makes sense to honor it, to become friendly with it, because the present moment and life are one, there is no life anywhere else, only here and now, and once you understand that, then the dysfunction of the egoic mind begins to dissolve, in other words, the egoic mind begins to dissolve, so that's all really that one needs to know, and the process of awakening is an increase in spaciousness in your inner being, your consciousness, so that you are not, you are no longer identified with that false self that consists of thinking only, so that's all there is to it, it's not too difficult to understand, and it's not even difficult to practice, we just think it's difficult, or the mind will tell us it's difficult, to live, the real difficult thing is to live in the old consciousness, that makes life difficult, to live in this new consciousness is actually much easier, however, it is true that there is a momentum to the old consciousness, which is the egoic mind identified consciousness, the voice that never stops talking, there is an enormous momentum behind it, that is true, and it's been there for thousands of years, and the momentum will periodically, and this applies to most of you, will periodically still pull you in, and then you wake up again after a while, especially when you feel you're beginning to suffer again, and your mind is making you suffer, and you realize it's your mind that's making you suffer, and then you wake up again, and you choose, ah, you always realize the way out is present moment awareness, whatever portal you use into it, because present moment awareness is the spaciousness that arises, and gradually you become free, and that's the path.

Now, I've been reading a little of Joe Goldsmith, he talks about training the mind, Zen talks about training the mind, is that...

There are many ways of putting it, that's not a term that I use, but I believe what he really means is to practice what I'm here describing, he used those terms, maybe because he taught at a different time, in the 50s and early 60s, every time period has a certain way of approaching it, and vocabulary, so, but basically he talks about also being absolutely present and realizing that the essence of who you are is consciousness, there's even a book by him called Consciousness is Who I Am, but most of his books are transcripts of talks that were edited. Yes, so, that's all there is to it, spaciousness, invite spaciousness into your life, and that is the answer.

And that is my final message to every one of you.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (1:45:43 - 1:46:46)

So, thank you. Spaciousness is who you are, you don't need to try to become perfect as this form, the form gradually becomes less dense and less heavy, and then you can be compassionate towards it also, from that spaciousness, and that is the essence of our gathering here, so, don't be sad that the form of this gathering is coming to an end, as all forms dissolve very quickly, the essence of this gathering, that which made it joyful, is not the form of this gathering, it's something that is arising in you, and that's not going to leave you when you leave here, it can't, well it can be obscured, if you're not careful, but I think you will be careful and alert.

Thank you.

2012 to 2015 Eckhart Tolle TV Part 1

I was putting away some clothes this morning, hanging up some clothes and folding something. And we talked yesterday about somebody asking a question about repetitive things. You get up in the morning, you do your repetitive tasks every day.

And most of one's life consists of little tasks, there's rarely anything big. And if there is, it doesn't last long. What would be big?

A wedding, a funeral or in North America, Thanksgiving, Turkey dinner, Christmas, a promotion, or suddenly they write about you in people magazine. Hopefully something good. Or some big thing, you're going to talk or give a talk to a few hundred people.

But even a seemingly big thing consists of just one little thing at a time. Now, if you had the idea, this is just a little example, I'm coming back to the clothes in a little while. One could say that folding up clothes and hanging up shirts is an insignificant thing that one would only do in order to get somewhere else.

And in this case, if I thought, okay, I have to get this done because that's really big thing is waiting for me there. All these people are waiting for me to talk, give a big talk. Then in the meantime, all the little things leading up to it would be regarded as something that you have to get out of the way or pay little attention to because I have this big thing coming up.

And then this big thing coming up is a mind form, would become a mind form, big thing called big people wanting me to say something significant, but who knows if I can say something significant. That would have led to not only not paying much attention to the little things, but also most probably to a sense of anxiety because the mind has created a big thing. Now, if I had that, then it would not be enjoyable to do what I do because if every time I got anxious before a talk, that would be dreadful.

I'd rather not do it. So why is there no anxiety? Because I realized that even a so-called big talk consists of little things.

You approach it, you take, they pick me up in a buggy and then drive. Then I step out and then it's just one step at a time. And then I sit in a little room for a few minutes and look around and breathe.

And then I come here, it's still one little step at a time. And then I sit here and then one word comes out and then another word comes out. It's just, that too is just small.

It's only the mind that creates differences and says, I'm waiting for the next big thing. And for other people, a big thing could be the next vacation they look forward to. In the meantime, they're just trying to get to that future moment or the next, or getting married, looking for someone to get married, finding the right relationship.

That would be the big thing, wouldn't it? If I could find that, the partner, the ideal partner for me. And then you're looking towards that.

And in the meantime, little attention is paid to the intervening periods. But the strange thing is, most of your life is the intervening periods. 95%, no, 99% is something that happens while you wait for something else to happen.

And it's an unconscious way to live. So as I was folding up my clothes and I realized how extremely pleasurable the activity is. And not because of the simple movements of putting it away, but there's an underlying stillness with it that goes with that.

And so as you notice that, as you do little things, in other words, 90 something percent of your life, if you're aware not only of what you are doing, of course, yes, that's part of present moment awareness is to give attention to what you're doing so that the doing is not just a means to an end. The greatest fallacy and big dysfunction in people's lives is that almost all they're doing is a means to an end. That implies future, of course, is a means to an end.

And unconsciously, the end is regarded as more important than the means. But of course, the end, which is in the future, is always in the future. The moment it comes, it's the present moment.

But the mind pattern that has lodged itself firmly in people's minds is always that the next thing, and it's the thing that I really need to get to. So the moment the so-called future comes, it appears as the present moment. Something else, almost simultaneously or very quickly afterwards, something else appears looming up in the so-called future.

Oh, I need to get there. Of course, there are things that you need to achieve and go towards, and that involves time and so on. But if that absorbs almost 100% of your attention, or even if it absorbs 80% of your attention, that's you're out of balance.

Because if future absorbs 80% of your attention, you only have 20% of your attention left for the one thing that is ever real in your life, which is the present moment. So the present moment is just, okay. That's why many, many people don't actually, very rarely feel really comfortable with the present moment.

It's rare for people to regard the present moment even in a friendly way. Many people live continuously in some kind of almost confrontational or denying relationship with the present moment. And then their entire life is then not aligned with the present moment, which is life itself.

Because the only place where life can appear to you is in the present moment. There is nothing else ever. And so your life is not aligned.

Your life with a small L is not aligned with life, with a capital L. And that out of alignment creates an unhappy existence. And millions of people leading such an unhappy existence create an entire culture or civilization, every aspect of which reflects back to you that unhappy, basically unhappy state that all those millions are in.

So all the things that the culture produces, the civilization produces, the structures, the economic structures, political structures, educational, and so on, they will contain these elements of that state of consciousness that created them. So that's the dysfunctional element in politics, in economics, in educational system, and so on. Which all that, all those things that you can see are not working very well because they are products of a certain collective state of consciousness.

And the collective state of consciousness is made up of millions of individuals that produces the collective state of consciousness. So if you try to tackle exclusively the products of that collective consciousness in the form of the economic structures, the political educational system, and so on, then you're working only on one end of the spectrum and it's not the causal. You're working on effect.

And what you can do is limited. There are, yes, you can initiate changes, but what is the state of consciousness in the individuals and in you as you try to initiate changes? So the causal is the individual so that the individual no longer lives in a way that produces unhappiness and is dysfunctional.

So that the present moment is no longer reduced to a means to an end, but is given its fullest attention. And then I think you could, if you want to express it in quantitative terms, to say, reverse it, rather than 80% of your attention is where you need to get to and just 20% is here, reverse that. Have 20% of your attention on your goal and 80% of your attention on the doing now, whatever it is.

That means the quality of what you do becomes greatly enhanced, but without attention, quality diminishes. Now, quality, usually quality, people think in terms of something that you make and that can reflect quality, but quality really is a state of consciousness. And you can, there can be quality in a short interaction between two human beings that can be a high quality interaction and it can be a low quality interaction.

A high quality interaction is a true relationship at that moment with a flow of goodwill between two human beings, where the being of every person is fully acknowledged. And there is that field of attention and some stillness with it as the humans interact. That's a high quality interaction.

And then you have a low quality interaction, which is totally mind dominated. So you're basically just using, as you're using the present moment as a means to an end, whatever comes into the present moment will largely become a means to an end including human beings, so that you no longer recognize that the being of the human being, all you're aware of is the human. The human part is whatever function or role they have at this moment.

So it could be your, but selling, buying something from somebody or selling something to somebody or asking for information, or you're, there's a form element to every human. I call that the human. Human is who you are in form and being is the formless.

Now that, I'd love to come back to that because that is vitally important that there are those dimensions to you. There's the human dimension. This is the person with a name and a history and successes and failures, et cetera.

And then there is the unknown dimension to who you are, the being that far transcends the person, but is relative to which the person is less than the tip of an iceberg. Now, you know, an iceberg is usually what you see when it floats in the sea is 10% of the size because most of it is underwater. So the human part of you, the person with an history and so on is less, much less than the tip of the iceberg.

There's a vastness beyond, which is the being. So this is, I like it that the English language uses the word human being. And the reason why we use human being is the English language doesn't have a word that includes men and women.

So traditionally they used the word man and then they said, well, it includes women. Well, now they say it, but in the past they didn't even say it includes women. They just said, all men are, what about the women?

So English language doesn't have a word. The German language has, of course, the word Mensch, which means man or woman, which is a different meaning from the Yiddish Mensch, which is a man of, which is a human being who has a heartfelt, true presence, something that he's a real Mensch. But the German word for Mensch just means human being, but it's one word.

But luckily in this case, the English language doesn't have that. For our purposes right here, we are lucky that the English language doesn't force us to say human being, because there's something here that reflects the dual nature, one could almost say, of every human being. Ultimately it's not dual, but let's call it dual, form and formless.

So the present moment gives you access to the deeper dimension within yourself. And that starts with a little thing like, let's come back to folding the clothes. Why does that feel so wonderful and peaceful?

Because the task itself doesn't really require that much attention. You can do it. You don't have to work out mentally, how am I going to fold these pants or trousers?

Or how exactly am I going to hang this shirt up? No, you just do it. It's simple and it's easy.

So a lot of your attention is left to spare. Now, most people with all that attention to spare, they go into all kinds of mind stuff. So they're not fully conscious of what they're doing.

They're just elsewhere. So I could have been here already giving a talk in my head. What am I going to say?

Well, I fold. And I wonder what's going to happen tonight with that. And then, when is our flight back home?

Or did I let go of the menu? What's for lunch today? What did he say to me yesterday that wasn't very kind?

What was it? And I really should have replied. What should I have?

I should have said this and this and this. And so it's a kind of sleepwalking existence. So you're folding.

Okay. You're not here. So all that attention that was to spare is absorbed by unconscious thinking.

And that's normal, very normal. But it's a pity, because all that attention that is spare attention, you could have used to become aware of the fact that you are conscious. In fact, so you become very still and you realize that stillness is your consciousness.

And then as you fold, whatever it is you're doing, your clothes, you feel this undercurrent of still alert attention. And that is the meaning of what in Zen, we mentioned yesterday. Okay.

In Zen, the phrase is chopping wood, carrying water. If you don't understand that, you say, okay, what's such a big thing about chopping wood and carrying water? Why are they saying that?

Of course you have to chop wood and carry water. Everybody has to, well, at that time, when it arose, everybody had to chop wood and carry water. Why even talk about it?

Well, because it points to something deeper. Chopping wood and carrying water is the same as folding your clothes or whatever it is that you do. The possibility of doing those seemingly repetitive things, not seemingly repetitive things, but at the same time, be there fully with your attention.

Not all your attention is actually on the doing because you don't need all that just to do these simple things. You don't need to chop wood and say, or carry water and have all that. I must have all my attention on this bucket of water.

And this is why people spend years in Zen monasteries trying to get it, but don't quite get it. There was a, there's a story of a nun in a Zen monastery who was actually carrying a bucket of water and she was practicing chopping wood and carrying water. And at that moment she was carrying water and she was trying to really focus on the water.

So she didn't quite get it yet. And the story goes that the bucket was very old and suddenly the bottom fell out of the bucket and all the water fell out. And suddenly, as the story goes, she became enlightened.

After years of practice, this had to happen. And there was a deep, of course, symbolic meaning behind that. So the attention then is, some of your attention is on what you do.

Yes, you need some for that, but what do you do with your spare attention? You don't want to go where habitually everybody goes, which is drift off into completely unnecessary, very often unpleasant, very often negative emotion-producing thinking. Completely pointless.

You don't want that anymore. What you want is to be present, but that does not mean that all your attention is on the, yes, you give it your fullest attention, but whatever is needed, whatever attention is needed for it, the rest is available to you. And this is very hard to put into words.

And the only way you can understand what I'm saying now is by, at this very moment, experiencing it. As you're aware, for example, of this room, me sitting here, my voice, all those things, whatever surrounds us here, you don't need that much attention really to listen to me. You don't need to work out mentally what I'm actually talking about, because it's too simple.

You can't work it out in your mind. What's it? So there's just a lot of attention left as you sit here.

Oh, by the way, before I carry on, could we have the temperature a little lower? Because I see several people trying to keep cool and fanning themselves. Thanks.

Now, as you sit here, can you be aware of that field of attention in you, the consciousness in you that is perceiving this room and that is hearing the voice as visual perception, auditory perception? Can you sense that underlying all those perceptions, which don't require that much attention, there is something else. There is a depth in you, an alert stillness.

If you can become aware of that directly, and if I say become aware, it's not even like quite like that, because language causes, when you formulate a sentence, you have a subject and an object. So when you say, I become aware of that underlying consciousness that creates a separation and a duality that isn't really there, it's not that you become aware because you are the consciousness. So the consciousness becomes aware of itself.

It's the awakening of consciousness to itself, an amazing event of cosmic significance, which will not be reported on CNN or Australian television today, but it is very important. The most important things are not reported, by the way, on television. So you become aware of the fact that there is this depth in you that you are essentially that depth behind things, so to speak, and you can sense there's also a power there, not egoic power, but there is an aliveness and a presence there that is enormously powerful.

It's the only power there is really. And when you connect with that power, which is not egoic power, egoic power says I'm more powerful than that person. So it's not comparative at all.

Then you feel you are just an expression of that power, which is universal consciousness power. And the wonderful effect that has on your life is fear goes away, because if you are that power that you can sense, what is there to fear? Fear, which includes anxiety and all other manifestations of fear, arises only when you are not aware of who you truly are, when you're not aware of that power of which you are only an expression.

That is your essential you, the person, is only an expression of that. If you're not aware of it, if you cannot sense it in yourself, of course you're going to have fear in one form or another, because you're cut off. Well, you're not really cut off, but if you don't know that it's there, it's as if you were cut off.

If you don't know the analogy, I sometimes use, if you don't know you have $10 million in a Swiss bank account, then you don't, you only have the $2 in your pocket, because you don't know there's a numbered account in a Swiss bank with $100 million that's mine. You didn't know that. This is a poor analogy, because that power is $100 billion is totally insignificant.

So I'm just using just an analogy. If you're not aware of it, it's as if you didn't have it, you're cut off. This is probably what Jesus referred to when he said, you are like a vine that is cut off from the main branch.

So that's probably what he was pointing to. So all the little things, so that means most of your life, you can actually use them in this way so that they become a help. All those things that don't require that much of your attention, they become, use that spare attention to go within, and another way of putting it, become aware of that field of attention itself as the consciousness.

And this is why it was so pleasant when I put away the clothes this morning, just, ah, it wasn't the putting away, it was something deeper. And that's, you can practice that, practice it here and in the rest of your life with all the little things that make up most of your life. Whether you are a so-called VIP in the eyes of the world, a totally meaningless concept or not, it's still little things that makes even, and you become most effective when you give your attention to little things.

If there's something that absorbs more of your attention, then some attention will move more into mind and thinking, and you will have less than the being awareness, so to speak, goes a little bit into the background if you have to work something out or write something, but it's vital that it's still there. So there's, or you're engaged in a discussion that can very quickly pull you completely out of the being awareness. When you're getting your viewpoint, you need to defend your viewpoint now.

Now, there are two ways of defending your viewpoint. One is losing yourself in your viewpoint, and one is remaining in connection with the being awareness and then just put forward your viewpoint and why you have it, and then allow the other person to put forward their viewpoint and don't make them into an enemy, which is much easier now when you have not, you're no longer seeking your identity to derive your identity from your opinions and viewpoints. That's a dreadful state to be in because then you're surrounded by enemies or those who don't share your viewpoints or have opposite ones. They are awful.

These people are evil. The same thing happens with collective viewpoints. You have a collective belief system.

It's the same mechanism. Our belief is the only one. Obviously that's true.

All other beliefs are fallacy. They are lies spread by the devil. They're not our beliefs.

So these people are less than human who don't share our beliefs. It's insane, but normal. And what kind of a world does that mean?

What does that produce if millions of people are trapped in that dysfunctional belief system, egoic belief structures? And so when I talk about the little things, another Zen, I love these Zen people. There was a Zen master who was asked, what's the essence of Zen?

And now there are many different kinds of answers the masters give. None of them are answers that you would expect. And he said, Zen, or the disciple, of course, came, please explain to me again.

I've only been here for 10 years and I don't get it yet. What is it? I need a fuller explanation.

You haven't said enough. And what is Zen? And the master said, Zen is doing one thing at a time.

Is that it? Yeah. Okay, thank you.

I'm going to look for another master who gives me a better explanation. But if he had really listened, that's all you need to know, doing one thing at a time. Attention.

So attention on what you're doing and attention on attention. Then you're no longer an egoic doer. If you don't have attention on attention, the doing becomes egoic seeking.

And it's not empowered. It comes out of the conditioning of your mind. So attention on what you're doing and attention on attention.

Then you are in touch. Again, that's another aspect of what we called yesterday one foot in one dimension, the other foot in that dimension. And then you are both a human and a being, a full human being.

And until you are able to live like that, you're not a full human being yet, as Confucius already said. Over 2,000 years ago, and many humans are still not, evolution has not come to an end of humanity or anything. We are still evolving, obviously, which this is not the end product.

Where we are at, I don't know, not that advanced. So the most important thing to get here, get, get it, get. The most important thing to get here is to be able to be aware of yourself as consciousness, or attention on attention.

This means, oh, this is another Zen story that just came to me. The disciple said, I'm going to take my leave now because I'm going to look for another monaster and another master, because you actually haven't given me the full answer. Can you just write something down so that it's just something for me to remember that is important, so some explanation.

And the Zen master, he always give me paper, pen, he wrote. There, and he said, attention. Okay, is that all?

Yes, please add a little bit more, just another few more words. Okay, give to me. And then the disciple reads it, attention, attention.

What does that mean, he said, attention, attention. What does it mean? The master said, attention means attention.

So the disciple was seeking to pursue Zen through mental concepts. And the master was attempting to help him break through mental concepts, because the answer to all, to who you are, the answer to the secrets of the universe, which are all in you, of course, you are a microcosm of the macrocosm, as above, so below, as the ancient philosophers already said. The answer, all the secrets of the universe are not to be found through conceptual thinking.

What conceptual thinking can do is relatively little. And the human evolution, which has now reached a critical stage, does not mean that we are going to improve conceptual thinking. It's been helpful, it's done interesting things, it's created, of course, it has a downside, lots of huge problems, especially if it's not connected with wisdom, which comes from the being.

But you cannot further develop more refined conceptual thinking. We've come to the kind of end of the road of conceptual thinking, because what else is just putting words together in a different way. So we've tried so many ways of putting words together.

How many words, there are a limited number of letters in the alphabet, not to mention sounds, I talked about that already. There are a limited number of letters in the alphabet and a limited number of words that you can put together. Every book in the library, or nowadays on the computer, anything you read, any text you read, is words put together in a certain order.

And then you jumbled and you put, and then you have another text and you put a different one. But the number of words is limited. And they're just words.

So the answer is not in further development of conceptual thinking or other way of putting it. More information is more information because we live in the so-called information age. And you can get all the information on the computer that you, it is quite amazing.

Of course it is on that level that before you had to buy the Encyclopedia Britannica and it was quickly out of date. And now you can Google and Wikipedia and all those things. And it's all, whatever, all the human knowledge is there.

But human evolution does not consist in finding, getting more and more info. You don't evolve by getting more and more information. In fact, the more you stuff, get information, the more confused you get if you're not connected with being.

So much stuff, then the stuff accumulates in the head and all the devices, the more stuff comes into your mind. You absorb more and more stuff and you get completely scattered human. And attention deficit disorder, all these things, can't focus on anything for longer than 20 seconds.

Dreadful state to be in. Of course, yes, you know more than Jesus did 2,000 years ago. And of course you do on the level of information.

You know a hundred, 1,000 times more than the Buddha did, but that's not vital. So it's knowledge, but it's not knowing. So human evolution is not to completely abandon conceptual thinking.

No, to be able to use conceptual thinking without being trapped in conceptual thinking. So it's to transcend conceptual thinking. Transcend mean it doesn't, you don't remove it.

You go beyond it, but it's still there for you to use, but not for you to be used by. Because for many humans on the planet now, they are used by their mind. Their thinking is wild, just continuous input happening and going wild.

And one thought comes into their head, another thought comes, and then they link, the thinking's linked into the devices, internet and so on. Those, then they absorb the collective thoughts. They no longer know the difference between their personal and collective thoughts.

So our evolutionary challenge now is not to be drawn to go with the current of, which has enormous momentum, the current of conceptual thinking. And it's amplified by the devices that we have, computers for smartphones, pads, iPods, U-pads, and so on. And so this, it amplifies that, and it has an enormous momentum.

You can, you might have noticed the addictive nature of these devices because they are linked into that stream of thinking. So our challenge is not to be dragged along with this enormous current of thinking, conceptual thinking, which is egoic thinking, because the identity is lodged in the thinking. Because if we are dragged along, this, the development, the evolutionary development of thinking, which was a great thing, will turn out to be very destructive, and it would lead to our destruction if we were not able to step beyond conceptual thinking within, I cannot give you a timeframe, but it wouldn't take that long before things would collapse.

And first, people collapse internally, psychologically, and then the external structures collapse, and they will happen simultaneously. In other words, we would go mad. We're already mad in many ways.

But we would go even madder, more mad. And then things would collapse, and that would be, and then, of course, there's always, the universe is abundant and patient. Then, of course, there would be a new beginning.

Let's go back a few thousand years and start again. Why not? But it's a pity because it doesn't have to be like that.

There is a possibility that we can now step beyond to the next level of human evolution. And this is why we're here. And there is a lot of people, there is a longing in many, many humans, even those who have not yet come into contact with direct spiritual teaching, so-called spiritual teaching, there is a longing for something beyond.

And there's a dissatisfaction, of course, with the way people are now. So millions are very dissatisfied with life. They are missing out on life and the possibilities of life.

So we are stepping beyond. This is why I so often emphasize, learn to step out of thought. And it's not that hard because that is already in you.

It's covered the field of presence, aware presence is already there. Just notice that it's there. So now coming back to practicalities.

There's a phone call for you. That's okay. It's fine.

It's not a concert. So it doesn't matter that much. It happened at a concert I read the other day.

A violinist, I think, was playing. And of course they had asked people to switch off their phones. And just as he was playing, the telephone rang and then he stopped playing, got very angry.

And he looked at the person and asked her to leave. And she had to leave. That's not going to happen here.

So back to practicalities. It's the little things, walking, eating. Oh, eating is interesting.

Eating is also, there could be a lot of attention left over for being present as you eat. Now, most people eat unconsciously and they think about other things while they eat. And some people are actually pulled into more than their usual level of unconsciousness when they eat.

And occasionally I've observed people who the moment they put things into their mouth, they go completely unconscious. They might've been discussing philosophy before, great concepts. And then suddenly a food, a plate of food is there.

Okay, what was, okay, let's go back to Aristotle's concept of. So be conscious as you eat and feel, conscious means now as the two aspects, be conscious of what you're doing and be conscious of yourself doing it. Now yourself means not the historical self, not the person, but the underlying presence.

Sense, I call it your presence, although it's not yours, there's nothing is yours, but let's call it your presence, not the presence. Sense the fact that you are present and then do things. And when there's nothing to do, because you don't always, you don't have to do all the time, sometimes there's nothing to do and that's beautiful.

I love doing nothing, it's one of my favorite occupations. And when you do nothing, you'd simply, you're there, you contemplate. Now, if you're surrounded by nature, it's beautiful, you contemplate nature and as you contemplate nature, you also feel this underlying alert stillness.

And nature loves to be, as I said before, nature loves to be recognized in that way. It loves you for it. The birds love you, the trees love you.

That's my intuitive insight. I cannot prove it scientifically that the birds and trees love me. And how do you measure the love?

And, or if you are just even just being in a room to be with yourself quietly, just, there's a Chinese concept, wu wei, I'm not sure if I pronounced it correctly. It's translated as, it goes back to ancient Taoist spirituality. It means, this is considered one of the highest virtues and it's translated as sitting quietly, doing nothing.

Sitting quietly, doing nothing. It does not, there's more to it than meets the eye. It does not mean being semi-asleep.

What are you doing? I'm practicing sitting quietly, doing nothing. Let's have another beer.

No, it's a, it implies consciousness. So you're aware of being, so you could be in your room and be completely at ease with being there. And there's nothing that needs to be added to this moment.

There was a French philosopher, I don't remember the name though. I cannot, at this moment, access that file in my mind. And he said, all the problems of humanity can be reduced to a person's inability to sit quietly in a room.

All the problems of humanity can be reduced to this one thing. This is a human being's inability to sit quietly in a room. And again, there's a deeper implication than just sit quietly in the room, of being conscious of being.

I also mentioned on, when we started that evening, whenever it was, to be aware of, we talked today about doing small things, to be aware of the little things, particularly that surround you, not necessarily look for the kangaroos all the time, or the big lizards. I haven't seen any this time, but when we were here a few years ago, six years ago, I had an encounter with a, it was about this size, and it came very close to me. That was a very memorable encounter.

But I don't go around looking, where is he? I want to see him again. If he comes, he'll come.

But all the beauty that is in every little, even in a blade of grass, the beauty that's there. Sometimes you may want to focus on one little thing, one flower, one leaf, one tree, one bird. And then at other times, you can take in the totality of a particular view.

So you have a totality here of trees and plants and one or two houses, sky. So you can take in, but every, whether you focus on one thing or you focus on a larger landscape, larger section, visual section, sense yourself as the presence while you look. And that is how you become aware of the sacredness of nature.

And nobody could explain to you what sacredness means, but you will know when you sense it, you'll know it. It's all an expression of the one place. It's all an expression of the one, the underlying one life, one consciousness.

And you love whatever you see. You, there's a sense of no longer separateness. You love it.

And there's a joy that comes with seeing that, but the joy is there because you're in touch with yourself. So that is, again, an aspect of the balance between being and doing, to be aware of being while you do. And even when you're not doing something, not to lose consciousness.

The danger is when you do activities, let's say your normal work situation, a little bit more complex than putting away clothes, the danger is that you lose yourself in the activity. And so you're no longer rooted in being, you're out there. And then the sign, the clear sign, signal that you are out there and lost yourself in it is something arises like stress, anxiety, some negative reactivity, some belief that something out there is terribly important that needs to be done now and nothing else matters.

So you lose yourself in the doing. Now, if you sit quietly in your room, the danger is that you drift off to sleep. At first, you're there present, you're above thought.

And then before you know it, you can observe it. Many years ago, I spent some time occasionally in one Buddhist monasteries and you can observe the early morning meditation, especially when the monks sit 4.30, 5 o'clock. Sitting for an hour for the early morning meditation.

Now, I must have been not meditating all the time because occasionally I opened my eyes and looked at the monks. And so at first, they're always there. And then after 15, 20 minutes, some of them go.

And of course, in a Zen monastery, you have the head monk who may hit you if he sees you're drifting off. That works. So don't overdo the being, not doing anything.

So do it. Sometimes don't say, I'm not going to sit for one hour in this room and be. No, just take it as it comes.

There's a time for being and there's a time for doing. Now, many humans alive now are actually feel very uncomfortable with just being. They can't do it.

They can't do the being. Or when they're trying to be, they're trying to do the being, which is like trying to do the meditation. You can't do a meditation because the meditation is about being.

Doing a meditation implies you want to get somewhere. But true meditation is you are somewhere. You go into the vertical dimension.

So many humans are very uncomfortable with silence. Can't stand it. Need some noise.

Or they need continuous sensory or mental stimulation. Need something to get my mental teeth into. And when they don't have it, they were very restless.

The worst thing that you could do to them is put them in a room where they have no devices to produce noise. That would be hell for many humans these days. Sense deprivation of noise.

So not with you though, because all of you are comfortable with being and with the absence of noise. And you're actually appreciative of silence. It's precious and it's beautiful.

Now you wouldn't want to have it all the time. No, there needs to be a balance between noise and silence and between thinking and not thinking and doing and being. Some ancient cultures who are not yet lost in mental development, like our more advanced, so-called more advanced culture, some ancient cultures, the people have a natural ability to just be and they're not uncomfortable with being.

It was reported by when North America, the Europeans came and settled in North American continent. I remember reading one doctor or somebody observed people lining up somewhere in the States for a doctor's appointment. And some of them were Europeans who had come to America and some were native Americans.

And it took so long, the doctor was overburdened with work. And these people, there were not enough chairs. People had to line up a long way.

And whether it was a doctor or nurse who wrote about it, observed that all the Europeans became increasingly restless and then they got very angry. What's going on? I've been here now for three hours.

And all the native Americans were just completely happy with just standing there. So the person who wrote it was so amazed that he wrote about it. So there's a natural ability to drop in and go still.

Now, then the Westerners came. And then of course there was a clash between the old culture of the native Americans and the mind-dominated culture of the West. And then many of the native Americans became very confused and became very destructive for that culture.

Now, when we go there, we have been through the development of the intellectual faculty and the mental faculty, and we come out the other end and then we encounter that ability again and even more deeper. If you haven't lost something, don't appreciate it that much and you don't even know it that much. So for thousands of years, humans could actually drop into stillness, I'm sure, as these native Americans could.

They could drop into stillness quite easily. Perhaps they were fighting one moment and the next moment they go. In the same way that a duck does it, as I describe in the power of now, the ducks get into a fight.

And then two minutes later, flap their wings completely back into stillness. But they didn't even know, they just did it. They didn't know they did it.

But once when you lose something and then you regain it, there's always an element of depth to it that wasn't there before, because then you knowingly go into the stillness. It's not a natural thing anymore, it's a knowing thing. That is probably the meaning of the parable of the prodigal son in the New Testament that Jesus tells, which actually I believe goes back to pre-Jesus times.

The son who squanders his father's wealth and then he becomes poor. He goes abroad and then doesn't even remember who he is until finally the father sends messengers who find him and tell him who he is. Then he regains his place as the father's son and the father loves him more deeply now than before.

So that's how the story goes. He was lost and then he is found. So whenever you lose something and then you find it, there's a deeper appreciation.

For example, another ancient cult just lived in oneness with nature. But it was so natural, there was no question, there was nothing else except in oneness with nature. Nobody was not living in oneness with nature.

So they didn't know they lived in oneness with nature, they just did. So now we lost that connectedness with nature and then those of us who are awakening spiritually find it, regain it, and at a deeper level where they're acutely aware of the preciousness and the sacredness of nature. So when you transcend something and then you regain something that was lost a long time ago, there's always an added dimension to it.

That's, as I mentioned the other day, that's the fool whose mind is not highly developed. So-called fool is not a fool, but fool, then comes an intellectual development, he's no longer a fool. And then intellectual, mental development reaches a critical stage where it's no longer helpful.

And then transcend that, and then there's a sage. And the sage and the fool have many things in common. One of them being that they don't think that much anymore.

Well, the fool doesn't think that much yet, the sage doesn't think that much anymore. No superfluous thinking, and the thinking that happens doesn't cause any unhappiness anymore. You don't believe every thought that comes into your head.

What a relief. Just spending time with one thing can be very helpful. One flower, one plant, one tree, and become aware of its silent presence.

It just is, and how deeply rooted it is in being. Something that humans left thousands and thousands of years ago. They went into differentiation away from home.

And now we've refined it. Home, I wonder if it is a coincidence that the English word home sounds very much like, ohm, ohm. We do know that many European languages have roots in Sanskrit.

How that happens, nobody knows. That's why they're called Indo-European languages. And so Sanskrit is a very, of course a language no longer has been out of use for thousands of years, but how Sanskrit created words in the European languages, there must have been a deep connection a long time ago.

Ek, by the way, E-C-K means one in Sanskrit. That's lucky. Maybe one degree cooler might be a good thing.

Perhaps one and a half. We're all comfortable with being, which means you're not waiting for anything. In the old consciousness, the predominant state is one of waiting for the next thing.

And in the new consciousness, even when you're waiting somewhere, you're not really waiting. You're just being where you are. And you can use every opportunity when there is an external waiting.

You're waiting at the airline counter or a bus, at the traffic light, at the supermarket. To meet somebody, you have an appointment, somebody to arrive. So much waiting.

I read somewhere that the average person who learns, who starts driving at the age of 20 and drives a car every day throughout their lives, how they worked it out, I don't know. They spend, I believe it was four or five days of their life waiting at a red light. If you sum it, add it all up, it's four or five days of your life, you spend waiting at the red traffic light.

And most people are not happy. Unless it's just one instance of waiting and so many other occasions when you are waiting. And mostly people are not comfortable with waiting.

They get restless, uneasy, complain. They shouldn't be waiting. Well, maybe not, but you are waiting.

Things should be different if people only were more efficient and punctual and did their job properly and were aware of the time, but they're not. So whenever you're waiting, see if you can, your state of consciousness can be one of just being present, enjoy being where you are. Start with a supermarket.

And if you once, if you notice the shift from the restlessness and discontent and complaining, the anger, even irritation with having to wait at the supermarket and then say, okay, is that a pleasant state? Do I really want, am I, is it possible to be here in a different way? Do I choose to be in that unpleasant state?

Am I forced to be in that unpleasant state? Is somebody forcing me to be irritated? No, I'm just irritated.

I can't help it. Well, that's just a thought that may not be true. I can't help it.

And then you realize that you can help it and you simply drop your irritation and come into the present moment. Irritation is just a thought. This should not be happening.

Or I'd rather be out of here than in here, but you're in here. And this is just a tiny thing, of course, but as we mentioned before, life is made up of tiny things. And if one tiny irritation is followed by another tiny irritation somewhere else and followed by another tiny irritation somewhere else, and every tiny irritation leaves behind something and energy and that gradually it builds up and then you get more prone to irritation and not just irritation, then add up 100 little irritations and then you become a potentially angry person which was waiting for the next thing to be angry about.

Hopefully you can find something to be angry about. So you can just drop it. You drop it by realizing it's futile.

You're actually creating it yourself. It serves no purpose. There's an underlying assumption, and this is a childlike way of looking at the world or a childish way of looking at the world, an immature childish world that says, if I get really irritated, things are going to change.

In the same way, a child might think if I cry hard enough, something will happen. And of course, in the case of a child, often it is the case where the parents come running. But if you're an adult and you cry hard enough, not necessarily cry as such, but metaphorically speaking, unhappy, you believe the same thing is going to happen, but it's not.

In fact, people run away from you. They don't come and say, oh, you have that energy of get away from me. Yeah.

So if you're, it's practiced with those little things, so you can not only be free of irritation, you can also be actually use those opportunities to be present. Then you're welcome every time you're waiting. And if you don't succeed, that's okay occasionally, but you're welcome every time you go, oh.

Well, one very small anecdote happened to me recently. I was at a supermarket waiting and the cashier was the slowest that I've ever seen, perhaps in my entire life. And not only did she not know what she was doing, she also engaged every customer in a long conversation.

And even I, who is usually okay with these things, could feel a small amount of irritation creeping up and then immediately I let it out and it went away. And then another one came. But by the time I reached, finally reached her, the irritation fortunately was gone and I was present again.

And when she saw me, she said, oh, I've been waiting to meet you all my life. And I was so glad that the irritation wasn't there anymore. And she said also that she hadn't been there for very long, not worked there for a long time yet, so she's still learning.

And she had recently moved back to Canada from after spending 10 years in Maui, Hawaii, where time is not so important, of course. People have a loose relationship with time. It's island time.

So that was an interesting encounter. So it can happen. Irritation can still arise.

You don't catch, you don't catch it. So you have to be alert so that you catch it before it takes you over. And then realize you don't want it.

What for? And it's gone. Related to that is unhappiness.

A lot of so-called unhappiness is also a childish way of trying to change things by being as unhappy as you can about them. And the underlying unconscious or semi-conscious assumption is if I'm really unhappy, somebody, perhaps God, is going to do something about it, or I'm going to prove him wrong. I'm going to show him how dreadful it is.

And then finally, this is an unconscious assumption behind the unhappiness, because you believe, if you're habitually and frequently unhappy, you believe that it has a purpose. It's an underlying assumption. Perhaps you wouldn't verbalize it in that way, but you believe that it works for you.

Of course it doesn't, but things are going to change. But just need to be really unhappy so that God finally, even if you don't believe in God, this can still be the mechanism, the underlying unconscious assumption behind it, it's something that's going to happen. And of course the opposite is true because the more unhappy you are with something, the more you're stuck in the situation.

Whereas a friend of mine said, when a relationship ended, she said, and he walked off into the sunset, she said, God, this time you've gone too far. And now I'm going to show you how unhappy I can be. And she was a Buddhist.

They don't talk about God usually, but in this case, God was there. Okay, it's supposed to be questions, so I need to stop talking. And well, I will still be talking, but please, relevant questions are preferable to irrelevant questions.

An example of a irrelevant question would be, why do you always wear these boring clothes? Don't you have a fashion advisor? What did you have for breakfast this morning?

So, and relevant questions are questions to do with your presence practice, and how your presence practice is related to certain situations in your life, or how things are going for you here. And even if you don't have a question, but just have a contribution to say, talk about your state of consciousness here, that's all fine, that's all relevant, because those questions really, almost everybody will find them interesting, and the answers, almost everybody will find them helpful, because most human difficulties in this realm or dilemmas are universal, so you can always, most answers apply to almost everyone.

Firstly, thank you for coming back to Australia.

[Speaker 1] (1:33:13 - 1:33:13)

Thank you.

My question is to do with people's connection to guides or angelic forces, or people that have passed on, and I just would like to know your thoughts on that, and they don't need to be proven either. And I saw your lizard, too.

Sorry?

[Speaker 3] (1:33:42 - 1:33:44)

And I saw your lizard today, too.

You did?

[Speaker 3] (1:33:45 - 1:33:46)

Yes, and I took a photo for you.

Oh, send him to me.

[Speaker 3] (1:33:47 - 1:34:12)

Oh. Just before you answer, before you were talking about the lizard today, I arrived, and they were talking about the koalas in the trees, so I've been going, please, koala, come to me, come to me, and I think you just gotta get your vibration right. So I got the lizard, and a small snake.

Well, the koalas apparently are asleep most of the time, and occasionally they wake up and munch something, and then they go back to sleep. Also, they are not terribly interested in procreation, apparently.

I only want to see it.

I'm not interested in their private life.

[Speaker 1] (1:34:39 - 1:34:45)

Do you have any experience with guides, spirit guides?

[Speaker 3] (1:34:46 - 1:34:57)

No, it's in relation to my own business, actually, and I have a lot of people that come in and question that, so I just, yeah, it's just bringing the best possible truth.

Yes, yes. Well, some people seem to have contact with different entities that are not physically embodied, and there's no doubt that there are entities that are not physically embodied. There are lots of guides, those entities, who are also pretending to be somebody else, and the main criterion is what is the quality of the information that you are getting, rather than trying to figure out who they really are, and this also applies to so-called channeling, when this is still quite popular, I suppose, in some places more than in others.

In the States, there's a town called Sedona, which is a New Age kind of, in Arizona, a New Age town where it seems every other inhabitant channels some kind of spirit guide, so I have seen many channeled writings, and a large percentage of them seems not all that relevant to anything. Small percentage, yes, there's something there. A prominent example is the Course in Miracles, which is not for everybody, but it is a high-quality text, scripture, whatever you want to call it, and that was definitely channeled because the person who wrote it had an inner dictation, and she wrote down what she heard.

She did not fully understand what the dictation was saying, and she couldn't live it, the teaching, and yet the book was produced. You may have heard the saying, as far as deceased, people like that, some people think when people at the moment they are deceased, they know everything, but there's a saying that goes, just because they are dead doesn't mean they are smart. So whether you do channeling or you go to somebody who does channeling, who goes, the eyes usually close, and they go, this is so-and-so talking to you.

And whether or not it's genuine, listen to the quality of the teaching, if it is a teaching, the words, is it just, is it fictitious? Could it be information that you have to believe in, and they could say anything, and does it make any difference to your life whether or not what they say is right or wrong? Perhaps they're talking about life on those distant planets and what happens there.

It could be a science fiction novel, as far as you are concerned, but some people are so impressed by the fact that these are channeled, and they go, okay, and then what happens on those planets? Or they identify themselves as big entities from outer space. Who knows?

Ashtar, my name is Ashtar, commander of the galactic fleet. And I have come here to guide you. Okay, so what do you have to say?

And ultimately, if there is a true message that includes angels or angelic presences, it always boils down to find out who you truly are, find your connectedness with the source of all life. All true answers will come from within you. And whatever I say, verify it in your own experience.

Don't believe me. If you cannot verify it in your own experience, then it's not relevant. This is what the true guide would say.

So the great scriptures of the world, we're not, they're not the author. Some are anonymous. There's a difference between spirit guide and teaching that comes from a deep connectedness of the teacher with the source.

In that case, the teacher does not feel that it comes from an entity, but it comes from the source, not. And if an entity gives you information, where do they get that from? From the one consciousness.

So it may well be that this entity is more closer, more deeply connected to that one consciousness, but they are not separate consciousnesses. There's only one consciousness. And every guide, the one consciousness can only speak through any guide, no matter who it is, whether it's an angel or a deceased person or Ashtar, commander of the galactic fleet.

There's only one consciousness that can speak through them. And the essence of their message needs to be, if it is to be true, find out who you are in your essence and then begin to live from the essence of who you are. So use your own insight.

And I believe you will be able to tell whether what they say is helpful or not. At the moment, I can only think of causing miracles that's of a high quality. There was a time when there was Seth, the writings of Seth, the woman channeled an entity called Seth.

Some of that is interesting and has some helpful things. It doesn't necessarily go to the deepest level. Nevertheless, there's some useful information there, but not at the deepest level.

When I speak, I don't feel that some other entity speaks through me, but I do realize that this is not the person speaking. This is consciousness using the mind, this person's mind as a vehicle and consciousness speaks through me. In that sense, what I say is also channeled.

Also, I don't know what I'm going to say next and most of the time I don't know, even before I talk, what words are going to come out of my mouth. And that connectedness is important. That is the connectedness with the source, with being, with stillness, with presence, whatever you want to call it.

And that you have that available to you also, you might not give public talks or you might at some point, and some of you already do, but in whatever area you are active in, to be connected to the source will empower you in whatever area you are active in and will make your work much more helpful to others and more empowered. You become more inspired and you become an inspiration for others, even if you sell tickets, cinema tickets or whatever, it doesn't matter. Everything becomes transformed through your connectedness with source.

But to have that, the vital thing is to be able to access the space of no thought. And another way of calling that space of no thought, which I sometimes express by, because it's an inner space, thinking, thinking, thinking, you remember? And then you go, present.

That's the space of no thought. So in order to have the connectedness with source, you need to open up that space of no thought. Alertness, relaxed alertness.

It seems almost paradoxical, but they go together. Relaxed alertness. And you could also call that becoming comfortable with not knowing, because otherwise your mind always thinks it knows already.

So when you're trying to help somebody, somebody has a problem, often people will immediately try to say something helpful. They think hard. Okay, what can I say to this person who is suffering so much?

I need to say something helpful. And then you search in your mind. And usually it's not that great, and it's not well-received by the person, and it's not that helpful.

They might say, okay, thanks. But they feel it doesn't come from any deep place within yourself. Although your intentions are good.

You're trying hard to say something helpful. But to be really helpful, you need to become comfortable with not knowing anything. And that because that the space of no thought is, you don't know anything in the space of no thought, at least not conceptually.

The miracle is that in the space of no thought, you access the source of all knowledge, but it hasn't reached concepts yet. It's potential of all knowledge, the primary source. So many people are actually afraid of going there because they're afraid of not knowing.

And so they need to keep thinking. So if you can, somebody comes to you, let's assume you have practiced already beforehand, not knowing, for example, by not labeling compulsively everything around you, but actually be present with a tree, with a sky, with another person. And so you almost, another way of putting it, you almost disappear as a person in that state of no thought because in no thought, who are you?

You're simply a presence. You're not a particular person anymore. So it's a voluntary kind of disappearing act where you as the personal entity disappear.

And there's just a space of consciousness where you were before. This sometimes happens to people who suffer greatly. They suffer so much that their ego gets destroyed and eroded.

And what's left is just a presence. And this could happen to you, but probably won't need to happen because you're already voluntarily going there. So life doesn't need to push you into it.

So to become comfortable with not knowing, let's say a person comes to you, is in suffering again, or is close to death, or somebody has just died, or they have just lost everything, whatever it may be. Or of course, it could be pseudo-suffering too. It could just be a suffering totally created by their mind.

No actual situation, just totally mind created. In which case, I naturally always have a little smile on my face. I'm not laughing at them.

I'm just smiling because I realize it's a delusion. But let's assume it's real suffering. Somebody has just died or is approaching death or has an illness.

And then instead of figuring out what can I say, you just go still and you just listen. And it may be that no words come, but an energy, you contributed an energy to that situation. That is helpful.

That is healing. Some healing comes in healing. The deepest healing really comes in that way too.

When you access that, it's not always words that come out of that space. Sometimes a wordless emanation comes out of that space, which some people might call healing. And healing is not necessarily healing of a physical symptom.

There's a deeper level of healing that helps that other person to connect with the deepest source within themselves. And that's really the true, the ultimate and true healing. So when I was many years ago, I was many, many years ago, I was beginning to work with people who came to me for advice and counseling and so on.

And I was always naturally becoming very still. So that's, and it all came out of that. Never knew the answer beforehand.

Just get still and listen. Oh. And I may have told the story before, for a while I thought I was a healer because that was early on after my shift in consciousness when I didn't understand much.

So I was sitting with this woman who had been a Catholic nun for 15 years and then left the order because she hadn't found God yet. And she came to me and I was sitting in that state of not knowing, but being comfortable with not knowing, not being uncomfortable with not knowing because that's not pleasant and then it gets blocked immediately. And she said she could feel the energy suddenly that was flowing and she'd, oh, you are doing healing.

You're a healer. I said, oh, that's what I am. And I thought, oh, so that's what this energy is.

And then for a couple of years, the word must have spread. People called me a healer. And some people came for physical healing and some people had a pain there and the foot was hurting and can you heal my foot?

Well, I don't know. And so I, and then I realized after two years, most people who then came were just interested in getting rid of certain symptoms. They were not interested in a deeper healing.

So I made an announcement says, I am not a healer. So the main thing is what any spirit guide or angelic presence, the most essential information that he, she, it can give you is to get in touch with the source yourself. Because if they are giving, if they are highly evolved beings, they are in touch with the source.

And all their main work then must be to help you to evolve also and be in touch with the source. So these, if there are any presences, angelic or otherwise, they are not independent consciousnesses. They are evolved expressions of the one consciousness.

And whether or not they are evolved expressions or not so involved expression of the one consciousness, you will be able to tell, I believe, when you listen to what they have to say.

Thank you. Thank you so much. Thanks.

Okay, I was born in Somalia and spent first 18 years of my life there. Wonderful country from memory. Really happy, poor, but extremely happy.

Unfortunately, the war happened and my family was scattered around the world. 14 kids, one mom and dad. I ended up in Australia.

I was the lucky one. And 15 years later, I was able to support my family. So I brought one brother who ended up in England as a refugee to Australia.

And beautiful man. He's finished his master's. He's got a wonderful career in Australia and we're happy.

When he finished, I brought the second one and unfortunately, it didn't work out. He, that brother, ended up from Somalia to Syria in refugee camp and had a horrible life. Ended up in Denmark and I got him out of Denmark.

He's a Danish citizen and a good, happy life, but absolutely broke and sold. And got into trouble in university and started fighting. Ended up getting him out of police stations.

And the third time, the university kicked him out. And you know in Australia, to be kicked out of university as an international student, it's almost impossible. Because it's a full paying fee and so that happened and I sent him back to Denmark.

Now I'm ready to help the other members of the family. And two of my closest sisters when we were growing up and I miss them. They don't wanna talk to me because I have different values and beliefs to them and it breaks my heart.

But at the same time, I don't wanna give up my life. I've built here. My friends, my beautiful husband, my son.

And I'm stuck with two lives and I really miss them. I wanted to ask you, what would you do if you were in my position?

So your sisters won't talk to you?

That's right.

[Speaker 1] (1:55:13 - 1:55:14)

They live in?

Birmingham, in England.

[Speaker 1] (1:55:17 - 1:55:22)

Okay. And why is it they don't want to talk to you?

When we were living in Somalia, we were beautiful life, beautiful culture, respectful Muslim. When I came here, I've decided to follow meditation, still keep that peacefulness inside me. And they've decided to take up wearing the veil.

We didn't do that when we were in Somalia. I don't know what happened. But they now feel that I'm not part of them unless I give up my career, which I worked very hard and have the same beliefs as them.

I'm not part of them.

It sometimes happens that members of the same family evolve at very different rates. So a sense of separation can come if one member of the family evolves spiritually much more rapidly than another. And that is something that you cannot do anything about.

You need to accept that your sisters, their viewpoints and their judgments of you arise because of the way in which they have been conditioned by their culture. So this is part of the mental conditioning. There's nothing really personal about it.

They have been conditioned in a certain way. To some extent, you have gone beyond your conditioning because anybody who begins to awaken spiritually goes beyond also simultaneously, begins to go beyond their cultural conditioning. And that applies whether you're from Somalia, whether you're from Australia or whether you're in the United States or anywhere.

If you are not awakening spiritually, you are your behavior, your viewpoints, your opinions, the way in which you judge other people, the way in which you judge other cultures, all that is conditioned by the content of your mind, the culture and family and so on that you grew up in. So you are basically a conditioned entity. And your opinions and viewpoints are not really yours.

They are the product of your conditioning. And so that's the case with your sisters. So sometimes the same thing applies to close friends.

I've had many similar questions of people who had a close friendship with someone. And sometimes it's the case with a husband and wife. Often I've had many, in many cases, one of them, either she or he began to evolve and awaken spiritually.

And a gap suddenly arose between the one that was still totally conditioned and the one that was beginning to awaken spiritually. In some cases, they can still live together. It depends on the nature and degree of the person who is not yet awakening spiritually.

Depends that the ways in which this non-awakened state manifests differs from person to person. Some you can live with, you can awaken, and you know your partner is not, and you can totally surrender to that fact that your partner is not awakening yet. In other cases, it will create a hostility, a growing hostility in your partner.

The ego objects to the other beings becoming so different and changing, they don't understand you anymore. And so, and then a separation happens. With husband and wife, then it sometimes happens that they do their different ways.

In the case of a family member, there's a link that remains. So you cannot just say, we go our different ways. There's always a certain bond between you and your family members.

But the first thing is you ask me what I would do. What I would do is, first of all, understand why. And this is what I've just been talking about.

If you understand, then already it is a helpful thing. If you don't understand why is this happening, but if you understand that these people act out of their, your sisters act out of their conditioning, you have begun, already are in the process of transcending your conditioning. Whether or not they will also awaken or begin to awaken spiritually, we don't know.

So in the meantime, all you can do, or all I could, if I were you, all I could do was continue to recognize the limitation in them. It is, they are conditioned in their responses. Recognize that that is what happens, not to blame them for it, not to feel guilty because you make them angry, because you don't.

It's their conditioning that makes them angry. So you don't feel guilty because you are different from them. I wouldn't, I'm talking now, but I would not feel guilty.

I would simply recognize compassionately what it is that makes them say and do the things they say and do towards you. And you cannot even explain to them. You can't, you, it would be futile to say to them, I know why you're saying that to me because you're totally conditioned.

What? They wouldn't know what you're talking about because they know nothing outside of their conditioning. So compassion arises, compassion and acceptance of a person's limitations.

You can still hold them in your heart and realize there is an essence in them that is lovable and you can continue to be connected to that essence of who they are. If they refuse to talk to you, then you have to accept and surrender that. You can hold them in your meditation.

You can even sometimes look at their photo, look beyond the surface appearance of who they are. And the photo can be a little help to establish the inner connection. Then you don't need the photo anymore to establish the inner connection, feel the inner connection with their innermost selves.

And even if they don't talk to you, that can still be there. And then you send, in the conventional new age language, you send loving energy to them. There's some truth in that.

So there's a loving, still a loving connection even though you don't talk. So recognition to summarize, recognition of why this is happening, accepting your family member's limitations and not judging them. They judge you, of course, because their judgments of you are part of their conditioning, but you don't need to judge them.

You simply see that this is a limitation of their state of consciousness at this present time. They will awaken too. In time, eventually, this lifetime or the next.

So then you can begin to feel peaceful about it so that it does not become a source of suffering, continuous source of suffering at the back of your mind. So if you can be in a loving relationship, even though you might not meet them much anymore or at all, you can stay in a state of love towards them, compassionately accept their limitations, and then see what happens. Sometimes in that way, a healing does happen.

It may be that at some point there's a crack in their conditioning and they're suddenly able to accept you, who you are for who you are now, but your happiness or fulfillment does not depend on any other human's acceptance of who you are. That would be a deluded thought. If you think you can only be happy if these people accept and understand you.

Some people have that with their parents. So they say, my dad, my father, they don't understand me at all. It's terrible, terrible.

I'm trying to explain what I add. Of course they cannot understand you. It's beyond their comprehension if you have awakened spiritually and they haven't.

So compassionately accept that they cannot understand you instead of trying to explain yourself to them, just be there in a loving way with them when you meet for Christmas or Thanksgiving and you hear all the judgments coming at you from them. You should have, why don't you look where it's taken you, look at your sister, she married a millionaire and you are into that weird kind of meditation stuff that's not getting you anywhere. Whatever judgments come, say, okay, I know that this is what you think and feel and I think and feel differently, that's all.

So you don't need to justify accepting people's limitations and suddenly realizing whether or not your father, your mother, your sister, your brother, or anybody else close to you accepts you for who you are is really not, you become free of the need to be accepted, but you can nevertheless have a deeper connection. Keep that deeper connection and connectedness with them. That's what I would do.

There's quite a, there's been some sports people who were apparently greatly helped by this teaching and more recently, oh, I forgot to contact her. I was going to contact her. She got in the Winter Olympics, she got the gold medal in, what was it?

Snowboarding. Snowboarding, it has another name. It's a new discipline in the Winter Olympics.

The half, what? Half pipe? I don't know, but anyway, it's a kind of snowboarding.

They go up on this thing and they go into the air and turn and go around and then finally they land. It's an amazing thing. And she was an American young woman and she got the gold medal.

And then she said what helped her greatly was the power of now reading that and she traveled with that book. And that's always wonderful to see. And there've been other cases where sports people reported being helped greatly by simply becoming present in what they do.

That's no matter what you do, it will help greatly to do it better or to stop doing it. So presence will improve what you do or will take you away from what you're doing. You can't know that beforehand.

As for let's see what happens to the tobacco company employees. There's a movie about, there was a book written many years ago by Dan Millman called Peaceful Warrior. And Dan Millman was also, he was a gymnast and I believe he also was at the Olympics years ago.

And he wrote a book about learning to be more present and then performing better and changing his life at the same time. It's partly fact and it's a mixture of fact and fiction. So there is a fictitious character but it's all based on his life.

And they made a movie out of that. It's also called Peaceful Warrior, which unfortunately was not successful. The critics didn't like it, but I did.

And if you get a chance to see it, I would recommend that you watch it. Some, because there are moments in that movie where they really get the viewer to identify with the protagonist who is learning to find what the meaning of presence. So there were wonderful instances in the movie when the protagonist suddenly becomes present and how it is done with a camera.

It's beautiful. So if you can watch it, Peaceful Warrior. Welcome to another live meditation.

If you think that we are doing something here, doing a meditation that can become a big obstacle to actually entering the state of meditation, the notion that you're doing something. One minute you're doing, you're answering the emails and then you are putting the dishes away and then you're doing the meditation. And every doing has a certain aim.

You're doing in order to get it done, get it over with, achieve the goal. So in doing involves time. Can't do anything without time.

And the ordinary state of consciousness is always involved in time, inseparable from time. There's a deeper dimension within you that could be called timeless. But as long as you're doing something to get there, that becomes a paradox.

You can't use time to get to the timeless because you don't need to get to the timeless. It's already there in you. You just need to notice that it's there.

So that removes all sense of doing. All you need to do, so to speak, it's not a doing. It's a notice right now that there's a deeper dimension in you, deeper than the physical, that which you perceive through your senses, deeper than thinking, deeper than the emotions, emotional layers.

Where is it? I still can't feel it. Somebody thinks.

Become aware that you are. Become aware of the beingness of yourself. Aware of your own presence.

Thinking doesn't help you here. It actually prevents you from dropping down into the core of your being. So you can allow yourself to let go of thinking or trying to figure something out.

Become aware that right now you are conscious. Right now you are aware. And in the gap between two thoughts, there's a space or a spaciousness.

And in that spaciousness, in that space, you are aware, you are conscious without any particular content. You are conscious of consciousness, that which is prior to all content, but not separate from, deeper than all content, but not separate from all the content of your mind. Whatever you are aware of, sense perceptions, thinking, emotions, all these things you are aware of, in many cases, not just aware of, identified with, because you derive your sense of self from those things.

I have situations which you are aware of through your sense perceptions, plus mental interpretations, plus emotional reflections. That makes up the content of your consciousness. And that makes up what you call your life.

That's my life. And you try to figure out your life by thinking about your life. There is a place for that too, yes.

If that's all there is to your life, however, then you are, to use one of my favorite analogies, you are like a wave or ripple on the surface of the ocean who does not realize that it is not only a wave or ripple on the surface of the ocean, being surrounded by other waves or ripples, but this wave or ripple does not realize that it is also, and more fundamentally, the entire ocean. And that this wave or ripple is only temporarily a manifestation of the entire ocean. Hmm.

Somebody once said, I believe it was Alan Watts, said something like, you are something that the universe is doing in the same way that the wave is something that the ocean is doing. So you are something that the universe is doing or being. And if you can realize that rather than just thinking, oh, that's an interesting idea.

Let me think about that. I'm something that the universe is doing in the same way that the wave is something that the ocean is doing. You can start thinking about it.

That's one way you might come up with a few more related ideas. Or the mind might say, well, this may be true or may not be true. Or the mind might say, that doesn't make sense to me.

Or I have no idea what he's talking about. Now, like with all statements that point to a spiritual dimension, they are just pointers. And they're to be used as pointers, signposts.

So if you can get even just a little taste or a glimpse experientially of what this means, and perhaps you can do it by visualizing just yourself as a wave or ripple on the surface of the universe, the surface of the ocean, just to keep the analogy. And allow yourself to drop into the core of your being in the space between two thoughts and realize your essential beingness. I am no particular content as such, but you feel connected to something limitless, timeless, vast, deep.

You're not only connected with it, you are an extension of it, an expression of it, inseparable from it. You have to have the courage in order to experience that, to realize that, the courage to enter the realm of not knowing anything and of not being anybody in particular. That's the most beautiful experience, if you want to call it that.

It's deeper than experience. The most beautiful realization, the most liberating realization, that you are not just this little person, which is just like a brief, momentary spark that appears and then disappears. Oh, that was you, that was me.

So every human being, a brief, momentary spark of light is born and dies, so to speak, goes. Oh, that was it. Yes.

And all over the planet, new sparks are born of consciousness, beings, human beings. Right now, at this very moment, new sparks are rising, right now. They're all going, choop, choop, choop, choop, choop, choop.

And right now, other sparks are extinguished, choop, choop, choop, choop, choop, choop. And each little spark has a name attached to it. That gives the impression that there's something permanent there.

Well, that spark originates in the central fire, the central consciousness. Each spark is a manifestation of that and returns there. So the most liberating thing is for you to become aware that there's more to you than the person, that you are connected with that depth within yourself.

And that is the universe, not just the sense-perceived universe and galaxies and so on, but more essentially something deeper that underlies the sense-perceived universe. But as I said, you need to have the courage to step into the unknown, become comfortable with not knowing anything. Don't worry, all the things that you know, when you need them, you can still use.

But to know who you are, essentially, you need to become comfortable with not knowing anything, become comfortable with not knowing who you are conceptually, become comfortable with being ignorant, so to speak. And then something that cannot be known emerges. You can't know it because it's the source of all knowledge, where all knowing and all knowledge originates.

That's you cannot know it, but it knows itself through you. With that realization, one could say that not only you become deeper, you deepen. The universe deepens.

The universe has two movements. It expands in two directions. That's one way of putting it.

There are other ways of putting it. It expands externally into multiplicity and greater complexity and differentiation. If you look at life on the planet, it's involved in an explosive expansion from mineral life to vegetable life, to animal life, to human life, all different levels of consciousness, becoming more and more differentiated, more complex, more interesting.

Life on the planet here is certainly more interesting than it was a billion years ago. So it expands into form, the creation of form. The universe delights in creating forms, life forms, experiences, even drama.

Otherwise there wouldn't be drama. The universe also wants to expand, so to speak, internally. So there's a corresponding movement into yourself.

There's more depths to you. That's the inner expansion, one could say, although you might choose to use a completely different word for that. There's the outer.

And then there's the inner deepening of the universe. So if you have this courage to go into the unknown by relinquishing thought when it's not needed, taking thought up again, of course, when you want it, it's a wonderful, wonderful tool the universe created. But connect with the depths within yourself, the primordial, undifferentiated, unconditioned, timeless consciousness that underlies the entire universe.

And then you can begin to realize the truth of this statement. The universe, I am something that the universe is doing. The unconditioned intelligence can then act through you.

And you become co-creator. Then being and doing come together in your life, which means you no longer compulsively do things, compulsively go into doing and doing and doing. Part of that is thinking, thinking, thinking, an addiction, must think, think, think.

You no longer compulsively do. There's the ability to just be in that timeless moment, to appreciate this moment, the depths of it, the aliveness of it, within and without, but not having separate compartments anymore in your life of this is my spiritual time, don't disturb me, but to bring the two together. So when you're engaged in doing and thinking, the unconditioned consciousness can operate through you.

It can do and inspire you, inspire your thinking, your activities, empower, inspire, whatever it is that you do. So ultimately, you don't have a separate existence. It's an illusion.

You're an expression of the totality of the one consciousness, every human, every life form, everything is an expression of the one underlying consciousness. That's your essential identity. So by inviting that spaciousness, inner spaciousness, the gap between two thoughts into your life, dropping into that spaciousness, the core of who you are, the beingness of you, you realize that you are the entire universe, not the multiplicity of it, you're not that which underlies the multiplicity of it.

And that's called self-realization. So the spiritual awakening is really that, it's a liberation from a limited, ultimately false sense of self, of who you are. And there's such freedom in that, suddenly you're, oh, many desires, all the things that occupy your mind, the heaviness of your life, it's all to do with the limited sense of who you are.

So that's, of course, presence is another word for that state of realization. You realize that you are the presence, the consciousness, the conscious presence. And there's a joy in that realization, a peace, but an alive peace, not a dead, deadened, deadening peace, an alive peace.

So the real happiness, if you even want to use that word, originates within you. This comes from the realization of who you are. And it's not caused by external circumstances.

And that's why often people have realized it when their life circumstances were very limiting or unpleasant, people have realized it in a prison cell, in a hospital bed, in the face of great loss, disaster, imminent death, and suddenly they dropped into the core of their being. One expression for that is the ego died. The false sense of self died.

It became too painful to sustain the false sense of self. It could not sustain itself any longer. That's a possibility of grace to use a traditional word.

That's the grace that's hiding behind every disaster, the possibility of it. And the acceleration comes when a human being voluntarily disidentifies from who they are on the level of form and realizes who they are in the depths of your being. And that realization is not conceptual.

You don't know anything, but you can, we don't even have a word to describe it. We can, you can sense it, be it. So when you voluntarily enter that dimension of depth within yourself, that's a great acceleration in consciousness.

Otherwise, life would eventually force you to go there through disaster, suffering, and so on, loss. And this is possible for humans now because humanity as a whole has already gone through enormous suffering over many millennia, but many still need to go that way. They're not ready to even hear this.

These words would be still meaningless to many humans on the planet, and that's okay. So for the rest of your incarnation here, the practice is to bring, yes, to drop into being and when you do, to bring the being dimension into the doing so that there's no loss of connectedness with being. So there's the pieces in the background and then you act.

The doing becomes infused with a sense of being, which means there's no stress in the doing anymore, but there can be enormous effectiveness when you're connected with a deeper dimension within yourself because it then acts through you, not the little me that needs this and that. It acts through you. Some people connected with it almost accidentally and they became, they are regarded as the great artists, composers, the scientists, those who had the deep, sudden insights.

They almost accidentally or accidentally connected with that dimension and it, all those things that could be considered sublime creations of human beings are humans who momentarily were able to drop into that unconditioned consciousness and it then expressed itself through the human mind and gave birth to enormous creativity. So the expression that I use, getting lost in doing, that's still the destiny of many humans. They are lost in their minds, identified with every thought.

And then of course that gives rise to activities and then they're lost in the activities. What's next? No, this, this, think.

Totally uncentered, disconnected. Every little thing has the power to upset them. Oh no, not this.

What's going to happen next? Oh no. So the practice is being and doing as one.

And sometimes being predominates and then you, it's not, you don't need to do continuously. Sometimes you just love being out in nature or sitting in your room or traveling while you're traveling. Feel the beingness of yourself and contemplate the world around you.

And it's amazing. And then doing can predominate. Suddenly you need to really focus on that, but there can still be a connectedness with the stillness in the background, the deeper dimension.

That's the main, that's the one thing that matters absolutely to have that. Everything is maybe important, but it's all relatively important. And as Jesus said to this woman who was very concerned with doing, with activities, and her sister, I believe, Mary, was only concerned with being.

She was listening to the spiritual teacher. And Martha, the active, the doing one, said to Mary, come on, you've got so many things to do. Come on, we need to get on with it.

We've got food to prepare. We've got to do this and that. And Jesus said, well, Mary has chosen the one thing that really, that matters.

He doesn't say, he didn't say you shouldn't be doing anything anymore. Just wanted to point to what the very foundation for everything is, the being dimension, to be aware of that, because that's why that is the one thing that matters. And everything in your life may be important, as I said before, whether you are wealthy or poor, or whether you have a good relationship or bad relationships, whether you're healthy or not healthy, or where you live, whether you live in a home as in a tent, or live in a mansion, these things are relatively important, but not absolutely important.

There's only one thing that is of absolute importance.

And this is it. Thanks.

Welcome to our retreat. You made it. You're here despite everything.

And if you're here, and if you're still here a week from now, that means that you are already undergoing a transformation of consciousness. I'm saying, if you're still here a week from now, because it's possible that one or two people could be here for ego reasons, but they wouldn't be able to stand it, not for a whole week. It would become unbearable.

Wouldn't be able to stand the stillness and most of all, wouldn't be able to stand yourself because whoever is still under the control of ego is running always somewhere else. Is not at ease with who they are, where they are and what is. Never at ease.

And so they won't be at ease here either. If the pattern inside your head is to be ill at ease, how could you be at ease here? And very quickly you would find reasons to justify to yourself and others your state of not being at ease.

If you're looking for excuses for not being at ease in the now, the only place there is, you can always find them wherever you go. You could say, I didn't come here for bad weather. Not knowing that by attaching that label, that thought, you've taken the weather out of the totality because within the totality, the so-called bad weather, which isn't bad at all, is inseparable from the beauty that surrounds you here.

It feeds it. But mind takes it out of the totality and takes it out and separates one little fragment and calls it something, unaware that it is part of the totality. And weather is only a tiny example of that.

You take anything that happens to you, any condition that arises is part of the totality. And when you judge it, call it this or that, and even call it good. Even good weather.

Why call it anything? It is as it is. If you call it good, then you must have bad weather because you can't have good weather without bad weather because otherwise the word good doesn't make sense anymore.

And I'm only taking weather as a small example. So these are conditions that arise continuously. If you want to use them, if the mind, the egoic mind, wants to use them for its own purposes, which is to be right, to make something or someone wrong, to enhance your sense of self through resisting and complaining, you can always find excuses, reasons, but they are never the true reasons.

There's a beautiful lesson in the Course in Miracles that says, I'm never upset for the reason I think. I am never upset for the reason I think. So that, of course, means to be upset is part of the structure of the egoic mind.

You're not in touch with the depth of who you are the essence of your being. You're not in touch with the depth of the present moment, which is inseparable from the depth of who you are. And that's why you're upset.

And then little things happen and you go, then that permanent state of being upset comes out. It's just waiting to say, ah, that's why I'm upset. Now I know why I'm so unhappy.

There's a bug in my bed. So these are, now I'm not saying the fact that you are already, you're here because you are undergoing a transformation of consciousness does not necessarily mean that you are entirely free, entirely free yet of those mind structures, egoic structures, because your ability to be rooted within the depths of being, which is the depths of yourself and the depths of the present moment, inseparable, your ability to be, to dwell within yourself, to rest within your very being, that's the only thing that could redeem you from the state of being upset, unhappy, fearful, that may still, in some of you, occasionally become obscured by mind waves and by the old structures, which still have a certain momentum within you. They are collective human mind structures that has been around for a long time.

And so you may find yourself occasionally during this week that we are here together, you may find yourself, or you may already have found yourself in the short time that you have been here, becoming upset with this, that, or the other. And that's nothing personal. You don't need to feel, oh, he caught me, I got him, it's nothing personal.

And it is quite possible that from time to time, you will find yourself entering the state, I'm using that word that is used in the course in miracles, you're upset one way or another, fearful, anxious, complaining, sad, doubting. Emotions and mind waves come and say, this is, I feel that because of this, this is doing this because of that. And then perhaps you'll remember, I'm never upset for the reason I think.

Oh, and then, that's a little pointer. It works like a bell.

[Speaker 4] (3:12:11 - 3:12:13)

Ding. And.

And so sometimes the bell that I occasionally use is a spiritual alarm clock. It says, step out of your state of being identical and identified with thinking and emotions. Step out and be present and see your thoughts and emotions.

That's the spiritual alarm clock because awakening means to awaken out of the old mental emotional patterns. And so a bell can fulfill that function. That's why in some monasteries, they use it quite a lot.

Or a stick that the master in a Zen monastery uses to hit you, that can work too. Or a little pointer like, I'm never upset for the reason I think. And then you suddenly, that awakens you out of your identification with a reaction, the mental emotional reaction that was ego, that was me.

And then you see it. And then you see the situation isn't really that important. And you see the real reason why you're upset is you've lost touch with yourself.

Or another way of putting it, you've lost touch with the present moment. You're not fully aligned internally with what is now. So, and not being aligned internally with whatever form this moment takes means not being in touch with life.

Because at this moment, life is taking this form. It's not going to last, forms never last. But at this moment, life is taking this form.

To be aligned with a deeper life that is beyond form, you need to be first of all aligned with the form that life takes. Instead of rejecting the form and saying, I'm looking for the real life, but not this. So that's a little secret.

And that's something to be particularly practiced, to be aware of here, to be aligned, to be in touch with being who you are or what you are beyond the conditioned entity, conditioned by the past, mentally, emotional conditioning, a bundle of mental, emotional conditioning. That's to most people, that's who they think they are. They speak out of that.

They react out of that. They interact and so on, and are upset a lot of the time out of that. So to be aligned with who you are beyond that, the unconditioned, the being that you are, that which is so hard to put into words, because words come from this world of forms.

And we are now pointing towards the formless dimension in yourself, not the form, not the physical form, and certainly not the psychological form of me. It's a temporary formation, nothing wrong with it. It's a temporary formation like a cloud or a snowflake.

No human is the same on the planet. And they say, I mean, they look at snowflakes through the microscope. Not one snowflake is the same as any other snowflake, and yet it only survives for a short time.

So to be aligned with who you are, and that's the only thing that can free you from the state of being unhappy, which is structural, not caused ultimately by conditions, because I have met people in the worst of conditions, physical or otherwise, who were absolutely at peace inside. So it's not that. Life.

Jesus said, I want you to have life, and I want you to have it more abundantly. True, abundant life, which is not to do with quantities, forms of life, but life itself. To be in touch with the life that you are, which is one with the life that is at the heart of the universe.

You could also call it God, if the word had not been misused so much. To enter life, you have to first of all enter, and life by life we mean here, not a form of life, but the formless, timeless one life of which you are a temporary expression. To know that, that is the purpose of your being here, that is the purpose of the universe.

It wants to know itself through you. To know that one life that you are, a condition for that is not being at odds with the forms of life, the form that life takes at this moment, because that's the only place where life can take form. So to bring an inner alignment to whatever condition arises at this moment, either an external condition or an internal condition.

Oh, this is how it is. Doesn't mean you can't take action. If you're in bed cold, your pajama isn't thick enough, you thought you were coming to a warmer climate.

Well, if you arrived, by the way, if you arrived this evening, you'll be surprised how hot it is tomorrow morning. That's how it seems to go every day. Of course, you can ask for a blanket.

You can say, okay, I need to accept this moment. I'm not going to ask for a blanket. If there's something you can change, let's you take a step.

But the action that you take already arises out of an inner alignment, not out of being upset. Because if you run to the reception or wherever you go and you're already upset because the egoic entity used the fact that you were not warm enough in your bed or in your tent, used that as another justification for being upset, just its normal condition, came up again and said, this is why. Of course it's not.

It's only a blanket. Or it's only a little cold. And then you go, and then they will either tell you, yes, here it is, or they tell you, no, we've run out of blankets.

There are too many people here. We don't have that many blankets. And then you go, oh.

Now you can see the egoic entity would have another reason for being even more upset. And in that, strengthen its sense of self, which is a total illusion. Its illusory sense of me gets strengthened through the upset.

And then it runs and you talk to your next one. You know what? They don't even have enough blankets.

And then perhaps at that moment, if you remember, I'm never upset for the reason I think. And of course, I'm never upset for the reason I think means I'm upset because I've lost the present moment. I'm not aligned with the form that this moment takes.

That's all. If I were aligned internally, if I said, that's how it is, I've taken action that didn't work, and then I can ask somebody else about some blankets, or find some other means of covering myself, or I find nothing and I'm simply shiver in bed. And that is not that bad either.

If you lived in a Zen monastery, you would shiver for years. And they can't complain.

Well, they can not only in the head, but they can't go to the master and complain.

[Speaker 1] (3:22:39 - 3:40:11)

You idiot, go out. And he's not insulting, he's hoping to break your mind identification. Sometimes it works, but most of the time it doesn't.

So you work with whatever arises. That's the raw material for our retreat. Whatever condition arises, external or internal.

And so if you couldn't find the blister just to stay for one moment with that situation, you then spend a night feeling a little cold. And then that's a good opportunity for not mentally labeling it and not even saying I'm cold, cold. That makes it far worse.

And you're feeling upset and in that you feel good. The ego feels good about that. The strange thing is that the ego, what is bad for the organism, being upset the body doesn't like it, it interferes with the flow of energy through the body.

But to the ego, it's great to be upset. The more upset, the stronger I feel. And so whatever condition arises is as it is at this moment.

Nobody could argue with that except the ego. Whatever arises at this moment is as it is. And if you can recognize that fact, suddenly life becomes very simple because it's the simplicity of the present moment which you can always deal with.

It's always really quite simple. Either you take action or you let it be. If action is necessary or possible, action happens.

But it doesn't arise anymore out of the ego which really is looking to enhance itself through the action to make itself right and somebody else wrong. If action is possible or necessary, it happens. If no action is possible, there's a simple beautiful acceptance of this moment as it is.

And that is the inner alignment with this moment. So confusion leaves you because confusion is to do with being out of the moment and trying to work something out about your past and your future and how they two hang together. How can I make it work, my life story?

And I've got, okay, then you're like, I may have 20 years left and I've got to make it work. And you neglect the primary where life is found, the present moment. So people are trying to make their life work or find their life purpose in terms of future.

Where is my life purpose? And then automatically you look to the future for your life purpose. That is your secondary life purpose.

The future is your life purpose to do with this temporary form, whatever function this form fulfills. And yes, that also exists. It has its dimension also.

But primary is the purpose of, it is your purpose to be internally one with life. And that can only be found in the present moment. And if you miss that, because you're looking for some greater purpose than this, you've missed the primary, the very foundation of your life, this moment, and looking for some greater life in some future moment, which doesn't exist except as a thought.

So we are here to go deeper into this. It is the depths, it's to do with depths. That's why we may briefly touch upon what you do externally with your life.

Of course, that also, that is a dimension that is a temporary one, due as form. But nothing, it is nothing compared to the importance of being one with who you are in the depths of your being. What purpose could you possibly find if you're not one, if you're looking to the future to find that state of being one with who you are?

Who you are, not who you will be. The one with being, life, God, the now is the portal. But that's the formless dimension, but you cannot reach the formless dimension.

I'm saying it again, I will repeat it many times. You cannot be aligned with the formless eternal life that you are as long as you reject or resist or are at odds with the form that life takes at this moment. Then the form that life takes as your life situation or as a condition that arises becomes a wall, a big obstacle.

You have made it into it, it isn't, but you make then whatever situation or condition arises in your life into, and you look upon it as an obstacle, like a, oh no, this is not what I want, oh no, oh no. Something, oh no, not this again, that's not supposed to happen, that shouldn't happen. He shouldn't do that, they shouldn't, I shouldn't.

Oh no, and so you create, it's that which separates yours, you're looking, there are people who are looking for spiritual enlightenment away from what is here, they're in some, and these are people who love abstract, some abstract mental constructs about what enlightenment is and they study it for years, and then you get divisions, you can divide in 15 this and 25 that and 100 this and oh. So the form that is the condition, the form of this moment that this moment takes, if you're internally aligned, it becomes an opening. The worse it is, the wider the opening really.

So we work with that these days that we are here, bringing particular alertness, particular attention to whatever arises outside or inside. Notice your reactions, see if you can be in a state of immediate oneness with the form that life takes at this moment, immediate inner oneness. Whenever you are in immediate inner oneness, you're already a master, spiritual master.

Maybe only for that minute, maybe the next minute you're no longer at one, but that's fine. You don't need to be a master for the rest of your life, it's enough to be master of the present moment because that's all there is. Otherwise the mind comes in and says, but yeah, but I'm not going to able to sustain this for the, so the mastery of life doesn't mean that you exert total control over everything and everybody.

Mastery means to be one with the totality, the total, the cosmos, the Tao, the flow of the universe. It's all one, it's all interconnected, the web of the one world, universe, reality. To be one with that, that's being a master.

One, so master is master of the present moment, that's all. And suddenly life becomes, is very simple. The present moment is primary in your life at any moment and whenever you forget that, you become upset.

And so you're not upset for the reason you think, you're upset because you forgot what really matters. That's all. And so it's interesting to see how many times this week you forget what really matters.

Forget yourself, forget being, forget the present moment. And the moment you realize that you forgot the present moment, you forgot what really matters. The moment you realize that, you haven't forgotten.

It's only when you don't know it, then you have truly forgotten it. Because then you're immersed in the reaction, in the old mental emotional pattern. That means you've truly forgotten and that means you're truly asleep, spiritually speaking, you're asleep.

And then you need a stronger dose, perhaps, of a stronger alarm clock. But here, of course, there are probably many because we meet here quite often and it'll be hard to stay asleep here if you're deadlocked and your door's off, that's another matter. Externally, what you do here, there is more freedom on this retreat than on some other retreats that you may have attended.

If you have been on other retreats, not our retreats, but some other, there's some retreats, meditation retreats that are like boot camps where you have to, you sit for 10 hours a day and you meditate and then you walk and you can't even look at anybody. And I'm not saying that's bad, that could be great too. It's just, this is different, forms are different, that's all, that could take you into being too.

And here, the form is somewhat different. And to some extent, it is up to you whether on the external level, you want to have a retreat and refrain from speaking, in which case, whenever anybody approaches you, you could go and then they know that you want to be on a silent retreat. I would also like to, at some point, for probably two or three days, we will endeavor to be silent together for a whole day or two days, whatever it may be.

But in addition to that, you may want to, those who want it can be silent all the time. There are some silent tables set aside in the restaurant. Or you can reduce your amount of verbal exchange to a minimum and not engage in a lot of chit-chat.

But that's up to you, I'm not saying you should. Or you can engage in normal chit-chat and still be present and observe the chit-chat coming out of your mouth. There it goes.

If you are one of those people who want to continue to chit-chat, that's fine. But something that will help you observe the chit-chatting entity, it helps to be, while you chit-chat or listen to somebody else chit-chatting, to be in your body, to feel the inner, the aliveness in your body while you sit there and chit-chat. That's not immediately easy because what tends to happen is the stream of chit-chatting draws all your attention in and the old stories come out.

And you can actually see how they pull you along, they pull your consciousness. Your consciousness is pulled into these words and the words go, one string of strings of words like coming out of you like some long... LAUGHTER And there's no end, it's like a magician.

And as that happens, can you be in the body or at least can you feel your hands, the aliveness in your hands while you talk? You are not really talking, it's the mind is talking. Can you feel the aliveness in your hands?

Or when you listen to the other person chit-chatting, can you feel the energy in your body? And while you listen, can you at least listen to the other person without engaging in preparatory chit-chat? LAUGHTER What you're going to say next?

Or some clever remark that's waiting on the tip of your tongue. So to be in the body, and that's useful also for those who decide to have more of a monastic retreat and refrain from speaking altogether because that doesn't help you, if that thing up here is continuously busy and perhaps even more busy than it would be if you were talking to people normally because it gets so frustrated not being able to talk. And then it talks even more in the head.

LAUGHTER And so being in the body is important no matter whether you're having a social retreat or a monastic retreat. Being rooted here means that some of the attention goes away from... The mind hasn't got all that much attention any more.

The attention is in the body. And it's beautiful to rest, to have attention in here. While you do things, especially while you listen to others, or if you are having a silent retreat and you're sitting at a silent table, you can hear other people talking.

And can you be the silent listener while others are talking? Or is somebody else talking in you and saying, Look at these people. They're supposed to be on a spiritual retreat and they're talking, not me.

[Speaker 4] (3:40:13 - 3:40:36)

LAUGHTER Ego can use all kinds of disguises and forms.

And when you think you got rid of ego in one form, it appears in another. So it's essential to watch. Be there.

Watch. Be alert. So it's up to you then what kind of a retreat you want to have.

But we meet here. That's a given. Observe doubts that come into your mind, because mind is doubt.

If it's not doubt, it's some kind of obsession, or so-called conviction. It's probably worse than doubt. This absolute conviction that this is how it is.

And I've had it for 20 years and this is how it is. Or it goes, well, what if... But on the other hand, I shouldn't have come here, should I?

Yes, no... Oh, that reminds me of the presidential... These two seem to embody...

They say one was going from one to the other and the other has an absolute conviction. That's a given. Two forms of mind that the mind can take.

So doubt may come in that perhaps you shouldn't have come here. Often people tell me that on the second or third day they start thinking of leaving. The mind gets suddenly very active.

Nothing is happening here. And the same people often tell me, they haven't left, but they tell me towards the end of the retreat the mind comes in and absolutely says, I don't want to leave here. So you can observe that also.

That's a wonderful thing, to be there as the observer of your mind, what it does, what it says, its reactions. Because you're also observing the ego. Ego is no more than mind, mental, emotional forms that you have identified with, that carry a sense of self.

That's all. Being in the body, I recommend it tonight, when you go to bed. If you're traveling with a friend or a partner, once you lie down, at least then stop talking.

And going to sleep, lying flat on your back first, and enter the inner energy field of your body. And of course you will still listen, and you will listen much more acutely to the noises, the night insects, the beautiful sounds. And you will be able to listen to all that, because as you enter the body, the mind, the mental noise, will gradually calm down, or dissolve completely.

And only then can you truly listen. We'll be talking about that more. So you lie on your back, hands either on your legs or by your side, and you lie in the energy field of your body.

And so the compulsive thinking subsides, the thinking entity subsides, and there's simply spacious aliveness. And go to sleep from there. Don't go to sleep from mental noise.

You're lucky here that there's no television, so you can't watch the latest talk show, or whatever it is. There's no magazines, at least I haven't seen any. If you brought them, put them away.

Newspapers, put them away. Because these are addictive things to the mind, which is always searching for more, more stimulus, more of this to get its teeth into. And so you may find, not only tonight, but also in the next few days, certain symptoms of withdrawal symptoms.

Because the mind is addictive. The mind, everybody's mind is an addict. And so even if you're not addicted to drugs, it's still an addict.

And if you can't sing, even if you don't watch TV and read papers, ever, the mind is still addicted, and its main addiction is thinking. I've got to think. But there's nothing to think about.

You're in bed in this beautiful place. What is there to think about? What could you add to this moment by thinking about some other moment?

You can only obscure the moment by thinking about something else. So this is another aspect. We won't go into this this evening.

It's transcending having to think. And if you achieve nothing else in your incarnation here, your life is fulfilled. Consciousness has flowered.

No matter whether the world tells you that you are important or not, consciousness has flowered. And if you wake up in the middle of the night, and soon after you wake up, usually the mind starts saying something. It will be about past or future or complaining or whatever.

And then simply go back into the body. Use it. Don't say, Oh, I should be asleep.

No, you're not asleep. Or say, I can't sleep. I'm going to be tired.

I'm going to fall asleep tomorrow in the session. We don't know what you're going to fall asleep. You're not asleep.

No, that's all you know. And that is what you are internally aligned with. I'm not asleep.

Okay. And then you go into the body. And it's beautiful not being asleep in the body.

You're in the body then. And then not being asleep is not a problem. In fact, it's very enjoyable.

And say, Oh, this is good. Little fragments of thoughts may come in. This is good.

It feels good. Alive. And then you listen.

Subtle noises. Beautiful. And you feel an intense aliveness within.

And then perhaps at some point, you will go back to sleep. And in the morning, fortunately there's no radio here to switch on. Can't listen to the news.

Don't know what's going on. It's always the same anyway. I listen to it too.

But I know it's always the same. Just not in the morning though. The first, keep that freshness.

As you wake up, that freshness. Keep it fresh. And instead of going immediately into thinking, go back into the body before you get up.

Just five or ten minutes. And then you get up. That's a good start.

It was a good end to the day. And it's a good start to the next day. So that you don't go into sleep from thought.

And you do not go from sleep immediately into thought. You have a space. And then remember the next, when you interact with people, be in the body as much as you can while you interact.

So that you feel. And if you can't be in the body, feel just the hands. Be there in here while you listen.

If you can't feel the whole body. So that is important. No matter whether you are quiet or whether you talk on the retreat.

I will address this again when we have our silent days. Something else that you may want to do. There's one sense that's a little bit neglected.

The primary senses for human beings are visual and auditory. Smelling. At different times of the day, the air smells different here.

And so you can take, also as you get up, you put your head out of the window or the door. Or you walk out of here. Or you walk out of the restaurant.

Always take, smell the air and see the fragrance. Smell that. Always subtly different.

But there's more here than the smell. Notice that in the moment of smelling the air, there's no thought. Because if you were thinking, you couldn't smell it.

In the moment of smelling the air, there's no thought and there's an intense sense of aliveness. Then afterwards, after that smell, perhaps thought comes in. And then you notice that.

But a great thing is if you can notice, and that perhaps you've been doing for years, perhaps if you're not totally identified with the mental noise, you have occasionally, when you're out in nature, you've taken a deep breath and said, this is good. But you didn't say this is good while you were smelling, it came afterwards. While you are conscious of that, there's no thought.

And there's more to it than that, but I'll leave it at that right now. So use that. Senses will become very important this week as we practice presence.

Senses will become sharpened as more awareness flows into all the senses. We'll address that tomorrow. But we already have enough for tonight and the night and tomorrow morning.

Remember, the slightest upset, for whatever reason, I'm never upset for the reason I think, I lost the present moment. I lost the internal alignment with the present moment. And at that moment of realization, the possibility of being aligned with the present moment is there.

It is your decision or your choice. Do I want to continue being out of alignment and feel upset? And then perhaps the ego says, oh yeah, I'd love to feel even more upset.

Now you see, that's a funny question because when you make it conscious, you can see that it's insane. And so the pattern will collapse when you make it conscious and if you ask yourself, is this what I want? Do I want to continue to be upset about this or am I enjoying feeling upset about this?

Or is it possible now that I've realized I'm out of alignment, I can choose to say yes to what is and be in alignment with what is. It's your choice then. Choice comes in at that moment.

The universe chooses through you to be conscious. And if your mind said, oh, I'd love to carry on being upset, you would start laughing. It doesn't work anymore because you've made it conscious.

No matter how hard you try, you can't be upset anymore. That's no fun anymore, says the ego. Life just isn't fun anymore.

Notice your left leg is moving. That's an emotion. Be aware of it.

I'm not saying stop it. Just watch it. And you're not the only one.

I always see people whose leg or arm moves slightly. It is an emotion in the body. All you need to do is be conscious of it and suddenly it will stop.

It's something that is... You're not fully in here yet. There's something.

Be conscious. Watch it. And then it stops by itself.

If your attention is in here, it stops. If your attention is in here, the body goes... Get in here.

Be in here. Your consciousness has to go in here. And then the body becomes a portal.

And eventually you transcend body, but first you go in here. It's essential to leave that, to get out of that while you're here. Not to become unconscious, but to transcend that, the thinker.

And then there's not only the thinker, there's the emotional field that accompanies the thinker, that's been there for years. There's the pain body that's been there, not just your pain body, humanity's pain body that's been there for years. So there's the thinker in alliance with the pain body.

They together form the ego. The emotional field, old emotion and that. And that feeds that, and the emotion feeds the thinker, and the thinker feeds the emotion.

Consciousness. In consciousness. And watch.

If there's a movement in here, simply watch that. Internally, not externally. Internally.

Feel it. Now one more thing. There is something in perhaps everyone, and that is the emotional, mental emotional entity that is simply a form that consciousness has taken that you confuse with who you are.

And that egoic entity does not want to be here. It may occasionally arise as you sit here and manifest either as intense thought movement in the head, you're not listening to a word anymore that's being said here, intense thought movement, whatever it is, I don't know what about, could be anything, past, future, dreamland, anything. Fantasy, or your problems, or your life, or what somebody did to you, or what you're going to do to them, or what you should have said and didn't say.

Whatever. As you sit here, there can be a reaction. It can be very intense in the head, and or in the body as an emotion, so much so that you just can't stand it being here anymore.

And then sometimes I can see people, they start looking around when it happens, and some look for the door. And again, just when it happens, you can watch that. I may, without offending, wanting to offend you, if I occasionally see somebody who is engaged in it, I might point it out.

So there's nothing personal about thoughts or emotions. Oh, well, that takes a lot of steam out of my story. And if you cannot stand it here, if the impulse comes to leave, to go home, I'll just recommend one thing.

Do not immediately obey the impulse, but watch the impulse to go, wanting to go home. Allow it to be there. Watch it.

You may watch it, and it may subside, and an hour later you may find you love it. Or it may well be that the impulse comes continuously, or doesn't go away, and then you may find yourself, you have no choice, you have to, you do, you cannot stop yourself, you have to go, then if you have to go, it is not wrong to leave here. You are not wrong if you leave here.

It just means consciousness will arise in some other way, in you or through you, somewhere else, in another situation, perhaps while you're traveling home, or when you arrive home, or 50 years later when you're near deathbed. We don't know. It is not wrong.

Although when you, those who do leave, the egoic mind will attempt to make everybody else wrong. That's normal. And that's not personal either.

And when it happens, you can watch that in yourself. All these people, I'm not going to stay here. Okay, they're all wrong, and I'm right.

Yes, that's how it is. It's okay. Spiritual alarm clock, but much nicer than any alarm clock.

Thank you. Quite a few people apparently arrived after our meeting last night. And for those who did, let me summarize what we said last night.

Your only job here is to be present. That's it. To be present is a reversal of the normal way in which people live.

Normal means unconscious. Normal means insane, dysfunctional, and so on, of course. So we don't want to be normal.

The result of normal, you see, when you watch the news or television, that's normal. The arising of presence goes beyond the personal realm. It seems to happen to a person.

But at the same time, it's only happening because the personal dimension is becoming relatively unimportant. It's still there, remains there, but it becomes far less significant than it has been before. Your whole personal sense of me, of selfhood, of story, my story, any kind of my mind, my history, my story, my future, my purpose, my...

The normal way is that the present moment is on the periphery of your consciousness because you've got better things to be worried about. So the attention is normally mainly on past or future. Probably more future for most people than past, except very old people when it shifts to past.

So they talk about the past all the time because they haven't got much future left to think about. Not knowing that old age is an incredible opportunity for entering the timeless dimension that is presence when you haven't got much future left. So this is our training ground for living in a different state of consciousness where your primary attention is always on the present moment.

Peripherally you are still aware, of course, of your life situation, which has a past and probably a future, unless something happens. You never know. Nobody knows.

So that your consciousness is not completely absorbed any longer by your life situation. Every life situation is to some extent problematic. But there's nothing problematic about the present moment.

That's the amazing thing. And every life situation is to a greater or lesser extent complicated. But there's nothing complicated ever about the present moment.

So instead of deriving your sense of self from your life situation, derive your sense of self from the present moment. The depth of the present moment, which is the depth of who you are, which is not what happens, but it's underneath what happens. But only when you are aligned with what happens can you get to that which lies deeper than what happens, which is the form that life takes at this moment.

You can never get to the formless dimension as long as you reject the form internally. In another teaching, this has been expressed by somebody, I don't know who, I can't remember. Somebody asked, how can I become free of the world?

And that teacher said, when you love the world and everything in it, and to be aligned with the present moment is really no more than that. It's not to accept what is, this is the form, and that openness towards the form that arises is really love, this allowing. And that's our practice here.

Probably only little things will arise on a retreat, a relatively protected setting, although occasionally it happens that some people go through enormous drama even on a retreat. The shift in consciousness happens when the present moment becomes primary, that's all. You realize how important, how much incredibly more important this is compared to your life situation.

And to live rightly, or to get your life right, is totally pointless, even to make plans. There's nothing wrong with making plans, but it's like constructing a building, there's nothing wrong. If you make plans without, you think, OK, I have to get my life right and in order, and you're making plans, and it's all mapped out, that's where I want to get, and this is how I'm going to get there.

And if you forget what is primary, the present moment, it's like building a big building without the foundation or crumbling foundation, because your relationship with the present moment isn't right. You're hoping that when you achieve all the things that you have planned, then your relationship with life will suddenly fall into place, and you will totally fit into life, and life will be working for you. But if you carry inside the mind structure of non-alignment with the present moment, then no matter what you achieve, that which you want to achieve through whatever you achieve, you're never going to get.

So we're not saying don't make plans, but this is about the very foundation. To get your life right is getting this moment right. Your relationship to this moment, and that's not the ultimate truth, because if you go even deeper, you realize you, who you are in your essence, and what we call the present moment beyond the form that this moment takes, is there one.

But let's, just for a moment, use that approach and talk about your relationship to the present moment. No, this is not the ultimate truth, but it's an approximation towards the truth. If your relationship to the present moment is not right, nothing can ever be right in the future, because when the future comes, it's the present moment.

And your habit, your mental, emotional habit, is to have a dysfunctional relationship with it when it comes. And so when it comes, it's never quite right, and it's never enough. There's always something missing.

For a little while, there's an elation when some new form arises that satisfies you for a moment, takes away the needing and wanting, and you get a little bit of glimpse of the fullness of being. Not because the ten million dollars suddenly arrived in your bank account, but because for a moment, the ten million dollars removed the wanting, the next thing. For a moment, the ten million dollars removed the mental, emotional, wanting and grasping to where's the next thing, the more that I need to fulfill myself.

For a moment, the ten million arrives, and the wanting seems to be satisfied. For a moment, it subsides. And because of that, the joy that you feel is not because of the ten million dollars that arrived in your bank account, but because for one moment, the incessant wanting, future, subsided.

And then the joy of being came through. And you confuse that and believe it's caused by the ten million dollars. And that can happen with big things or little things.

They give you suddenly enormous satisfaction, but what you really feel is that for a moment, the wanting has died down. And when that mind structure, which is the future, looking to the future, then being, the aliveness, the essence of who you are, the joy of being comes through. But never for long.

And then it reasserts itself. And there's renewed wanting. And then you get the sense that there's something missing, even with the ten million dollars in your bank account.

And the same dysfunctional relationship with the present moment arises again. Except that before, you were living in a trailer, and you had a dysfunctional relationship with the present moment. And when the ten million dollars arrive, you live in a mansion, and there you have a dysfunctional relationship with the present moment.

Ultimately it doesn't make much difference where you are unhappy. You might say, I'd rather be unhappy in luxury than in poverty, but it really makes little difference. Recognizing what is primary and getting, observing your relationship with the present moment.

And this is a training ground while we are here. We bring attention to that, what, and we ask, and again, that's a little pointer. We had one last night from the Course in Miracles.

I'm never upset for the reason I think. That's to point it out why you're upset, because you're not in touch with the life that you are, the depths of your being. And anything out there can upset you, but it's not that, it's that.

You're not in touch with the present moment. Another pointer now, ask yourself as often as possible, what is my relationship with this moment, the present moment? And observe the witness, your relationship with the present moment.

And you may observe that it is not a friendly one. And that's enough to know that, because that's an unconscious habit. To have an unfriendly relationship with the present moment is an unconscious habit.

The moment you make an unconscious habit conscious, it begins to dissolve. So the simple recognition that my relationship with this moment is unfriendly or even hostile, or I'm running away from it. I want to be somewhere else.

I resist this. Interesting. Don't fall into the trap of self-condemnation.

Because if you condemn yourself for not being in a good relationship with the present moment, you have added a further dysfunctional relationship with the present moment. You see? I'm no good.

I can't do it. I've done it again. I can't.

You see? You see all the internal dialogue. Sometimes you talk to yourself as you.

You address yourself as you. That's what the mind does. You see?

You can't do it. There's no point. You're just not good enough.

Or you say, that teaching doesn't work. I have to try some other teaching. It obviously isn't working for me.

And that's just a thought. Don't believe any thought that comes into your head. Just watch.

And this is particularly important on this retreat. Thoughts that come into your head are just thoughts. No more.

Don't give them an importance that they do not have. You can allow them. It's there.

But don't completely believe in every thought that comes into your head. So, examining your relationship with the present moment as often as possible. And that's not an analysis.

You don't need to analyze. You simply watch. Mental and emotional.

Am I judging this moment mentally? Am I calling it not good enough? Am I running away from it?

Am I projecting myself elsewhere? Am I resisting it emotionally? And that's enough to see it.

The moment you see it, the unconscious pattern begins to dissolve. But in addition, that happens by itself. But in addition, you can actually choose to be fully present.

The moment you realize you're not present, you don't have a friendly relationship with the present moment. At that moment, you can also choose to be present. You can choose or you can choose as we said last night, you can also choose that you want to continue to have an unfriendly relationship with the present moment.

I'd like to continue to be unhappy. That's a choice too. But it's unlikely that you would, if it makes conscious, that's an unconscious egoic choice.

Yes. The choice to be unhappy, humans make that all the time. But they're not conscious of it.

But consciously, it would even be absurd if you even said to yourself, I love that, this unhappiness. I really enjoy this. The moment you said that, you're making it conscious and you would start laughing.

It just doesn't work. A dysfunctional pattern, when you make it conscious, can't work anymore. It doesn't work anyway because it's dysfunctional.

I think. So we are to be able to observe your relationship with the present moment of course requires some presence. Very unconscious people simply react unconsciously and they don't have that choice.

They cannot observe their relationship with the present moment. And this is not something that you can bring about. Precondition for being able to observe your relationship with the present moment is that there is enough presence in you from where you can observe your relationship with the present moment.

And this is not something that you can make happen. This is the grace. By grace, there is enough presence in you so that you can be conscious of your relationship with the present moment and of the present moment itself.

You can be conscious of the thoughts you have. You can be conscious of the emotions that go through you. Very unconscious people, they are their thoughts.

They are their emotions. They're completely in the grip of their thoughts and emotions. There's nothing you can do to tell them, observe your thoughts and emotions or be conscious of your relationship with the present moment.

It's pointless. They don't even know what you're talking about. So that is not something that is up to you to choose.

By grace, presence is arising through this form. And because presence is arising through this form, you are able to say, I choose to be present. And that is good.

Now you can say, I choose to be present, because there is enough presence in you to do that. So really, what speaks in you, what chooses, is presence itself. Presence is arising and it looks as if a person were choosing to be present.

And this is because you are going beyond the personal realm, beyond that you transcend the limitations of being no more than a little person with a little past and a little future. And that's why we are here, to see that it is possible to live much more beautifully, much more effectively and joyously in that way. So the primary, your primary attention, while we are here, this is a protected setting, it's a training ground, it's a greenhouse, or hothouse for consciousness.

But it's not as much as a hothouse as some retreats. Some retreats are so structured and you have to meditate ten hours a day, and you don't speak at all, although we will have periods of not speaking, that they become a real hothouse, and the consciousness can develop very quickly in extremely structured and protected setting, and then you become very present after ten days a week, and everybody goes, it's beautiful. And then the retreat comes to an end.

And then they go out, and the first they go back into the traffic, they go back into the city, they go back into their normal life, and they feel... And the hothouse plant isn't used to normal conditions. The moment you take the hothouse plant out of the hothouse, and it stays for two or three days, and then...

So here we have a in some way normal life, but something else arising, we continue to interact to some extent, but not as much as in so-called ordinary life. So we bring consciousness into the ordinary, into relating. Now this is very important, the choice to be present.

You are able to make that choice. And ultimately, but this doesn't matter, it's a philosophical question, it is not you as the person who chooses presence, because you as the person would never choose presence. Because the person is the old conditioning, is the ego.

You as the person don't want to be present. So when you choose presence, it is not the person that chooses, it is the deeper dimension of that which is beyond the conditioned that chooses to be present. And occasionally, you may find the obstruction of the person coming back in.

It doesn't say, I don't want to be present, it says something else to distract you, to pretend that something else is more important than being present. The person is also the conditioned thought patterns is part of the person. All the conditioned thought patterns in the head are part of the person, the me.

And identification, the thought patterns are clever. They will come up with some thought that draws you out of presence and that it doesn't say this is more important than presence, it implies that this is more important than presence, and I need to think about this, this thought is, and off you go. So you may observe that also, the person reasserting itself, which is the old pattern, the old thought, and you disappear.

You disappear into the conditioned. Consciousness goes back to sleep. Consciousness identifies with form, thought forms, emotional forms.

Consciousness identifies with forms and continues to dream the dream of form, which is the dream that you are no more than a person. And then everything that is in form in your life has an enormous importance in that dream because you know nothing beyond the dream. So everything that happens is so terribly important.

That's why you get upset so much. It's true. And things happen continuously in the dream to upset you more.

Consciousness dreaming the dream of form, one of the ways in which that manifests is as a person. And if consciousness were not ready to awaken, nobody would be awakening. It is only because consciousness is ready to awaken out of that dream that we are sitting here.

And for many people it is not until the dream becomes very unpleasant that they begin to awaken. It's only when the dream gets just can't stand anymore and then that suffering, that pain wakes you up and suddenly you become present. Some people are forced into presence.

Many of you were forced into presence because you couldn't stand the dream anymore. The dream of past and future. The dream of me and my story.

And that's why you're here. So choosing, you choose to be present and you may have to choose that many times. Particularly when you notice the dysfunctional relationship with the present moment.

And choose. Now what happens the moment you say I choose presence? That's just a thought.

That's not yet presence. It's a pointer. I choose presence is not presence.

Otherwise and that's the traditionally the mistake of religion is to confuse the pointer with that which it points to. And so if that ever happens you'll know that this has happened when we start having prayers about presence. We choose presence.

Or even worse we believe in presence. And if you don't then you're wrong. That's or worse.

Now what happens I choose presence to be present. You enter the present moment. What happens as you enter the present moment?

When you observe another person going through the shift from dreamland which is being identified with thinking and emotions and their problems and their future and suddenly something wakes them up into presence and you observe you can see both the difference in their face and in their eyes and also the energy emanation that changes and it goes like this or or or into suddenly you wake up out of the dream of thought and for some people it happens that the first thing they notice when they become present is their surroundings as if they had just arrived.

And then they may notice certain noises that were there. One man reported I read about it became present at home for the first time he had lived there for several years and he heard distant but clearly audible church bells it was somewhere in Europe he had never heard the church bells before because he was too much his consciousness was too much absorbed by thought. For the first time in years he heard church bells ringing and was amazed and you may see colors, you may see light you become aware of the space in the room and the next thing often that happens is you sense more the energy field, the entire energy field in the body that is Piccato, because it's presence within and presence without and you feel there's an aliveness in the body whereas before you didn't, the body wasn't really, even if you did physical exercises still you were not in the body, you were still even while you're on the treadmill in the gym you're either thinking about your problems or you're watching a TV screen, that's what people do it's quite draining because the attention goes out there so even people who say they're looking after their bodies are not necessarily in the body it can be still in here and so most people live in the upper compartment or in the loft or the attic and there's the entire building inhabited by weird by weird people all kinds of emotions live in there and go and anybody can come in because you're not there they all know that you're only up there and then the emotions they make a lot of noise and then they take over the thinker and the thinker doesn't know what's happening so presence means first usually ah you become present without and within there is an alertness that is suddenly there and thought is not important is no longer primary when presence arises another word for presence of course is stillness because whenever you are present the movement of thought subsides occasional thoughts can still come in but there are suddenly there is space there is suddenly the space of no thought but but I'm reluctant to call that a relaxed state in a way it is a relaxed state but it is not to be confused with what is normally called relaxation in the mind identified unconscious state it has relaxation when you go you're hanging out and that's good at least for a while you are free of the torture of the mind and then there is the high energy state which in the egoic state is stress some kind of let's get it, let's get something done ok we've got so much to do, come on let's get on with it that's the high energy state and then occasionally they lapse into the so called relaxed state, perhaps only after a few drinks or then they just let's hang out or wedge out is the expression in front of the TV wedging out in front of the TV and with the TV the nice thing is that you don't have to think your own thoughts anymore, the thoughts and that's it's a small liberation from yourself but you're unfortunately you link into all the stuff that you see and you think their thoughts whatever thoughts they want you to think you switch on into that you link into that and then you don't have your own problems you just live their problems but at least it frees you from your own for a little while but that's not a liberation really it's just a shift from one mind form to another mind form but for some people they relax a little bit then in front of it and if you have a can of beer it's even better laughter and then the next morning you go back into the high energy state and with the briefcase or whatever it is phone calls is there something that is neither this nor that yes and that's the state of presence I'm reluctant to call it relaxed because of what I've just described what is normally called relaxed is losing consciousness drifting towards sleep and what is usually called high energy in the mind state is quite a stressful state and it's not the body doesn't like it but the ego says I've got to be responsible I've got to be stressed to be responsible if I'm not worried I'm not responsible about my life and as the man called the boss calls the employee into the office into his office and says I've told this joke before looks at him grimly and says the boss says to the employee you are the only person in this company not suffering from a stress related disease how come laughter so that there is another way to live that is neither the state where you hang out all the time nor the state of so called high energy that is stressful and ultimately harmful to the body and harmful to everybody around you because it is a state of dysfunction ultimately you can go into some companies and everybody is unhappy they are all running around fighting against each other as much as they are fighting against the competition uselessly their energy is being uselessly burned up in fighting and fighting against this and against that their positions and their little cliques with their positions totally absurd and they are all anxious, intense insane presence is very different it is a state of high energy but there is no stress in it and there is not no sleepiness in it whatsoever in fact it is extremely alert and that's the then you become very effective not that you have you are not forced into activity when there is actually nothing useful to do you are quite happy with not doing without losing the high energy of presence you can just sit and be without falling into the vegetative state you could sit for an hour or two and it is beautiful and more and more you would enjoy the simple state of being present the joy of being of being present with yourself of feeling your own presence your own is the way of putting it, it is not yours it is presence and when activity is required presence can flow into doing and you give all those people many people who are those people who are very successful in whatever field of endeavor those who are very successful and not unhappy have touched presence in what they do now there are others who in the eyes of the world are successful but really they are very unhappy at the same time, there is no point in that no matter how much money you make what's the point in making money making your bodies ill everybody else unhappy including yourself and then you die so you can actually it is a very different energy energetically than presence is not the ego knows nothing of that that it is possible to be to put enormous energy into something that you do without stress if that is what is needed presence is clear energy and it can flow into action some sports people know that they enter the so called zone as they say and when they are in the zone then right action happens and it is joyful this is why people watch they watch because it is beautiful to watch somebody performing an action in the state of presence because a little bit of that transmits itself it is also joyful to be with somebody who is not active in the state of presence to some extent that happens here it is joyful to sit here because also a kind of transmission happens but here it is not through action but through simple being non-action something that transmits itself and awakens that dimension within you not that it comes through this form into you as if you didn't have it yet no it is here and something in you recognizes it that is why it is nice to be here and the moment it is no longer nice to be here you have gone back into your mind and as long as it feels good to be here you are present when it doesn't feel good to be here anymore you are absent again, you are back in so we could say it is as present as relaxed alertness if you look at two breeds of dogs you could say let's say there is the german shepherd dog and quite many german shepherds they are excellent guard dogs because they are a little bit nervous not all but they are bred to be nervous, to be alert and they go, they look when a visitor comes, they are a bit suspicious and they look at you and then there is the saint bernard dog now if you could cross breed these two you would get a present dog now maybe I have given somebody an idea for a new business and of course my favorite example of that with human beings which some of you already know you have the buddha and then you cross the buddha with the character played in most films by clint eastwood cross the two and you have presents now it is not only that the moment you choose presents you become conscious of sense perceptions of your surroundings it is also sense perceptions themselves when you pay attention to sense perceptions can help you to enter the state of presence to become very conscious of sense perceptions not to lose yourself in sense perceptions now we will see the difference in a second to become very conscious of sense perceptions and in this setting here highly recommended and sense perceptions here are mostly beautiful ones and that is good it is nature mostly what you see here is nature and humans which is also nature let's talk about nature for a moment to become conscious of sense perceptions is to look or listen or smell I mentioned last night to smell the air which changes it is a different smell in the morning from the way it smells after it has rained if it does in the evening it is alive and notice that at the moment of smelling the air there is no thinking because you cannot smell the air and think while you smell the air there is no thought perhaps afterwards the thought interprets the smell or maybe some poem comes into your mind about the air or some haiku or whatever that's thought and sometimes thought that comes after presence is more likely to be original and inspired when it comes and even a brief stretch of presence is enough sometimes to give rise to an inspired original thought not a thought that is of the ego that makes you unhappy and creates more stress and more problem no, an inspiring original alive thought may come not that it has to come you are quite happy without it and then you take another breath and smell again and there is no thought and then you look and in the perception you look at a flower, a tree or just one leaf moving in the wind not necessarily look at what is spectacular there is so much here that is spectacular so much beauty all the potted plants that in colder climates we have at home and they are little and here they are all out there and huge and it's there is a lot that is spectacular and that's good to see too but not just look at the spectacular huge tropical flowers and so on but also look at relatively insignificant things one leaf and there is a slight breeze and the leaf is moving in the breeze it's quivering and stay with that for whatever a minute, two minutes this is just one example of many ways in which you can observe the little the seemingly insignificant and as you observe there is the perception against the background of stillness there is no labeling mentally of what you are observing because then you would lose the sense perception you would go into thought so you can play with that yourself see if you can be present with the sense perception without going into thought and if you go into thought observe the thought and then let it go and go back to the sense perception and so there is more than that there is not just at the moment we are talking about visual sense perception there is not just the sense perception you are not just conscious of the leaf moving quivering slightly and poets have done that and great artists, they are able to watch in presence and then out of that a poem may come and they talk about some great beauty that came out of the state of presence and if it's a great poem can put you back into the state out of which it came in the author that's why it's called great nothing is called great and humans can recognize it that means they are not as insane as they seem to be something in humans recognizes the greatness of great art or great poetry or great literature what is it that makes one work great and the other one is mere fiction or one painting is great and the other one is mere colors put together it is the state out of which it came was it put together by the mind trying to think of something clever a lot of modern artists like that let's try and think of something clever and we make some abstract statement through that it's fine, but it doesn't touch people in here it can stimulate the mind that's okay on that level it doesn't touch you here, if it touches you here it awakens presence you can go directly to that which inspired many artists and poets which is nature go directly to it and watch the quivering leaf and be still as you watch otherwise you have to be, otherwise you can't watch it be with it and notice there's the form whatever it is the leaf moving in the wind is there anything else there apart from the form now you could lose yourself in that form you could just go into and then you fall off the chair or you can be there and see that, but also be conscious of that which makes the perception possible we could say of yourself not yourself as the person with the history but of yourself as the consciousness the attention, the stillness that makes the perception possible and that is not something that you can this is formless you can't touch it, you can't see it, you can't say oh there it is, because that which says there it is, is it so you can never make it into an object of knowledge this is an object of perception but as you perceive there's more than the object of perception but the object of perception helps you to find that the world of form helps you to find the formless which is that in you which is beyond form so you watch and you're aware of the form, but you're also aware of the background stillness the alert background stillness that is, you could also call that the I, the I am which has nothing to do with a person it's the consciousness itself through which the perception happens or in which the perception happens which is the formless dimension of who you are the eternal, formless, timeless dimension who you are beyond the form beyond the physical form beyond the psychological form of me to be trapped in in form is the most dreadful fate to go through your whole lifetime and never know who you are or what you are beyond form is dreadful it's like being in a prison for the whole of your life so how is it that something seemingly so simple as observing a flower observing a leaf moving in the wind, observing a blade of grass or a little patch of ground or whatever it is or a tree or even a distant landscape the wholeness of it it is amazing that that can be an entry point direct perception an entry point into who you are the formless and these are incredible things but just watch and be aware of the watcher not only what is being watched but also feel, sense, be the being the consciousness that makes that flower possible or watch the sky that changes probably this afternoon as it has done the past few days in the afternoon clouds start coming in and the light changes and you can watch that and you can watch the movement of the clouds and as you watch be aware of the presence without which there would be no cloud movements do you think there would be the movement of clouds coming in if you weren't watching it?

of course not there are no clouds it requires a consciousness to see otherwise there are only atoms there is the game, the play of atoms and molecules there are no clouds atoms and molecules playing and through you arises a whole world and so be conscious of that essence in you which is consciousness the I am presence that makes the whole thing all this possible and so sense perception is vital it is much closer to who you are than thought thought is much further removed so in most humans sense perceptions are only peripheral because there is so much thought in them that there isn't much time for listening or watching they hardly ever they just listen or watch enough not to have an accident or to bump into something and sometimes there is so much thinking that they do have an accident because they are not present enough and of course when you perform a dangerous activity then you have to be present when you are in something certain dangerous activities require absolute presence and one thought and you are gone the actor Christopher Reeve died recently I was in Chicago when it happened and I saw on television they showed an interview with him that was done just a few months before he died and as you know he as they rightly pointed out in the interview he became a superman after his accident before it was just a role but then he was confronted with the incredible limitation of form and it seems that he became quite peaceful but we are not we do not need to seek out danger to be present some people believe that that's what they need to do and so they get addicted almost to an activity because it is so liberating compared to their normal state it is so liberating you feel so much more alive when you are present that they need to go back and then climb another wall and another and another and perhaps one day a thought comes in just as they grasp for the next ledge on the rock and that's it so here we sense perceptions are also an opening into presence and that's an important practice while we are here sense perceptions as an opening into presence if done rightly so there's always two dimensions to a sense perception that which you are perceiving and that which is perceiving the form and the formless and then you go to auditory sense perceptions beautiful and again there's no calling it of good or bad it's all equal when you are practicing sense perception you allow whatever sense, whatever noise is there to be there so there's a bird song many different birds the crickets whatever they are at night that's a beautiful chorus wonderful to just listen to that there is the leaves in the wind all different noises and that's, modern humans cannot listen to it anymore there's too much thinking and as you listen be aware of the noise and of the background the perception is the foreground the consciousness, the stillness the presence is the background and it is you it is the formless you and this is at this very moment you can be in that state you can listen to the voice you can also see the room, that's the visual but you can also sense there's an underlying stillness and that is yourself beyond form the I am presence has no form and when you are in touch with that you no longer mind when the form doesn't stay or when the form isn't the most pleasant of forms like occasionally a heavy truck comes up the road here and it goes brrrr and you can listen to that also and continue to feel the background where that arises unaffected by the form the more you are rooted in the background I'm saying whenever we use language we create a duality I say you are rooted in the background or I say you are conscious of the background that's not how it is but the moment we form a sentence we have a subject and an object and we have duality what really happens is you become conscious of yourself it is self-awareness it is self-realization it's not that you are conscious of consciousness because that's what it is consciousness is conscious of itself and it's you you cannot become an object to yourself you can't make yourself into an object self is eternal subject all these different beautiful sounds and you have the sound and the inner stillness there is one bird here somewhere that sounds like a cell phone maybe you will hear it I saw one man who was looking around for his cell phone that's the conditioning from out there so we have visual sense perception and so sometimes look at something small and at other times it may be good to practice visual sense perception looking at a totality of a landscape either looking out there or looking at a group of trees or grove or bushes take in a larger space practice with different ways different ways of looking from the tiniest to larger to the spaciousness of the sky maybe a little beetle crawling on your floor in your room and there are lots of little beetles and sometimes when they hear this and then you can watch that and again be conscious not lose yourself in it just watch and you may want to pick it up either on a piece of paper and put it outside but watch it first before you put it outside it crawls and if it notices your presence the beetle stops and sometimes the head goes in and then if it notices that you are getting closer you are touching it all its legs go in also it becomes a little almost a ball and it will stay like that for minutes it can wait longer than you can that's why it survived for millions of years simply because it can wait and there's a beauty there too and it's this life or consciousness appearing in that particular form and you appear as a form also appear for a little while not much longer than the beetle beetle is maybe a few weeks or months and you are a few years that's all you appear also as a form a physical and psychological form for a little while unique perhaps more unique than the beetle I don't know if every beetle is unique or whether you can't tell the difference at first sight you can't tell the difference one beetle looks very much like any other beetle but probably to the beetle the humans look the same too but we are probably safe to say that there are subtle differences no two forms are ever totally the same we mentioned snowflakes last night or human beings you with your particular physical form you could recognize a close friend but all the billions of humans on the planet there's not one that looks the same you would always be able to pick out somebody that you know well or your father or your mother nobody is quite the same so there is a uniqueness to the form and yet it evaporates very quickly and it's gone, that uniqueness is gone and if that's all you know then it's a very sad thing and the universe doesn't really make sense why create something unique and then destroy it well because the universe is playing with form when you watch if you saw life forms being born and dying and speed it up on a film you would see that it is a play you would see plants and sometimes they have made films like that where you can see a plant coming out of the soil and you speed it up over several days you would see it in one minute and it goes and then it withers and it's gone and then if you speed it up even more you see hundreds and thousands of different plants and trees going and humans coming out of the womb and growing and running around here and there and then shrinking becoming wrinkled shrinking and gone and then but at the same time others are already on their way they are coming so it's a continuous something nothing form formless the two dimensions and finding that yes although you are unique not only your appearance but also your life story nobody has quite the same life story as you basically in their deeper structure they are all very similar if not the same the deep structure of a life story any life story in any life story for example something goes wrong that makes it interesting if nothing went wrong there would be no story look at any film or any novel the deep structure in every film or every novel I can't think of any exception but there may be one or two but to watch those you would have to be really present if nothing goes wrong it's not interesting it's the moment something goes wrong the story starts any novel or any film look at it, doesn't matter what you can always say at some point she leaves him he dies they lose something they become ill something starts going wrong and that's why it's interesting and that's the life of form that's how it works and if you had a holiday in which absolutely nothing goes wrong it's conceivable although unlikely but it's conceivable it would be you wouldn't remember nothing but if something went very wrong you would remember it for the rest of your life and you could talk about it that happened that's the life of form so there's the uniqueness of your story on the one hand it's unique nobody has quite the same life story as you and yet deep down it's not that unique and yet also yet it's destined to dissolve very quickly just like a cloud every cloud is unique in that particular form but as you look at it it's already dissolving and changing so we honor the uniqueness of the form we honor the form that we are, not in essence but as we appear our life circumstances and the physical form without becoming trapped in that so this is why we are here to touch the formless within ourselves to be it, to recognize it and what do we use? we use the form as an entry point we are not saying although I'm not condemning that it's another way in some spiritual traditions they say do not look at beauty do not look at anything avert your eyes don't be seduced by sense perception they say just look at the floor all this they might say, they do it in some buddhist traditions, and I love buddhism it's beautiful all this is illusion in some way of course that's true it's all destined to dissolve very quickly, every form in that sense it is an illusion, it is a dream so don't look just don't get into sense perceptions just be conscious of consciousness that may work too it's another way of entering this perhaps is more accessible for humans that are alive now perhaps at least for those who are here beauty is hiding in every form and beauty is not the external appearance ultimately but the essence in each form, which is the same essence that you discover when you are conscious of the consciousness that you are, that is perceiving then you realize the same essence of consciousness is in that form taking temporary expression as that form and so it is the beauty lies in that the true essence of beauty is always beyond the form appearance, it's something that shines through the form and that is the same in humans true beauty in humans is not of the form, it shines through the form, you can sometimes see it even in people whose body is crippled you can sometimes see if they have surrendered you can see beauty shining through the form or people who are close to death that light shines through so sense perceptions as an entry point into yourself so not only do sense perceptions keep you present they are also an opening into the formless dimension which of course it is presence presence is formless unconditioned consciousness and then we have touch, a neglected sense perception relatively probably the first one in the evolution of the species probably the first sense perceptions was touch when little worms crawling and that was the beginning of a world arising that was a very little world at first so to occasionally pick something up and feel it fully it's beautiful and again you cannot feel it fully unless you're completely attentive to what it feels like and there's no need to label it just feel and who is it or what is it that feels who or what is it that makes the sense perception possible your presence consciousness itself who you are, the stillness in the background against which the sense perception happens and that if you can live like that in the two dimensions you are a master and you are a blessing on the planet because a human being who can live in the two dimensions not being seduced by form into believing that that's all there is and not yet disappearing into the formless and saying I'm not going to be bothered with anything anymore, I'm not going to wash my hands even anymore because it's all form, no be here as a bridge between the two dimensions the formless and the entire world here is lost in one in form we don't need to improve this is not a workshop where we try to improve the world of form and there's a place for that also that's good but what the world needs is for humans to find that hidden dimension the spiritual because that's what spiritual is spiritual is not a belief spiritual is the formless dimension in yourself and that's not something to think about it's something to experience at this moment sense perception background the I am presence it has no attributes it's not big or small or young or old it has no age or time to it and if you can go into the world and live and be in the two as a bridge then you affect the world of form, anybody who is rooted in eternity in essence will deal with and relate to the world of form in a different way and will affect the world of form so it's not just the two dimensions are not separate they hang together and anyone being in touch with that will change the world without needing to change it or wanting to change it he cannot or she or he or she cannot not change the world so you become a blessing when you are in touch with that which ultimately means yourself and then relate to people and continuously sense the background in any interaction sense the background of yourself as space and then in any interaction there's the spacious background of consciousness and there's the form there's the words that come there's the sense perception there's what you're talking about and you're not losing yourself in what you're talking about words come but as the words are spoken there's still a consciousness of consciousness stillness in the background there must be a very important message out there maybe what he's saying is it's time to wake up humanity needs to wake up he's so excited, I think that's what he's saying follow the sound with your attention until only attention remains which is presence the sound is form that which is there before and after the sound and underneath the sound is formless and now as you listen to the sound be aware of that which is listening that which makes the listening possible the I am presence form and formless and the loudspeaker out there represents the world which says this is so important you must give attention to this this really matters, absolutely and that's your challenge not to lose yourself in that you really have to drink coca cola, you must vote for this person you have to allow it you can't fight that because they're all fighting that creates the whole thing you can only watch it and be there as the watcher and then it changes without you wanting it to change thank you thank you just sit in the stillness just for a little while until you feel the body is getting up with some kinds of music particularly this kind the sounds always point to the silence so the when you listen to this kind of music the silence what is not there is more important more powerful than what is there it's not music that emphasizes the form in the case of music the form is sound so this kind of music does not emphasize the form as a lot of music does especially western music that can be beautiful too forms can be beautiful too but this does not emphasize the form there is only a bare minimum of form and your attention is being drawn to the formless the silence in between the sounds and underneath when you listen to that you can listen instead of listening to the sounds of the flute or whatever it is listen to the silent spaces to which all the sounds point then the act of listening becomes a meditation and you enter presence because the moment you pay attention to silence there is stillness in you and stillness is consciousness formless unconditioned the essence of you so one could say that kind of music brings out if you listen rightly brings out you the essence of you traditionally that kind of music has been played by meditating monks and then later musicians took over and they became good technically but very often the essence wasn't quite there anymore because in a subtle way it only seems to work when the person who is playing is in that state so that for example the way in which the sound of the flute subsides dies very subtle it goes from being manifested into unmanifested and then it takes you with it into the stillness now this is one example but amazingly the same thing operates in any human encounter interaction or relationship we already pointed to it yesterday is only the form there in the encounter the form, the thought forms are they interacting or is presence present in the interaction between you and another human being that is a qualitative difference that's enormous sometimes you may hear an interesting talk announced a dialogue between two theologians about something a very interesting topic the sacred in modern civilization or something like that and then you go and listen and you are disappointed because they're talking about it the sacred but it's all form but the sacred isn't actually present there they're only using words and concepts and yet the essence is not there there's no stillness and that's the case with a lot of even spiritual discourse sometimes people tell me they read an interesting book and then the author comes into town and gives a talk and they go there and then they're disappointed because the book was more interesting than the author the author didn't seem to embody what he or she talked about in the book and at other times they do it happens too but often people tell me that it wasn't the presence wasn't there and so that's the whole point of us being here is to access presence in ourselves access it deepen it live it that new dimension not new in terms of time because presence is timeless but new in the sense that new on the planet it's a relatively recent phenomenon maybe only started a few thousand years ago with isolated humans who accessed that dimension within themselves and then attempted to show it to others they immediately realized it is in everyone they immediately realized they are not special they realized I am not because presence manifested through this form it does not make this form special it does not make this person special in fact the opposite is the case it's because this form this person has lost the illusion of specialness that it could come through and sometimes people ask strange questions they ask, an interviewer asked me once how do you explain that it happened to you why did this shift happen to you can you explain don't you feel very lucky that it happened to you and of course there is only an error hiding in the question it's because the you recognized itself as insubstantial that it happened the you the me became transparent recognized it's nothingness it's really all it's non-specialness means nothingness specialness is always ego specialness means the form wants to emphasize itself in order to survive in order to have an identity of me one way or another through identifying with this or that and then at some point the recognition comes that that is an illusion so the awakening doesn't really happen to anybody it's when the no-bodiness is recognized then it's there it's simply an illusion dissolving and of course in some spiritual seekers they still feel the unconscious need to be special and the projection is that once I attain enlightenment awakening then I will be special and finally be myself and yet as long as that entity is there wanting to obtain something in the future the specialness that you are that has nothing to do with the ego specialness now I'm changing the terminology for a second you are very special but not more special than anybody else there is something absolutely precious at the core of your being maybe that's what the Tibetans refer to in the famous mantra om mani padme hum which speaks of the jewel in the lotus and that specialness is the very life the very consciousness that you are and it is if anything is divine if we use the term divine for anything it is that it is the formless essence of your being it is the indwelling God essence and really apart from that everything else is simply has a dream like quality dreamt by the divine a divine dream a dream of form so there can actually one can feel the true specialness that you can only sense when the pseudo specialness goes the pseudo specialness says I am more special than you or at least I'm trying to be the pseudo specialness can take strangest forms it can hide in many new forms when you think you've left it behind even that belief can already be a new specialness when you finally give away your Rolls Royce and your mansion and get on your bike and then all the other big cars go past you and you feel quite superior in a subtle way more subtle than before but the ego when the ego operates and you can observe it in those rare instances when the ego still operates in you there's always a subtle comparison of me with others and there's always a comparison implies inferior or superior you regard yourself as either inferior or superior compared to others and the ego is constantly on the lookout to see where it fits in it wants to be superior but often that doesn't work then it considers itself to be inferior with this strange unfulfilled longing to be superior and both are equally strong egos so somebody who feels inferior does not have a weaker ego people think people with strong egos are people who feel bigger than anybody else people who feel less than anybody else have an equally strong ego and people who feel too timid to speak up or maybe they don't have a strong enough no, their ego is very strong they just don't want to be they fear what happens to their ego when they speak up in public they fear what others may think of them that the image that others have of them may not be what they want what they desire for themselves is the image that they want for themselves so when you observe it it's good to observe the ego in oneself because the ability to observe it in yourself means you're not totally in the grip of it anymore so it doesn't mean you have failed the moment you observe the ego in yourself operating you may have just thought something or said something and suddenly something takes ah, ego and where does that realization come from? not from the ego, it comes from presence the arising presence it's only from the witnessing presence that you can be aware of a conditioned ego pattern and whatever you discover the more ego you discover in yourself the more successful you are in awakening and one could even say that the moment you have recognized the ego in you as ego it's not ego anymore because it's only truly ego when you are totally identified with that pattern so for example when you are discussing something with someone there's a group after dinner discussing some spiritual topic and you, somebody puts forward their opinion and then you feel a strong emotion coming up because you clearly recognize that that opinion is wrong at least from your point of view but and so there's immediately an identification with your mental position which is ego a mental position is a thought form this is how it is an opinion, a thought form so identification with a mental position is there which means the self has gone into the thought has incarnated one more time and it's already done that hundreds of times during that day has incarnated, you have reincarnated one more time into another thought form so instead of having broken the cycle of reincarnation you've readily gone into another one and then you put forward your opposing point of view not in a detached and relaxed way but with inattention that wants to show that you truly know but that person does not know and it's possible that at that moment or a few seconds later you recognize what's happening I can't even say that you recognize what you are doing because you are not doing it it happens the ego has a life of its own it's a pattern, collective pattern you are not doing it the ego happens and the ego only happens when you are asleep then it happens it's a collective conditioning nothing personal and then suddenly you see it oh or in the middle of an argument you see how strong the emotion is that goes with defending your point of view and sometimes even the voice goes up you raise your voice you become a very heated argument they call it and that's just a tiny the ego wants to be superior, it wants to show it's not enough to be superior you need to be seen to be superior and so there's the constant it's an uneasy existence as an ego because even a superior ego goes around fearing that it might be inferior in some way even if it thinks it's superior one could go on for hours and days and weeks talking about the ego and all that's really needed is to see it and then what's left is only a pattern that still has a certain momentum but is no longer renewing itself so ego is a mixture of mind patterns and emotions and so they form an entity an emotional, mental emotional entity one could say that shifts, it identifies sometimes it takes things on board and sometimes it gets rid of things that it just tries to doesn't want so what it identifies with can change but the core of it are certain basic identifications they vary from person to person but basically they only vary slightly it's identification so it's basically the same so you could you can identify with sometimes one can observe the ego can identify one moment it competes with a person and the next moment it identifies with that person, I knew a mother who whenever the mother was talking to other people about her daughter who married a rich husband she would incorporate her daughter into her self image and as soon after she met somebody would mention that her wealthy daughter and the mansion and so on and the yacht so you couldn't meet this woman for five minutes before she had mentioned her wealthy daughter so she incorporated that into her self image but when she actually visited her daughter she competed she resented that her daughter had married this rich husband but she hadn't and so there was a competition with her daughter and a lot of hostility so when she was with her daughter the ego was competing against the daughter when she was away from her daughter the ego incorporated her daughter and it's always identification with something that you are not but you're hoping that by adding it to who you think you are that you can grow in your sense of self and it works in the sense that you can grow in your sense of self but only in your illusory sense of self and so the ego traditionally there are only two ways for the ego to be transcended and that is it gets knocked out of you by life through the suffering or through the coming into contact with the spiritual teaching and usually the two go together but sometimes suffering is enough for some people and they don't need a teacher anymore life doesn't leave you any identifications it takes them away from you and then you're left with nothing you don't know who you are anymore and there you sit, everything has crumbled around you and maybe you don't even have much longer to live it's possible too, even future has been taken away and there you sit not knowing who you are anymore because all identifications have been removed and now this is no guarantee that now the ego is transcended because you could even there the ego could still form a new image of itself as someone who has been dreadfully wronged by life no person has had a worse fate than me and it's there you have another ego life has taken away all identifications and you have escaped you have suddenly immediately invented a new story for yourself which says you're the greatest victim of all of life and from then on you can have resentment against everything and everybody look at all these people, I hate them and God what you did to me, I'll never forget that and yet at other times it can happen that a new story is not invented the ego has come to an end and those people suddenly wake up and say where does that peace come from I feel so peaceful that's often the first question and they smile and they don't know why they smile and then somebody comes and say why are you smiling and say I don't know there are some humans coming into this world now some still have a heavy they inherit as I did as many of you did they inherit all the heavy ego structures that have built up over thousands and thousands of years and then it's painful you create suffering for yourself believing that life does it to you and then there's so much suffering that finally it dissolves you can't stand it anymore you can't live with myself anymore and you suddenly realize it's all self created but there are some humans coming into this world now who have relatively little ego here and there so they may not have to go what we had to go through and that's good some may be born into relatively conscious parents background environment some may come to talks at an early age and some don't need that at all and yet they are still in conflict with the surrounding culture because they are at school somewhere they are living this mad world and they may not necessarily be able to adjust to this world but they'll survive and the world won't they are part of what is stronger than the mad world that is arising now so ego one way of transcending ego is simply to recognize it in yourself that's already a transcendence the other is to be very conscious of the thoughts that go through your head because ego is thought, identification with thought plus the emotions that accompany those thoughts and that is our practice here it's not only recognizing ego when it appears it's also to be very much conscious of the root of ego and the root of ego is thought and identification with thought with thinking and ultimately the ego cannot go away it can perhaps disappear for brief moments but it cannot dissolve unless you go beyond compulsive thinking and that is our task so that we can more and more live in the state of no thought we've already suggested ways of entering the state of no thought which is called presence we can call presence we can call awareness we can call stillness, alert stillness not asleep stillness asleep stillness means you're falling below thought but to transcend thought is to rise above thought and then you realize whenever you think there is a diminished degree of alertness compared to the state of no thought where you have risen above thought when you look at a flower when you take one conscious step when you perform one conscious action conscious meaning you're totally there without the interference of mental labels without making something into a means to an end that's conscious that's completely present there you are awake and then thought comes in and you can sense the diminished degree of wakefulness as the moment thought identification with thought comes in and you can actually feel in yourself or observe in somebody else how they go from clarity to a dreamlike state which often means there's a problem that you need to solve there's a memory there's a future situation that you're thinking about you're moving into away from what is so we've suggested ways of sustaining without making an effort it's no effort you can't make an effort to be present a way of sustaining presence for more than a moment by conscious looking by conscious self sense perception by conscious action by conscious listening by consciously being in the body these are all ways of exiting the noise machine in the head and there's another one that will work for some of you but not for all and we cannot call it method it is the most direct way it's not a method because method implies there's a little bit of distance the most direct way is simply and some people will tell you you can't do that of course they tell you that because they couldn't do it one way simply to stop thinking because you decide that you want to stop thinking now that's an interesting one that requires a considerable degree of alertness sustained alertness if you can sustain alertness this is what people try to do when they practice meditation techniques but here I'm saying examine the possibility of entering that state without any technique and without any method simply by allowing yourself to be present and alert and it is you need effort is not involved and yet you need the attitude of a warrior you need the I occasionally use the expression the sword of presence and with that sword you cut through time because time is and thought go together if you remove time thought collapses also if you remove thought there's no more time there's only this moment because all past and all future are thought forms if anybody else knows a greater truth you can tell me now and can tell me that you have actually touched the future or experienced it some might tell me yes but I foresaw the future well when did you foresee it? in the now surely so you both if you have the ability to foresee the future when does that happen you foresee it at this moment and when it comes it's also this moment it's not philosophy it's too simple to be philosophy it is self evident so anything that's self evident cannot become philosophy no so I'm not saying that it is not possible to predict what we call the future but it's still always now that's all we need to know and recognize it's still always now so past and future only exist as thoughts in your head because in your experience actual experience direct experience all you have is the present moment ever that's all so past and future are abstractions mental abstractions the moment you stop thinking there's no past and future there is the enormous aliveness and vitality and intelligence of the present moment the power of life itself is there and the present moment before when you were absorbed in past and future and thinking the present moment seemed totally insignificant because you were concerned with the vastness of past and the vastness of future and me in the middle of all that and what looked like the smallest thing the present moment is really it's like splitting the atom present moment recognition means you discover that in the tiniest thing is concealed the most enormous amount of energy the atom is the present moment and it suddenly splits and reveals it is the very core of all energy the very heart of all life energy emanates from now the present moment and before it seemed so insignificant the tiniest thing so here we are splitting the atom but it's not going to be made into a weapon it's simply a because it cannot be a weapon weapon means always separation me against you so here we are recognizing thought and time go together we abolish time we abolish thought it doesn't matter where you start if you say there is only this moment automatically thinking subsides and you enter presence or if you say there is nothing to think about I'll just be still that's it and alert that's it no past, no future an enormous energy but subtle energy not gross it's not noisy energy it's not that energy so is it possible for some people it is they may not have realized that it is possible to simply stop thinking the entire message of some spiritual teachers is to stop thinking some of them never said it openly perhaps they didn't want to shock the audience the entire teaching of Krishnamurti can be reduced to don't think and the entire spiritual teaching of anybody can be reduced to don't think but Krishnamurti went about the roundabout way and said let's investigate can thought solve our problems now let's think about that no and there was one teacher my favorite quote by that teacher Nisargadatta Maharaj who wrote I am that he didn't write it, he spoke it his definition of presence or meditation which is the same what is meditation, what is presence and he was a radical teacher he was very much like a Zen teacher he would shout at you so his definition was simply the radical refusal to harbor thoughts now this is not I am inviting you that is one way but it is not for everyone there is another related way that is open to more people and that is the discovery that already in your life there are many moments of no thought you just hadn't noticed because if there were not many brief moments of no thought you would be on the verge of insanity if not insane it is out of the brief gaps of no thought that a sense of aliveness arises that is still there even in people whose mind is very active where a sense of occasional glimpses of joy arise occasional glimpses of peace arise and there are humans who don't have these gaps anymore because their mind is continuously they are very very unhappy and some go insane and some commit suicide it is not that they don't have the stillness, it is covered up continuously but in still the majority of humans there are gaps of no thought and they never noticed and the wonderful thing is when you make that conscious you notice that there are gaps of no thought then the gaps become longer they become conscious because one is so humans are so identified with mind to the thinking mind the gaps when you are not thinking are totally meaningless it doesn't even know they are there and it cannot do anything with them so you cannot remember that you had gaps of no thought except sometimes perhaps when they were extremely more prolonged than others you might remember that once you climbed a mountain and it took you 4 or 5 hours to get to the top and the exertion, the physical exertion was such that you just couldn't think anymore and when you finally arrived at the top there was total stillness and at that moment the sun rose and there you stood and you remember it for the rest of your life the incredible sense of aliveness that you experienced there and you experienced it because there was complete stillness but I'm not talking about these great realizations that also of course come and go but the little ones for example, every time you look at something every time your glance falls upon something, whatever it may be a person an object a tree a flower, the sky at the first moment of perception there is no thought, there is always a gap when you first perceive something there is a gap of about a second sometimes two seconds before some kind of naming comes in which is thought and most people are not aware that that is there if you become aware that the moment you start to listen to a sound before the mind names it there is a gap of pure perception and that is there and it is out of these gaps during the day that you still find life worth living it is not because your thought is justifying to yourself, well it's still worth living because I might still make it it's a secondary that doesn't really work that well and a point comes when the mind will tell you it's too late now, I'm not going to make it so you cannot life cannot be made into it's worth living by some kind of mental justification why you should still be here it works for a little while, it's a substitute but to realize that life is worth living, that life is good beyond the forms because when you look at the forms of life you might draw the conclusion that life is not good because all the forms die sooner or later but to realize that life is good in essence and that in essence there is nothing that is not life and the realization that death is not the opposite of life, that life has no opposite, only birth has an opposite and that's death the realization that there is a goodness to life despite the fact that everything around you dies, despite the fact that even your physical form is already condemned to death everyone everyone despite the fact that somebody close to you might disappear at any moment, including yourself you could slip on a banana skin when you walk out of here and that's the end of it you don't know or I could and does it mean that life is bad the fact that forms are impermanent that they're not reliable that all structures are unstable that the stability of the physical universe is only a delusion when you go into big cities, you see the big buildings that's going to last forever not at all, it could dissolve at any moment occasionally we see that when huge buildings collapse and everybody is dreadfully shocked that looked so permanent and yet underneath that so here we have the impermanent nature of all the it's a universe in flux it's not stable the world of form and it's a dance a dance of form but hiding underneath all the forms of life is life the one unmanifested still, ever present essence and you that reveals itself the moment the forms, the primordial forms which are thought forms subside then the clear sky within is suddenly visible the clear sky the still space of presence and so that is to be realized and from that comes that spaciousness within out of that comes an intense sense of aliveness beingness and there lies the realization that life is good despite appearances and there comes the realization that even death is part of the goodness of life and death is no longer the great monster that lurks somewhere that you need to shut out and mustn't think about that and hide all the dead bodies that's what our civilization does they not only hide the dead bodies they even put make up on dead bodies life is good that realization comes when you realize it's actually wonderful to realize how impermanent all the forms around you are to watch dissolving forms means the formless comes up in you it's only from there that you can watch that and not react that is the deathless and that the deathless is there when in the moment that thought which is primordial form subsides and so the goodness of life is felt the more you have space inside you I mean everybody has equal space but the more you know it the more you realize it because if the fact that everybody has exactly the same space within as their essence even within and without ultimately is meaningless it's very much like saying everybody is tremendously wealthy but some people have forgotten their bank account number and if you've forgotten your bank account number that has a hundred million dollars in it you're poor or are you wealthy it's a question of perspective this is not a good analogy because a hundred million dollars would make no difference to you really to the joy of life whether you know that life is good so be aware that already that space of no thought is already in you many times during the day and again beware of sense perception and see when you first listen when you first look at something even when you first touch something there is a brief moment of no naming simply a still perception and that's where you where truly there's direct experience at that moment the moment you start thinking and naming it's no longer direct experience it's an abstraction and you've brought in the past now thought can still operate in you but it is no longer self-serving it still operates when it is needed and those humans who can think well there are not many humans who can think well most are simply burdened with noise in the head those humans who think creatively who have original thoughts not deep thoughts they don't exist deep thoughts don't exist but an original thought can come out of the depth of stillness every thought is a form it can point to the depth but in itself it cannot be deep no thought is deep so humans who can think originally original thinkers creative thinkers inspiring thinkers the way they think is they enter the state of alertness and many of them they don't even know that that's what they do they enter the state of alertness and they step back into no thought very briefly and then the words come when they have uttered a certain sequence of words they step back into no thought briefly, you may not even notice it it's not that they become still and suddenly start meditating they step back into no thought this is brief, it could only be only two seconds and some of them may feel the inner body and they don't even know it they just feel alive and then out of that aliveness come words but that aliveness is still vital, it is still and vital, it is and there's the primordial intelligence there that is consciousness itself that they touch also artists create out of that they become still and then it happens so people who think creatively it simply happens it's not even they don't think it's something that happens by itself it's a beautiful process normal humans who don't they are burdened by totally repetitive thoughts always the same kind of thing going round and round in the head and there are many humans who have not had one original thought in 20, 30, 40 years why not? because they cannot step back not for a moment out of the noise machine out of the continuous formation of thoughts and repetition of the same thoughts cannot step back into stillness and for even 5 seconds and then if they did for the first time they would have an original and a life thought I was amazed some years ago when my mother came to visit me and my mother like everybody else is burdened with a noise machine in the head she came to stay with me for a couple of weeks and first I was shocked because there's so much noise talking and continuous and it's not personal it's not because my mother is deficient it's simply the human condition and I just all I could do was sit there and be and listen and allow her to go through the motions of speaking and it's always the same it's normal too and then I was still and I was still, still, still and at some point after a few days she became suddenly still and she didn't speak for about a minute and then suddenly came what she said then I found amazing what she said then is the beginning of all spiritual seeking is the beginning of all philosophy lies at the very beginning of all that and she said isn't it strange we are born and then we die that was an original true thought and that came perhaps because some of the stillness activated for a moment that dimension in her and so, ah, yes so even the noisiest and that question is more important than the answer just to dwell with that question you don't even need to answer it on a conceptual level just have that question there and allow the strangeness of birth and death to be there why do we need to explain it you can arrive at a knowing that is beyond concepts by simply allowing the mystery of life to be there we are born and then we die so to be creative a creative thinker it's a continuous moving back and forth between nothingness emptiness you dissolve into nothingness and then form comes back nothingness, no thingness thingness no thingness thingness because every thought is a thing not a physical thing but it's a form and a form is a thing so discover that is how to think creatively but essential here for you to discover that already that dimension is present in your life it may be there when you open your eyes in the morning you wake up and there's a moment of when you haven't remembered, you're not remembered your past and you're not thinking about the future and you haven't remembered your problems there's simply aware presence ah, there it is now it is whether or not you achieve mastery in this or that doesn't really matter some people achieve mastery in kicking a ball or throwing a ball and in there they have if they're doing it well they're doing it without thought, in other words they're not doing it at all it's happening they link into a greater whole that is performing through them, a greater intelligence is acting through them to see that in action is always beautiful and most humans love watching it, they don't know why I always say why otherwise would they watch people either kicking or throwing or hitting a ball for hours and hours, well ego comes in too because you identify with a particular team and then the team loses and you go you're depressed for three days our team has lost we have been defeated so it's there are different approaches to the same you can look simply for where the spaces already are in your life and as they become conscious more conscious they become deepened and prolonged and then if that works for you but to simply as Nisargadatta said the refusal, the radical refusal to harbor thoughts don't misunderstand that it does not involve willpower as such as we know it it does not involve opposing something it does not involve fighting thought you cannot fight against a thought you could for a little while you could suppress a thought but while you suppress the thought more and more thoughts accumulate behind that one and eventually the lid will blow off you could say I'm not going to think and you will notice your body will become tense and you may stop breathing and it may work for a little while but that's not it, it's not the arising of presence, it is thought trying to suppress thought and then the slightest thing happens while you're doing that, somebody knocks at the door leave me alone can't you see I'm meditating so that's it can be misunderstood, that's perhaps why Krishnamurti never said it there is no effort involved and yet there is intense energy there your body is quite relaxed in that state but you are present throughout the body, every cell is alive with presence every cell alive with presence and you sense the entire body and it is simply the alertness that does it, not some kind of willpower not some kind of wanting, the alertness is there that is such that it doesn't allow thought to come and if thought does come it comes into the field of alertness which is so bright this is an analogy it's so filled with light that the thought comes and the moment it reaches the alertness it dissolves in it it goes and sometimes you can notice a thought coming up and you can you know that the eyes and the brain are very closely related they say the cells of the eyes are the same as the brain cells I don't know if that's true the you can blink if a thought tries to creep up into alertness and you notice that a thought is creeping up you blink once and you blink it away, it's gone it's a strange that's a a wonderful practice is to be practiced with your partner or anybody that you know well or once you get used to it even anybody that you don't know well is to look into each other's eyes it's not called staring it's called gazing because staring is the I'm going to outstare you staring is ego who can last longer and so on no it's we could call it gazing in some spiritual circles it is done a lot in some spiritual circles it is overdone but there's a beauty to it when it's happens naturally or as together with your partner someone you look into each other's eyes for a long time and the point of it is to share the space of thoughtless presence where you merge beyond thought the point of it is not to think about the other person or yourself but simply to abide in no thought while the looking happens and you merge virtually because when thought doesn't operate there's no thought of me and the other anymore there's simply a oneness that arises a space of presence arises between you and if thoughts do come in you can either recognize them as thoughts and say they're not important it's just a thought and you allow it to pass through or you can blink it away just once or twice one blink is enough usually a little thought comes, one blink it's gone or it comes and it drifts away and to realize thought always pretends to be important and so you have to recognize it's non-importance which is actually the case most of the time so this is a beautiful practice with anybody but there needs to be usually an agreement with the other person laughter sometimes in some spiritual circles or meditation or retreat places a newcomer comes and they've never been there before and the first person they meet they say hello my name is such and the other person goes laughter it can be very beautiful and it can also like everything else it can degenerate into something that you feel you should be doing to fit in or to be spiritual or whatever anything can become that so and then also once you can actually the same happens when you look once you practice thoughtless present looking you can actually do it with people who don't know that you are doing it but not in the way I just described it's briefer when they talk you go to the supermarket or the store and they say okay that'll be ten dollars fifty and you look at that person and for three seconds there's no thought they never know it they think you're working out in your head whether this is correct or laughter or you meet somebody and you shake hands and for a moment, two seconds, three seconds there's simply there's an energy that comes with that the ego can get in there and say I'm going to do something to you and immediately that's not it at all that's immediately mind energy so the ego can come in and say I'm going to make you present or it can say I'm going to heal you all you need give me three seconds and I'll heal you no there's no wanting in that there's no I don't want anything I don't even want the other person to be more conscious it's simply joyful to join with that person in presence yes of course it has an effect but there's no wanting in it, I don't need that person to change and that's why I'm doing it it is a joyful thing, it is a joining and it's joyful and that changes all your interactions once you're able to look at another human being and remain free of thought only just briefly enough a completely different energy comes into the interaction which has nothing to do with thought energy, mind energy yes, and then you speak another way, very important now again to bring that dimension into your life to invite it into your life not to create it, you don't create stillness or spaciousness because it's already there, you already discover it so don't think you need to bring it about as such it's there when you speak to someone usually it consists of several sentences, it's a mind stream you're telling something, something needs to be done or this or that come to the end of that particular mind stream as soon as possible and then step back otherwise you go on and on or the other person takes over and then it goes on and then you take over and then she takes over or he takes over and some people don't even need the other person they're happy to be engaged they're happy with a monologue all they want is somebody to be there they can talk at and it goes on and on but it's very easy once you're in a conversation with somebody for the mind stream to take over the interaction completely and then you talk and talk and talk and the other person says oh yeah that's it and then you go no space so to bring also step back here the similar thing that you do when you wish to think creatively, stepping back when the mind, you've said what you had to say why carry on step back into presence you've said your bit step back into presence if only for three or four seconds maybe then you speak again but it's also there, finding the gaps finding the gaps of no thought in any interaction, even when you go to Christmas dinners and talk to your family and so on, back to no thought where you're simply then you look at the other person again and in the looking there is a stillness and there is presence very different energy so that's important so that you don't get lost every time you open your mouth as somebody said to me I can be very spiritual when I sit alone in my room but the moment I start dealing with people and talking to people I lose it and of course that's when you open your mouth then the mind stream gets even stronger in many people because it reinforces itself through the other person so it's always a stepping back into the no thingness that is the essence of who you are and then you're back into form it's a dance, life is a dance between form and formlessness well that's how life that is how when life is lived as it could be lived beautifully, it is that for most humans it's not a dance between form and formless for most humans it's being lost in form and feeling the burden of that they haven't found yet the secret of stepping back because if you know the secret of stepping back into the no thingness into stillness, into presence then the world of form which before was a very frustrating place awful place really because things go wrong continuously in the world of form and if there's nothing beyond form you cannot depend on anything out here you can't trust anybody or anything and everything lets you down eventually because nothing lasts every situation lets you down because it's not fulfilling ultimately for a little while every person lets you down because either they leave you or they die so you can't in the world of form on the level of form alone it's not that reliable the world of form, of course not it's not meant to be reliable that's not how it works but when you are able to step back then it's actually a place that you can enjoy because your sense of self, your identity your sense of beingness your peace your aliveness does not depend on it anymore on the forms in your life you enjoy them but you don't depend because the very aliveness that you sense and feel and are, derives from the formless so from there you can enjoy the world of form it's a beautiful place too you could also reject it and then go totally into the formless but as long as you have a physical body or seem to have, why not enjoy the world of form while you're here and it's wondrous and beautiful and you don't need, no longer need to demand that the world, which is the world of form should satisfy you or make you happy because it won't you make me happy the world owes me no it doesn't the world doesn't owe you anything the world is supposed to make me happy and give me fulfillment no, fulfillment cannot be derived from anything in the world it is derived directly from the essence of your being at this moment then all the things of this world will give you a secondary fulfillment they will be enjoyable because you don't depend on them you can enjoy them you can enjoy the Rolls Royce you don't even have to give it away but if you decide to give it away you can enjoy the bicycle without needing to compare in any way the fact that you drive a Rolls Royce doesn't mean you're superior in any way to the next person on a bicycle or the other way around and you help the people that want to make a difference this is a great thing the main thing in this life is I want to make a difference in this world you cannot really make a difference as long as all the mind structures in you have not transcended the collective mind structures that have been running this world for thousands of years and you can see what that produced by reading a history book or watching TV tonight well, not here, but at home so you can see what kind of world that has produced you can only make a true difference by changing inside by accessing that by going through that shift in consciousness and then no matter where you go you make a difference you go into a supermarket you make a difference there you make a difference at work you make a difference at the conference table you make a difference wherever you are your very presence makes a difference and what in addition you do actively that varies from person to person whether you actively go and help people on one or the other level that depends one person is called upon to do this another person is called upon to do that you might be drawn to go to some country where people are starving and help there or you may continue to have your hairdressing salon and everybody who comes to you feels better when they leave not because they look better because they feel better inside we are entering the phase of silence from now except for this person on the chair and except for when perhaps tomorrow morning tomorrow afternoon we may ask questions here or if you go and have a session with someone if you need to say a few words that's fine too but I would recommend to observe the silence between now and Wednesday morning when you get up that's one day and two nights now one thing for those of you who have not experienced retreat retreatees, retreat attendants participants you may find it at first very awkward to sit at a table in the dining hall and nobody is speaking you may find it awkward if you are sharing a room to be with one or two or three people and you can't talk to them and you can sense that awkwardness perhaps, it's the same awkwardness that you feel when you go into a small elevator and somebody else steps in and you're both standing there and it's going and usually one of them will break the silence because they can't stand it anymore you cannot endure ten floors of silence and usually one person will break it and will make a comment about the weather that's the first thing it's wet today isn't it and the other person is relieved and says yes it is and I think it's going to rain even more okay that's it, it worked so if you feel the awkwardness what do you do then very simple watch the feeling of awkwardness and allow it to be there so that you become the space around the awkwardness there's the awkwardness and there's oh I feel awkward and then you feel it you feel what it is that you feel so you bring consciousness to it and you allow, you don't say I shouldn't be feeling awkward because he talked about it no I'm not saying don't feel awkward I say when you feel awkward know that you're feeling awkward and say it's okay to feel awkward I allow myself to feel awkward the allowing also brings the space whatever you allow there's immediate allowing any condition, internal or external saying I allow it to be there because it's here now what can I do, it's the form of this moment you allow it the allowing means immediately there's a space around it and you are the allowing space because space contains it all space allows everything to be there and that is another way of course accessing spaciousness or presence no matter what the condition is the moment you allow the condition, external or internal awkwardness, whatever the moment you say oh there it is, I can feel it and it's okay the moment you allow it, you have transcended the condition because you've become the consciousness in which the condition appears whereas before you were trapped in the condition and you were little limited by the condition yourself was in the condition your sense of self you incarnated into the condition and now you step out of the condition and allow the condition you are the space for all conditions and that's beautiful and once you allow it you transcend and that means when you transcend a condition for a little while it's still there and then usually it dissolves because you are not feeding it anymore if you want to prolong a condition, you resist it external or internal if you want to prolong it, you create inner resistance or some mental resistance, I'm feeling this but I shouldn't be unnecessary, allow this moment to be as it is no matter what form it takes and if you do that, that alone takes you to the formless that alone would take you to the formless because the formless is the allowing the space that is there the moment you allow it's a stepping back from the condition stepping, I could almost say you take the self out of the condition, you take the self out of the condition and the self is recognized as space, not as something, the self is recognized in its essence as no thingness that is the self that the Hindu teachings talk about, the great self, the one self and then there's a little self that identifies with a condition a thought, an emotion, a form a car, whatever that's the little self and that the Buddha recognized that as an illusion, Buddha said there is no self, what people regard as themselves as their self is an illusion there is no self and he's right because he was speaking about the self as form any form is not who you are, any condition is not who you are so although the Hindu teachings and the Buddhist teachings seem to contradict each other they're talking about the same thing, they're just using different terms because all that can be verified in your immediate experience, they are not abstract notions to believe in for many people they are, they say the Buddhist says there is no self and then the Hindu scholar comes and says yes there is a great self, Krishna said find out for yourself before you discuss so the awkwardness will go away if you allow it to be there and then actually it's quite nice to be in silence together, in stillness together and to eat your meal one spoonful at a time and taste it perhaps even more don't make a ritual out of anything don't say I'm going to chew 25 when you are in silence the mind will sometimes invent games to keep itself busy it will devise its own crossword puzzles in the head and then you start counting the people in the room and you become Mr. Bean Mr. Bean is so funny because there is always a basic truth of how the mind operates and he just exaggerates it a little and talking about crossword puzzles, don't go into your room and get the crossword puzzles out watch the mind as the Buddhists say the Buddhists in Buddhist monasteries when they want you to shut up, they say watch your mind so while we are in silence watch your mind be the watcher of your mind be the witnessing presence not only of the thoughts and you recognize the thoughts as thoughts especially while we are silent now don't take your thoughts too seriously they are only thoughts when you take them seriously then they get bigger and bigger when you recognize a thought as a thought it comes and goes, it's harmless there is no self in it if there is no self in thought every thought is quite harmless nothing wrong with it it doesn't really matter let it drift in, out be in the body as much as possible sense perceptions look, watch listen, smell be an alert presence not a heavy person walking through the gardens here a heavy me with a heavy past and a heavy problematic future that you carry all of them in your head be simply be an alert presence be consciousness, be a field of consciousness that walks through the gardens and there may be one or two rebellious people here who are saying, I'm not going to be told what to do and when you see them in the dining hall they say, ok, I'll have some juice now or they address you and say what did you think of this afternoon session did you get anything out of it to which the correct answer of course is nothing didn't get anything out of it laughter and so when we talk again it'll be Wednesday morning well, we will talk here it'll be Wednesday morning yes, tomorrow is Tuesday we'll be meeting here twice tomorrow in the afternoon we may ask questions that may involve words usually it does the most pointless talk by the way especially on retreats or anywhere is talking about presence what it is what I think it is laughter you're either present or not that's all laughter the mind cannot, can never really understand what presence is so don't try to sometimes, there was a retreat two years ago, after a week finally one mind which is always a human mind so it's nothing personal asked me would you please define in more detail and more clearly what presence is we had practiced presence for a whole week now the mind demanded a more clearer definition of presence so that it can put it in its pocket and take home a set of concepts and say okay now I know what presence is now what's the next workshop I can go to laughter if your body wants to move I believe there's a movement class following this and you can be present body can be present I can feel that my body wants to move but I may not come to the class laughter Tai Chi is a beautiful thing some people say that Tai Chi originated when thousands of years ago some people watched the movement of animals and imitated the movement of animals that's one theory, this may be correct another possibility is because nobody really knows another possibility is that it originated as spontaneous movement in a human being who was totally present and then a spontaneous movement happened he or she didn't know why simply the body went into a slow dance like movement to express the joy of presence this is how I see it started who knows it happened to me once and it happened to Kim I observed her, she suddenly started moving and she had never studied before when she did that, never done Tai Chi before and it was better than Tai Chi because it was totally spontaneous it came out of presence maybe it's in her genes it came out of presence and there was that spontaneous that movement and then that was thousands of years ago perhaps the first person went into that in China and there were probably some bystanders said what's that person doing it looks incredible and then perhaps it happened again, the same bystanders came and looked and those bystanders became the first practitioners of Tai Chi because they said we want to learn that and then they got a piece of paper if they had paper, or whatever they had and said ok, left arm goes up now now the right leg goes up slightly and then it goes down again and then later they started teaching it and miraculously even though that was turning it around it still worked in some way so it works both when the movement comes from the inside out as a spontaneous expression of presence joyful presence and it also seems to work from the outside in if you do these movements you enter presence seems to work both ways well if you do them rightly and you're not thinking while you're doing them of course if you're thinking ok my arm needs to be there now and you're not present in that movement because you're already there thank you as we sit here let's see if we can be aware of let me speak as you see if I can be aware of the presence that I am at this moment see if I can be aware of of the essence of my identity which is not my past which is not my thoughts or my emotions or what happened to me but something deeper that which is hiding in my story as the sense of I but usually gets mixed gets mixed up with my story it's like one could say it is the light of consciousness and that light that pure light gets mixed up with form one could use the analogy of a film projector the light is behind the film and there are forms that obscure the light in one way or another and everybody this is a strange thing everybody is aware of who they are of their innermost sense of self or identity but through the distorted form of their story, their life their thoughts and emotions and memories and identifications which are thoughts so when we ask who are you, usually you mention the identifications that consciousness identified with I am, that you give your name and then what you do or what you have or own or status or whatever it is that you identify with and then you present that as who you are I am a such and such I am a somebody I am a self-made millionaire I am a spiritual seeker and the self-made millionaire the spiritual seeker I am somebody who failed miserably another story all the stories and then in there somewhere is hiding the sense of me, of self and that is precious everybody knows that there is something precious that's to do with who they are people are so afraid that they lose themselves at some point and so hiding in the story is the I am that is nothing to do with time beingness presence consciousness itself before it becomes something is born into a form a thought form an emotional form and so one could ask what is it in your life or in my life talking as you what is it in my life that I can be absolutely sure of and some philosophers have asked that question what is it that I cannot doubt and they realized and scientists also asked that question and they realized that almost everything you can doubt you can doubt whether this room exists the people in this room because you have no direct experience of it because it's there is an optical your eye is a lens and so it's like a camera lens and the picture that it captures is projected onto a screen behind it, is then translated into nerve impulses that are sent to the brain and then in some strange way the brain reassembles certain nerve impulses that come through the senses in some way and forms a world out of that, a reality now what relationship does that have with what's actually out there, we don't know nobody really knows whether there's actually anything out there or whether it is simply something that is being dreamt the brain creates its dream or we share the same dream but we don't want to degenerate now into philosophy all I'm saying is you can doubt everything, including that the whole life up to now that you experienced as your life ever happened it could be a dream too it's very similar, you wake up in the morning and sometimes just before you're completely awake you remember the day before and you might think, was that the dream or did that happen but everything in the past is of the nature of a dream that dissolves and then you say, was that real or did I dream that when you arrive home after this retreat, you open your front door and then you put your luggage down and you look around and say did I ever leave did I dream all that because everything dissolves so quickly it's in the nature of a dream so you can doubt everything except one thing that you are because if you were not, the dream could not arise, the dream can only arise in the field of consciousness, there needs to be a consciousness that enables the dream to be if it is a dream or that enables your life to be there needs to be some dreamer a dream when you wake up in the morning and you remember a dream and you say it's unreal or it's only a dream well there must be something real in it the consciousness that enabled the dream to be that was real the light in which the dream appeared which is the light of consciousness and so your innermost who you are you can doubt on the level of form everything except that you are, there is beingness or presence there you don't know what you are perhaps you don't know what that is but without it nothing could be the light of consciousness I am so that is the I am that is hiding in the story the story says I am this or I am that you identify with this you identify with that that's form and you can doubt all that and it all passes very quickly but something that you cannot doubt is that you are you may be dreaming of this but you are and you may not be able to name what you are or who you are because in the moment you name it you have given the formless form so can we remain as the formless sense of I am at this very moment to sense your beingness or presence that has nothing to do with your past in fact let's pretend for a moment that you have no past and no name because it's ephemeral anyway, what is the name it's a sequence of sounds that your parents invented for you and then you believed in it so let's pretend for a moment that you have no past or you can't remember it because if you don't remember it, it's gone anyway and you don't have a name and remain with a bare sense of being and that is what underlies all the forms in your life no name no past no future do you know who you are?

No that's self-realization you have to become happy with not knowing who you are so you enter the unknown dimension of yourself all you know is that you are but you don't know what or who you are because if you think you know what or who you are you've already limited yourself you remain as consciousness and even that's too much to say that but I say it anyway because if we call it something we've already limited it but as long as you're aware that's only a point I cannot explain it by saying consciousness I cannot explain who you are by saying you are consciousness it's only a pointer consciousness is only a name somebody else calls it Tao, somebody else calls it something else it is better to let that be nameless simply it is simply knowing that you are but not knowing what or who you are and not needing to escape immediately or again into knowing and that's the great people find it hard to live with not knowing and this is why there's the compulsion to name as soon as an experience appears in front of you you need to name it it's the mind that needs to feel secure by interpreting it and saying what it is and so we are becoming familiar here first basically with not knowing who we are because you cannot know yourself as an object of knowledge not the essence because you are that through which everything is known you are the knower itself the very basis for knowing and that you cannot make into an object and from the point of view of the mind that sense of being as a presence is a state of not knowing of ignorance but only from the point of view of the mind but the mind and the egoic mind, the ego that's associated with mind identification is afraid of that it thinks you will lose yourself but you don't and once you are comfortable with not knowing who you are but simply realizing that you are that is what we described earlier as the background to all your experiences and perceptions the I am which if we want to describe it to give you another pointer it is a sense of spaciousness space also you cannot describe you cannot grasp an inner spaciousness the I am-ness beingness presence so when you look at it we talked this morning about sense perception looking at a plant a blade of grass, a tree, a landscape the clouds, listening to the rain listening to the birds whatever it may be and knowing yourself as the background or the stillness which is the same as the I am one could say that is the another analogy it is the screen on which the world of form temporarily appears so when people meditate then they attempt to get to that realization not through the sense perceptions which is another way they attempt to get to that directly to sense the presence that they are as consciousness and here we are doing it with our eyes open while somebody is speaking not somebody but there is a voice and that is enormously even a glimpse of that gives you a sense of intense aliveness because what you are getting a glimpse of by the way, whenever we talk about it we are distorting it and we are creating a duality where there isn't one you are not getting a glimpse of it it gets a glimpse of itself you are getting a glimpse of it there is a sense of aliveness subtle but strong it has nothing to do with the form whether the form is 20 years old or 95 years old it has nothing to do with that nothing to do with your achievements or non-achievements or what you have identified with direct sense of aliveness the joy of being beingness everything else that people seek in the world of form is a substitute because they haven't found that themselves there they haven't found the life what Jesus called eternal life they haven't found that their innermost sense the consciousness that they are and that is obscured by forms and so they look for more forms they are looking for that for themselves in the world of form and that's why living in this world for most people is such a frustrating experience because the world cannot give you what you are looking for ultimately and they don't even know that that is what they are looking for they think they are looking when I have accumulated those forms then I will be full and complete not realizing their very search for the fullness and completeness in the world of form is obscuring the fullness and completeness that's already there at this moment as their very life their very essence their very consciousness the very search for it obscures the reality of it now the search for it in the future obscures the reality of it now and so this is why as I said this morning sometimes when you obtain something that you thought would fulfill you for a moment it does seem to fulfill you if you thought your life would be fulfilled when you own your Rolls Royce or whatever it is or the mansion or finally appear on the front page of People magazine then for a moment when you see your picture on the front page of People magazine you will feel you have arrived and you might feel joy and that's because for a moment you're not looking for something more in the future the search for more forms to find yourself through has for a moment subsided and there you are and that won't last long because if you open People magazine and start to read what they write about you you will soon come down from that state because it will be completely distorted they will have created an image first they build somebody up and then they enjoy tearing them down that's how it works and that's why people love reading it because their emotions get stimulated by it another substitute for the true feeling of aliveness it's another substitute for their true being their true reality and so a large part of our civilization is there to provide people with substitutes to give them a second or third hand sense of aliveness of beingness of who they are through this and through that stimulus it starts when young children become more and more clever at devising stimulus because people there's more and more demand for stimulus because the restlessness and the discontent and the unhappiness are growing and so they say ok we must find something all these children are unhappy we must give them video games to keep them busy and give them stimulus so they at a young age they get already addicted to that input and it gives them it's a drug, it gives them it's a substitute feeling of aliveness the moment they stop playing they become restless again and the body twitches and then they go to the TV this is what our civilization has come to loss of forgetfulness we could say of being, there cannot be loss of being because the essence of who you are cannot be lost but we could call it forgetfulness of being and then large part of the civilization is engaged in finding substitutes, substitute stimulus drugs things proliferation of things in this world promises that through this or through that you will feel better you will be more more complete you will define your identity through this or that possession and people unconsciously buy it they buy it in both senses of the word entertainment industry a lot of it is violent so it feeds the emotion the old emotion the pain body substitutes so here freedom is only in finding that which everybody is seeking in the wrong place future that everybody is seeking through some form the formless through some form and it's right here of course you will function differently when that becomes a living reality in your life which we could call which we could call the feeling of yourself the sense of your very being we could call the space in the background the stillness within all the same thing the same null thing of course how you conduct your life will be different when you are connected with that dimension you have one foot in that dimension the other foot in this dimension and in any situation there's a question and here's another pointer we had I'm never upset for the reason I think we had what's my relationship with this moment and another pointer now is there space in my perception or my relationship or in what I'm doing at this moment is there space what does that mean we already have touched upon this when we look at something the space the still space is the background to the looking and to sense that as yourself while you look the form and the formless that is the light of consciousness itself and now to sense the still background that you are is very subtle at first because the mind may look for it and you can't find it like that it's in the background as a simple nothingness that's why the Buddhists call it emptiness it's perceived from the point of view of mind and form as the nothingness in the background the no thingness in the background that's always there in everyone even in the most insane person the no thingness is there in the background it cannot be destroyed in the same way that the space in this room cannot be destroyed no matter what you do to this room you cannot destroy the essence of this room which is space you can destroy the walls but you can make a lot of noise in here and yet at some point you'll have to stop making noise and the stillness and spaciousness of this room is immediately there again so it's always don't think you have lost it or too much has happened in my life I've done too many bad things it cannot be it can neither be destroyed nor marred in any way the essence of your being but it is from the point of view of this gross material reality and even gross mental and emotional reality from that point of view it is elusive subtle can never grasp it and yet it's always there in the background as the stillness and it's there when you look at a plant and you can sense there's a stillness it's not me as a person looking at a plant when there's no thought movement there's simply a field of stillness against which the perception of the plant arises and it may sometimes happen that you sense I'm not just talking now as I talk you can actually sense that it may sometimes happen that that sense of stillness against which a sense perception happens you feel that much more strongly than the sense perception itself, it is almost it can happen that the sense perception recedes although it may be very beautiful the beingness can be so overwhelming that all sense perceptions become surface phenomena ripples on the surface of being because the vastness of stillness that you are is so great that the entire world of form is no more than that ripples imagine being being a ball it's not because it has no shape and there's a stillness pervading the entire sphere but on the external surface of the sphere there's a ripple movement, continuously changing that's the world of form and in the depths of the sphere there's the eternal, timeless stillness and so most people are lost on the surface of things it's the world we call that the world Jesus calls it the world they are lost in the world which is the surface layer of reality we could say and that's all there is and then life becomes dramatic and frustrating and ultimately very unfulfilling so much that you want to get out not realizing that you really want to get in so when you look at a landscape a tree a flower the flame of a candle whatever it may be you may sense sometimes that we talked about it in terms of two dimensions, you may sense that the dimension of stillness becomes so vast that what you are looking at or what you are listening to is relatively insignificant, it's just a little ripple and then you may sometimes want to close your eyes and be more completely one with that but it's not yet time to completely disappear or merge with it because for a while we are here with a physical body what looks like a physical body and we are here meant to be a bridge between the world of form and the formless so the question is vital not only in your sense perceptions space is there space, where is the space can I sense the space it's a little pointer and then that's the I am it is vital in any activity that you do, now so far we have spoken about it in terms of what we could call passive perception listening, seeing touching, smelling but it is vital in any activity because that is something people not only lose themselves in sense perceptions they lose themselves even more in doing, in what they do so in any activity whether it's a manual activity then it's easier to stay present if it's manual, easier to have a sense of beingness and presence while the movement happens and if that is there then the manual activity, whatever you may be doing crafting something doing gardening some artistic creation that you do with your hands anyway it may be and there if you have the two dimensions then whatever you are creating whatever activity it is that you are engaged in will reflect that dimension if you are in touch with it while you do, while there is a spaciousness there is not little thought, there is simply aware presence that flows into the doing then whatever you are producing is of high quality, not only the end product is of high quality the doing itself is of high quality and if somebody watches you they will want to watch you more because it is beautiful to watch somebody being engaged in an activity that is not a means to an end, where the mind has created a future end that it wants to get to and in the meantime it is just the activity is complete in itself, it is not a means to something in the future there is tremendous enjoyment in the doing when the space is there with the doing but many things in this world do not involve manual things you are involved in abstract in an abstract world, mental abstractions consisting of computers of telephones of letters and documents and papers and screens and devices gadgets all abstract things that stimulate the mind that were created by the mind and stimulate the mind and it seems you can only run them if you use your mind can only operate these gadgets if you use your mind and to some extent that is true I have remained to this day computer illiterate now if I truly had to I would learn it and surrender to it so that perhaps could even enjoy it, but I am not going to try I prefer the pen and paper for writing it's more tactile, more immediate and it seems to work so in any activity you need to say is there space in what I do the loss of spaciousness is the worst thing that can happen to you no matter what kind of activity you are involved in and it is the most common thing for people to lose that the entire civilization one can almost say has lost it people are so obsessed with the doing that all sense of spaciousness is lost so the world pulls them in whatever they are doing pulls them in completely and they always need to look to the next thing or the end of it that they haven't reached yet but they want and need to reach, I need to get to the end of that because there is another thing waiting for me that I have to do also the loss of spaciousness in doing and so that needs to be regained, once you know what spaciousness is you have glimpsed it, you have glanced it you have experienced spaciousness here or many of you already have it in your life and now it's a question of not just having it while you look at a beautiful tree, that's relatively easy but having it while you are engaged in any kind of doing mechanical, whatever it may be is there standing back and observing what it is that you are doing so there is still a background of spaciousness although you may be, I sometimes describe in this world you need to everybody is in a hurry for some reason that's the civilization that we have created and there is always little time to do whatever you have to do it seems even with me, the publisher says we need a quote for this but it needs to be in by tomorrow evening can you write a testimonial for that but we need it maximum two days, it's going to print day after tomorrow it always seems to be, I don't know why and there is always the time there is very little time okay and then you sit down and then the testimonial there is a piece of paper there if it comes, it comes first you enter spaciousness become still present pick up a pen and then something may come or it may not come sometimes it does, sometimes it doesn't but I refuse to be driven mad by the world and this means some things get done and others don't get done and the world does not collapse when some things don't get done it's better to do a few things with high quality than many things low quality and if they sack you because you are now producing few high quality things and not many low quality things then that's for the best or it may be that you that others see how you work and then they catch it and they also start doing it the same way a constant alertness to see have I have I lost the space this is really another version of asking have I lost the present moment which really means have I lost awareness of the present moment and what is awareness of the present moment other than awareness of the underlying stillness the I am-ness because awareness of the present moment is not awareness of what happens in the present moment that comes that's a surface phenomenon but that's indirect awareness of the present moment that's awareness of the form of the present moment but awareness of the present moment itself is spaciousness is awareness of the underlying stillness in any moment no matter what happens and that is so the question of asking is there space in what I do or have I lost the space is the same as asking have I lost the present moment because the present moment is that is the space in which everything happens is the background is the stillness is who you are in your essence and the question have I lost it is not an absolutely correct question because you cannot lose it but it simply points to the fact that it has become obscured but let's just put it that way have I lost it and the moment you have lost it or think you have lost it there's the opportunity the opening for re-entering the space and that is a little skill that you can acquire here if you have not acquired it already the skill of re-entering presence spaciousness when you notice that you lost it lost in quotation marks the re-entering the possibility of re-entering spaciousness the moment you realize it's gone that realization is already the re-entry of spaciousness but if you don't know that the mind will immediately come in and form a judgment out of that realization it will make a judgment and say you lost it not realizing how do you know that you lost it because you just realized that you lost it and that realization is presence but the mind uses that realization and misuses it for its own ends and makes a mental judgment out of it and say you see you lost it again what's the point in doing it or whatever the mind says so to realize the moment you know that you lost it that knowing is the re-emergence of it because if you had truly lost it you wouldn't know it you would be completely immersed in the unconscious movement the unconscious thinking the unconscious activity the unconscious reaction so to know that you lost the present moment it is there in the knowing is the awakening already and then you stay in the knowing and that is the state of alertness that is suddenly back and you suddenly feel the inner body again and the first thing as I mentioned earlier the first thing that you often notice is your surroundings again sense perceptions ah space is back and then you continue doing what you are doing with the sense of space now the place where you most easily lose it is when the mind is active and especially when the mind is interacting with other minds talking discussing something that's where you most easily get completely drawn into thought forms the consciousness gets totally drawn into thought forms and you are totally in every thought and so you can observe it when you watch maybe not here because perhaps everybody is present now but when you watch two people talking to each other or just listen to two people talking to each other you can often notice that lack of presence that lack of space in the interaction and then you said you know I really think that wasn't quite the right thing well no you are not quite it just forms one form after another there is never not a standing back from the mind stream it's being immersed in the mind stream and that's so seductive once you and especially when you are dealing with something that the world calls a problem we need to deal with this, this is so important what are we going to do about this that's how the world functions one problem after another so then to lose yourself not only in the mind stream but to lose yourself in whatever the world says matters this thing is so important we have to sort this out what do we do everybody is frustrated and everybody is so important no sense of space between it and yourself you are not there really as the space you get absorbed by the problem you get absorbed by the activity you get absorbed by the mind stream and then you suddenly you notice oh and there is a waking up again I lost the space and then the space is back and you stand back and for a moment you don't participate in the interaction the discussion whatever it is and immediately there is a different energy field there and if you then start speaking again the words will not feed the mind they may be words but the words then come out of presence and it may be that for the first time somebody says something sensible for the first time somebody presents a real solution to the situation and that is the world is the world has two aspects, the world in your head and the world out there which is, I don't mean nature by world I mean the civilization that the mind has created so you have the inner world and the outer world which are really one the whole civilization, almost everything is mind creation very little in it contains presence, occasionally here and there, there are certain things, yes but it's rare so the world has incredible momentum the world in here primarily and the world out there, but primarily of course in here and everything it's easy to lose yourself in that because of the pulling power of the mind the inner mind and the externalized mind as the world and the world will, it's not only that the world wants to pull you in, every other mind every human who is only there as a mind wants you to contribute to his or her mind stream and wants to convince you that this really matters this is very important whenever you think something matters absolutely in this world you have lost space whenever you behave as if something was deadly serious and mattered absolutely and for some people it can be the tiniest thing just even getting the right, buying the right kind of thing in a store I got that he told me the wrong kind of what does it matter and you see what people get upset about absurd things completely irrelevant and unimportant and they say it matters they believe it matters it's completely meaningless in the larger scheme can only be seen from the perspective of space so the tiniest thing people lose themselves in and get upset and angry about and tell others about and yet you might ask what about the big things because sometimes big things go wrong in this world there can be somebody close to you may suddenly die or die prematurely you may suddenly experience great loss something may suddenly go drastically wrong in your life and there's no human life in which this does not ever happen it happens to everyone sooner or later things go wrong and even there, yes of course you weep when someone close to you dies you may feel sad when somebody leaves you because it's a kind of death or your business empire collapses 30 years of work down the drain, says the mind it's just a thought not a reality yes, form collapses as they do all the time, and there may well be weeping you may find yourself weeping but if you know if you're in touch with the life that is beyond form within, at a deeper level there's also a peace and that will be there particularly once you already have touched space spaciousness or as I sometimes call it space consciousness the rest is object consciousness then if something in the world of form, including physical forms, human forms suddenly dissolves dies, leaves you there is you as the form identity may feel sad and may weep, because one aspect of you, a small one, is form, the physical form and the psychological form of me and the depths of yourself you will feel that more strongly the peace will be stronger that is underneath the weeping for those who have already who are in touch with that dimension within when great loss happens to you and so that really means nothing in this world which is the world of forms matters absolutely because every form of course is destined to dissolve sooner or later and nobody can predict you cannot have a business contract that says if I do the right things then my form is going to survive for a hundred years doesn't work every form is destined to dissolve sooner or later and the question is are you in touch with the deathless dimension in yourself the formless, deathless dimension.

laughter

Deathless is a term the Buddhists sometimes use the deathless realm Buddhists like to use negative terms some Buddhist schools do also have positive terms but originally the whole of Buddhism is expressed in negative terms so that you don't substitute mental idols for the actual reality so Buddhism does not talk about eternal life like Jesus did but they point to the same thing it speaks of the deathless realm Amara Vati the realm of the deathless and that is exactly what we are pointing to here and isn't it amazing that that begins with looking at a flower in stillness that is the beginning of the arising of the timeless and deathless and formless dimension of who you are when you are in touch with that even what the world calls dreadful disaster yes, you may weep on the surface where you also are a form temporarily well, I'm not saying will not touch you in the depths of your being it will touch you but very differently, it will touch you in the sense that the peace that you feel will only be stronger when things around you collapse that's, I've experienced that many years ago for the first time and I couldn't understand it when things went wrong in my life the peace was stronger I said that doesn't make sense I just lost that and the peace is more is deeper it was almost like something within to compensate for the loss of a form, the formless was shining even more so that begins with spacious perception the next step is spacious doing the next step is spacious interaction with other humans and then meeting the world and whatever the world demands with the sense of space so that it doesn't draw you in completely and realize only one thing matters absolutely and that's not a thing everything else is in the realm of the relative it matters relatively but not absolutely exactly the same truth Jesus expressed in the famous parable of Martha and Mary, two sisters he was visiting two sisters Martha was busy about the house cooking and cleaning and preparing the meal for Jesus and getting so much to do before lunch is ready got so much, and Mary was listening to Jesus sitting at his feet looking into his face and Martha said come on Jesus, tell her we've got things, we need to get on with things here, there's so much to do tell her to help me I can't do it all by myself I'm going mad here and Jesus said Martha, Martha, you are worried about many things but only one thing is needful and she has chosen that one thing now modern theologians are not very happy with that they try to reinterpret it in some way, he didn't really mean that now is he saying we should never it's not saying we should never do anything anymore but get a sense of perspective and see what really matters and that choose that first and if then the lunch is not ready on time so be it but it may be ready too but nothing matters more than finding yourself which is one with finding God, a word I rarely use because of it's misuse nothing matters more and so if things don't get done they don't get done and then after a while you see there is a balance you can do things beautifully without losing touch with being with presence teaching used to be enjoyable and nowadays at universities and schools many teachers say the administrative work and the burden of that is is almost impossible to carry and so see what is primary and that is presence you choose that first uncompromising uncompromisingly so that you don't get seduced into believing that something in this world matters more, that something in this world matters absolutely nothing matters absolutely except finding yourself and then you do what you can in some cases the world around you will catch on if you start living in a different way some other people may become interested and may watch you and may ask questions or just your presence may be enough to change an environment that's sometimes possible the presence of one conscious person can sometimes change an unconscious environment in other instances if the unconsciousness is too heavy too deeply entrenched that may not be possible and then there will be a separation you will separate yourself from that unconscious energy field or they may want you to leave anyway as we said in the joke that I mentioned you will get the sack because you are not suffering from a stress related disease space space vital use that here while you interact with people space in an interaction means first of all the ability to be there as spacious presence while you listen that means the words of the other person are being received in a field of alert stillness that's how not to get drawn into the mind level of that vibrational frequency of mind because the mind wants you to join it, the other person's mind will attempt you your mind to draw it out and to join it so that they can unite and reinforce each other mutually on that level of frequency of mind so the mind, come on surely you must have an opinion about this don't you think that was a dreadful thing?

I thought it was absolutely well can you listen even to somebody who wants you to and emotion may be part of it too often the ego is a mixture of mind and emotion an entity, a mental emotional entity, come on and to be able to listen in spacious presence now that requires a high degree of alertness on your part alertness has nothing to do with tension of course alertness is free of tension it is relaxed remember Buddha and Clint Eastwood together in one it's that but if you are not alert then you will lose yourself in that person's mind stream and join it with your mind stream so the person is speaking or they may just be making some innocent remarks but even there while the person speaks the ability to listen not to listen as a mind or to listen as a person but to listen as spacious presence to be there as spacious presence for the other person so the words are being received nothing now it means you are not mentally seeking anymore to either agree or disagree with that person because that's usually what the mind does it will immediately say you are absolutely right there, they should do something about it or the mind says you are completely wrong you don't understand this at all, let me tell you how it is so you either, the mind usually looks for either a dissent I think is the word or assent either it wants to agree or disagree and here you neither agree nor disagree nor are you preparing the next thing that you are going to say if ever you prepare mentally the next thing that you are going to say whatever it is that you are going to say will only function on the level of mind and it will be uninspiring it will be of low quality only that which comes out of your mouth and I'm not saying it's an emotion that suddenly bursts out because that's possible too, no if it comes out of presence out of first there is the stillness and then that person speaks and then that person stops perhaps if you are lucky and says now what do you think and at that moment you are not thinking anything yet and then there is a moment of stillness perhaps but it may not be long, the other person may not even notice that it's stillness and then some words will come out of your mouth there is no nobody can predict what will come out but it will be more vitally true than anything that the mind could say and it's possible that the words that come out of your mouth are I don't really know to be comfortable with not knowing not to prepare mentally the next statement the next objection, the next question the next clever thing that's coming out of your mouth but to simply be there as spacious stillness and if three people are talking it's even more important and that's even more seductive or four people being in the body helps feeling the inner body as you listen I learned that lesson at my first public talk I ever gave many years ago I met somebody in London where I was living at a some dinner and he said I work for the Theosophical Society I just spoke to him for ten minutes he didn't know anything about me well nobody did and I didn't either and he said can you come and give a talk to our Theosophical Society we need people like you the first time anybody ever asked me to give a talk and I said ok what should I talk about he said you just find a title it doesn't matter and then let me know and then in three months time you can come and give the talk so when the time came close to the talk one morning I woke up and my mind said you better prepare something I already knew that to speak the truth that must come from presence not from anything that is prepared and yet my mind convinced me that I need to prepare something so I got a piece of paper at least I already knew that writing a whole script that would not be possible but I had a piece of paper not big with all the points, ten points that I thought needed to be mentioned to make the talk complete one to ten and so I arrived maybe 30 or 40 people were there and he said here is Eckhart he is going to talk about can't remember what the title was spiritual dimensions in psychotherapy they liked a complicated title and I already knew the first two points that I wanted to talk about by heart so the piece of paper was there started to talk and everybody was presence was beginning to fill the room everybody entered presence and I came to the end of point two and then the mind said now have a look

and the moment

I looked at the paper and read point three I could feel the entire energy field in the room going they'd all left me they'd all gone back into their little minds and I had gone back into mine and when I looked up again I saw two people were looking at their watches and then I started to talk about point three and presence returned and then I'd come to the end of point three and then it happened one or two more times it took me a while to learn I looked collapsed, energy field collapsed and that was the last time I ever used a piece of paper in a talk and I realize now even if I had forgotten five or six out of the ten points even if I'd only mentioned the first two points and couldn't remember anything else it would not have mattered because the essence of any true talk is not in the words the essence is in the space out of which the words come the rest you can go to universities for, that's okay it's that's what matters and even at university I experienced it once when a lecturer the only one who spoke spontaneously who didn't have notes that they'd used for ten or fifteen years read the same lecture notes there was one lecturer who spoke who just opened a work of literature or poetry and he would look and spontaneously talk never had any notes that was at the university I was taught in London a few years later I was at another university where he got invited as a guest speaker and he had come with notes I had told everybody he's great you must listen to him and when he got up he had a pile of notes and every time he read partly 75% of his talk he read from notes and everybody was okay and 25% occasionally he looked away from the notes and started to speak ah that was fresh, that was new, that was alive and it wasn't in the words, the words were there, yes they had a certain significance but where there was something present in the room beyond the words, that was that would make the talk vitally alive and so after the talk we went to a pub and I asked him why did you bring notes he said well I thought it was Cambridge here and they expected something more than just a

[Speaker 1] (8:21:40 - 8:34:58)

so it's very rare at university to find that dimension extremely rare a few geniuses there who miraculously survived within that structure, yes but mostly the entire thing is mind and therefore it is not a place universities are not usually places that are where you feel true aliveness, they are dense energy fields some more than others but here and there they manage just as in medieval times you had a few great mystics, teachers who miraculously survived within the catholic church some of them were tolerated or they hadn't discovered yet what they were really talking about and they miraculously survived within that structure and so even at universities there are some alive beautiful beings who miraculously survive within that otherwise totally mind dominated structure so the ability to speak from presence not to prepare the next thing that you are going to say and that is to speak from space is there space in this interaction no relationship can thrive without space that's the most vital ingredient in any relationship and space is the formless dimension of who you are, the stillness is there stillness is another question is there stillness in this relationship and stillness is to be able to listen in stillness to be able to look at your partner in stillness the wind is sweeping away all the old mind structures we had a retreat here four years ago and on the last night there was a violent storm several tents collapsed and the roofs the tiles got blown off the building ah I'm not predicting anything you may remember Jesus saying truly I tell you whenever he says truly I tell you in the old translation it says verily I tell you whenever Jesus says truly I tell you he's saying now listen up unless you become like little children you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven so in many ways living in presence is like living like a it's living like a little child there's a sense of openness of wonder of awe of continuous newness the only difference is when presence arises in an adult human there is the same openness that you have in a child in whom the mind has not taken over yet with an added dimension of knowing of depth not only are you in touch with that dimension you know that you are in touch with that dimension without formulating any thought you just know it there's a knowing that has nothing to do with concepts and that knowing will play an increasingly important part in your life and gradually substitute the conceptual knowing that people think they need they cannot live without it will gradually substitute that a non-conceptual knowing and that already is there when you look at a plant you know that it is a plant but you're not limiting this life being to that by imposing the label plant on it you also leave untouched the mystery the unfathomable dimension of every life form you don't fall into the error that you can explain the mystery that is hiding in each life form that can never be known through any mental concept but can be known as a reflection of the essence of who you are so the mind is to a large extent pseudo-knowledge it believes that you know the moment you've called it something nothing, you don't know anything if you call it something, you just have given it a label or a sound, you've attached a sound to it, it's such and such a plant now you think you know nothing it remains as mysterious as before except now you have the illusion that you know what it is the world is a complete mystery and it should remain a complete mystery that's the beauty of it it cannot ultimately be known conceptually, it can only be known yes, as a reflection of your very being and yet even there that remains a mystery the modern world has lost all sense of sacredness because sacredness and mystery are intimately connected holiness or sacredness when the mind labels everything there's no sacredness left because there's only pseudo-knowledge left sacredness is there the moment there's space and that's why you go into certain places that are considered sacred where people who are attuned to it can still feel something and there's always great spaciousness in those places there's always a sense of space whether it's a temple or a cathedral an ancient cathedral and preferably you go in when they're not doing something in there when there's just the empty space there's sacredness or certain in nature there's the space between two hills or the space of a cave a sense of there's always there's no sacredness without space and the primary realm of the sacred is your own self the space that you are there goes a thought and that's fine an externalized thought noisy smelly laughter again to remind you tonight when you are in bed lie in on your back and go into the body go into sleep from inner body awareness when you wake up go back into the body rest in there so that the mind doesn't immediately take over and then all the little things here sense perceptions hearing, seeing maybe smelling occasionally touching doing little doings bring presence into little doings walking one step at a time no need to arrive at the last step you'll get there anyway at the moment this is the step you're taking doing little things hand lifting a cup of coffee, a cup of tea juice just present with the movement so that presence flows into what you do it's not a means to an end it's simply the moment of drinking isn't better than the moment of reaching for the glass or the moment of the glass traveling to the lips it's good can this movement happen against a backdrop of space in other words can you lift the glass and put it back without the interference of thought simply alert stillness so any movement you can do like that is it possible to perform this little, you have to find out for yourself can you perform this movement in spaciousness put this from here to there how long does that take to put something from here to there it takes about three seconds but that doesn't matter it's three seconds of presence and no thought just alert presence that's a little spiritual practice I don't know if anybody has ever suggested that you pick up a little thing and put it from here to there space and that's not asking a lot but it's an enormous thing because what comes into your life then is space is thoughtless presence alertness the ability to do things without the interference of thought but not unconsciously with great consciousness but without the interference of thought so walking from here to there don't make it a very long distance don't say okay I'm now going to attempt half a mile without thought it's enough between here and the next tree every step I'll just be present with every step and okay then you're there you can then try the next tree or forget about it

I've forgotten what my problems are

we will have a communal silence probably starting tomorrow evening and go on until Wednesday morning tomorrow evening, that's Monday evening until Wednesday morning I will suggest that we be silent together and particularly at that time many things you can practice like that because nobody is going to interfere and ask you questions or tell you their opinions or if they do you tell them to quiet we're talking about movement there will be movement classes apart from the yoga classes that you have in the morning those who feel awake enough early in the morning can go to yoga if that's the kind of movement your body likes or holding and Kim is doing movement classes the first one after this after sitting for a long time it may be helpful I believe it's not outside today but in the Leela Hall Leela is the Indian word for divine play in the Leela Hall so you can move the body there and here is exactly what we were talking about to bring presence into movement I talked about little movements that you may do in your everyday life and then there's also the possibility of being present with any kind of movement, it could be a spontaneous movement or it could be a movement that you have learned as in Tai Chi where you move just one movement while this arm moves from here to there to move it to be a high quality movement you need to be present and not wanting to be there while you're still here and not being here while you're already there with your mind to just be there at every moment so you cannot do movement well if you're not thinking you have to be present so movement can be a great help for the arising of presence and and when you listen to that wind can you sense the stillness underneath it the listening presence that you are being and that's a beautiful contrast because in a way wind seems the opposite of stillness it's an enormous movement and yet it's happening against the background of stillness somebody once asked me why are you quiet before you wait for so long before you start speaking and the true answer of course is because I don't know what to say now that could be very uncomfortable if I thought that I should know what to say that would be a nightmare and some people have these nightmares you dream that you suddenly you sit somewhere and suddenly the curtain opens and you're in front of a large audience and you don't know what to say but it's only a nightmare because you think you should know what to say if you were comfortable with not knowing what to say would be fine so there are two states of not knowing one is not knowing and thinking that you should know and the other is not knowing and being at ease with not knowing then the not knowing is actually a very deep state of knowing but not conceptual but it's covered up as long as you think that you should know or trying to know or trying to figure out or interpret or you should know what the next moment what's going to happen the next moment so by thinking that you should know or by attempting to project yourself to the next moment you cover up the depths that's in you that we could call not knowing but that really is simply non-conceptual intelligence formless intelligence primordial intelligence it's not something we can measure sometimes people think they can measure intelligence but all they can measure is form thought form solving little problems or puzzles which is a tiny fraction of true intelligence to be comfortable with not knowing in a conceptual sense is part of living in the state of presence and it's not only when you're in front of an audience because you may or may not be but also be comfortable with not needing to interpret the situation or another person as the old 60s Beatles song went let it be there it is let it be why have to figure out what it is why?

of course because the ego feels better it has control over life if you can figure it out interpret it judge it then the ego feels it's in control it's not, it's an illusion and the more the ego feels in control the more deeply you are immersed in dream and illusion and then comes a point after a few years of doing that and you inhabit your own conditioned illusory reality and that you experience then as the world and what you react to is then not actual situations but your view your interpretation of the situations and then you recreate the same thing it's a vicious circle we could talk about it a long time but this is essential that you feel at home with leaving things alone leaving people alone that's a great gift the greatest gift is to leave them alone when the ego says yeah but I need to protect myself who knows what he wants from me there is a knowing that's not conceptual and you'll find yourself doing the right thing saying the right thing you know as the buddhist thing goes I can't remember all the right action, right speech, right this right that and I love buddhists I mean buddhism the I think they start from up there you cannot generate right speech, right action and so on without being in the right state of consciousness it flows out of the state of presence naturally as long as you're not present you can try hard to practice right speech and right this and right that but it's hard and many times you won't get it right so I don't believe the Buddha ever said you should start up there I'm sure he said let's start with the foundation and he didn't explain all that much conceptually, that came later he might have said be in the body or said take a conscious breath observe your breath or something like that, which of course means stop thinking you can't observe your breath without, and think at the same time if you think, you either think or you observe your breath another way of space arising space observing your breath you can do it as a meditation where you sit down and light a candle and light the incense or you can observe your breath at any time, at any moment just one breath at a time brings in a space into your life one breath at a time observing simply means following it with your attention feeling it, sensing it as it enters the body, the air enters the body and even noticing the tiny gap when the in-breath has come to an end and then observing the breath as it leaves the body and even being conscious of the tiny gap after the out-breath has come to an end and that's a very simple thing but it requires alertness and it brings in space so it's just that one little thing which is also closely related to being in the body because as you observe the breath it takes you into the body so almost without wanting to, you begin also to feel the body at the same time takes you out of mind it creates space and it doesn't matter it would be more helpful to remember 50 times during the day to take one conscious breath than to sit for very long periods in meditation bring it into normal living just one breath at a time or if you can, maybe two but people say I haven't got time for meditation that's fine, then don't meditate just take conscious breath during the day have little reminders next to your computer in the bathroom or wherever to take one conscious breath and there's nobody in this world who does not have time for one conscious breath 50 times and then people might say yeah, but 50 during the day and that is space arising spaciousness just that and then out that is presence and then out of presence comes right speech or no speech, could be even better many times unnecessary speech drops away also arises right action if it's needed and unnecessary action drops away a lot of the action generated by egoic consciousness is unnecessary they're all running around like mad and but of course some action is necessary and then you'll know the difference becoming acquainted with space consciousness which is not from science fiction but it's to do with inner space we call it inner, but ultimately everything is inner the whole world is an inner phenomenon because where else does the world arise so you could say there's nothing that is not inner there was one Zen master little known one of his ways was he would call a disciple in the monastery he would call their name when they were nearby as if something very urgent was happening John yes master and then they looked at him and he didn't say anything and so the new monks or nuns or and some of the old ones too they try to figure out he's trying to tell me something what's he trying to tell me he's not trying to tell you anything the interesting thing is it's not about content these disciples or monks they expected content to come from the master and all the master pointed to was space content doesn't matter to him he's got nothing to say what can he put in all he's interested in is space not content so all the master wants is your attention, your wakefulness your alertness your spacious awareness he doesn't want to fill it with anything and that's when you that's such a shift when you you shift from a life a content based life which is normal and normal equals insane as we know content content based life almost everybody lives a content based life a life entirely dominated by content their situation the so called external content the things they start with physical objects that they own or that are in their life that they have to worry about that's physical thingness content content is then the situations that arise, the relationships the problems that arise life situation content is your own body and your concerns about that other people that you meet, your work your financial situation the drama whatever, all that is the content of your life on the external level that absorbs people's attention and for most people the entire attention is in the content of their lives, what's going on in my life and then there comes the inner content the thoughts one after another, ultimately of course it's all inner, but just for the time being we divide it after inner the thoughts which they are identified with and which are related of course to the life situation and so on, and then there come the emotions both the emotions that are generated now by egoic thinking and the emotions that have lived in you for a long time accumulated from the past pain, from childhood pain from the more distant collective past of humanity that comes up periodically we may talk about that in a little bit more detail, but for the time being just to see all that is content and that absorbs people's consciousness virtually a hundred percent their thoughts, their emotions and the things that are going on in their lives and that's how there's nothing else, a content based existence and then comes the realization that there is another dimension without which content would not even be possible, there wouldn't be no content just in the same way we couldn't put any furniture or bodies in this room if there were no space here but we don't, it's easy to forget that the essence of this room is space and it's easy to forget that the essence of yourself is equally space the space of consciousness but that space is so crammed full with content that you can't see it anymore you can't sense it so it's almost as if content obliterated space in people's lives and then life becomes a burden and what they try is they try to rearrange the content of their lives in such a way that finally their life works but a content based life cannot work because the most vital essence the very aliveness of life is missing the essence which is space which is not content which is not form, the formless essence of all life, life itself is missing and then no matter how you rearrange the content and some people are obsessed with rearranging the content of their lives they think just a different configuration of furniture will change everything furniture meaning content and it doesn't many times you might think okay now I've made it that's it, new relationship new place to live, new job new climate everything is it's perfect now and it's not and soon you find out that wasn't supposed to be here and that is what the Buddha says means when he talks about dukkha, suffering which can also be translated as just plain misery and so he said wherever you go, whatever you do you will encounter suffering, misery or it can also be translated as unsatisfactoriness not quite fulfilling not quite it so it's the degrees of dukkha just unease is already dukkha irritation is already dukkha and then it gets there is more and so he is talking about a content based existence and so primary is not rearranging the content of your life but finding that which lies beyond content and to do that you don't need time or future and you don't need to have the content of your life in a particular way so that finally you have time to find you don't need time I need time to find myself I can't do it not here I need more space I can't share a room with three people I need space, I wish I had stayed home I could have done better meditations at home could have done my own retreat at home and then I had to wait for the bathroom that's all, that's not these are not ideal conditions, I can't practice in them observe your thoughts don't believe in them the best place to start the only place to start with finding space is at the very conditions of this moment the three people in the room one of them snores waiting for the bathroom and then observe the thought that comes in and says I can't do it, I need space, my own private space and observe that as a thought and let it be then the thought doesn't grip you anymore, it doesn't have that hold on you where your whole sense of self is in that thought and you actually 100% believe in what that thought which is a thought form, which is content says so the thought form, the content says I can't find the space now of course it says that, because it is it is form it wants to be there as form every life form wants to persist in that form it has a certain momentum including thoughts so it's only by observing the thought and then saying, ok why believe in it I can't I need more space the thought comes and goes you allow it and in that moment you have the space or you have a reaction, emotional that goes perhaps with the thought and then you observe that you step, oh and you also allow it ok and there's the space, the moment you allow something there's space you step back out of it we could call that consciousness disidentifies from form you step out of a thought or an emotion you don't deny it you don't push it down you don't repress it you simply step, you were in it and then you step out and really what's happening is on a cosmic level we could almost say you look like a person but you're not a person, it's just a temporary appearance consciousness disidentifies from form or another way of putting it it's the end of the dream that consciousness dreamt the dream of forms steps out and realizes itself as space so it's always there the thoughts will come in and then you simply allow the thought to be there and especially we talked yesterday about the possibility perhaps of simply being so alert that thoughts don't come in anymore only as little fragments some of you may be able to do it or you may be able to do it for short periods of time it just depends on how much presence is coming through but one could say even more important than that is to find a spacious relationship to thoughts, the thoughts that are still there that's fine, that's enough really to find a spacious relationship this is just one way of putting it to find a spacious relationship to the thoughts that are still there that come thoughts are only problematic if your self is in them, because then the thoughts become a me, an ego when the thoughts are free of self, and that happens every time you step back and say there's a thought, or the emotion then the thoughts lose their heaviness you know the heaviness that otherwise people carry around with them as themselves, which are their thoughts plus the emotions that go with the thoughts there's always the next thing to be offended by and complaining about, or then one thing attracts your attention and then it disappoints you and lets you down, then you can complain again or at first something is just great, this is the greatest thing on earth but it's form and so then it lets you down it could be a spiritual teacher, it could be anything he's the greatest and then the form of the teacher does something oh no, he's not he burped after dinner and of course the content-obsessed mind loves to idolize other forms before, in many cases before it gets let down by them and then tears them down and complains about them it loves to idolize form because it mistakes the essence, the formless one life, one consciousness with form, and that is when it idolizes persons and of course there's the Buddha and Jesus yes they also burped occasionally after dinner of course they did because they had a physical body and other things and yet something was shining through them the formless and the egoic consciousness confused that with the form because it knew nothing of formless or in a very remote way it had some inkling that there was something there that's divine of God so there's a distant recognition but so distant that as the mind obscured it came in and misinterpreted it and this can also happen to yourself and it has happened to some people in whom presence has arisen who became transparent enough present enough for space the formless consciousness to shine through the form the psychological form especially the psychological form lost its density the egoic density which consists of an incessant stream of thoughts and emotions and so when it lost its density there were increasing gaps in that and suddenly the power of the divine if you want to call it which it is was able to come through the form but there's still the form still to some extent operates and so it has happened and can happen that the form consciousness, the object consciousness that is still operating although there are increasing gaps is now interpreting the power that is the power that is totally non-personal it's nothing to do with this form it's there because the form has become transparent but this content consciousness misinterprets that and identifies with the power that flows through and says that's me and then what tends to happen these spiritual teachers will suddenly start saying I am the greatest who ever lived I am greater than and no greater will ever come after me form identity has reasserted itself the power was there and may still be for a little while be there so you can sometimes have the discrepancy in certain teachers there's an ego which sometimes can be quite mad because there's an enormous power there suddenly and the ego misinterprets it and claims and says it's me and when this happens usually it's the case when the teacher has certain claims of uniqueness that greater than this one or that one or that one greater than a comparison which is always an ego device comes back in so be careful when you go to teachers who say no greater has ever been or will ever come or something like that or I'm the greatest at the moment on the planet there may be a greater one once I'm gone but not while I'm here and so that's not only in it's also something to be aware of in yourself the ego can easily misinterpret what is happening in you to you in you the process of transformation, the ego doesn't understand it in some ways the ego is afraid of it or at other times it might have a different approach the ego can identify with almost anything, now what happens once the teacher has claimed his or her unique power and often it's the disciples who do it to the teacher and the teacher may just say nothing because the teacher rests in the form and the disciples say he is the greatest because he's our master and some masters allow people to say and do whatever they like they don't care if you think I'm the greatest you can think what you like especially Indian teachers have that attitude which is quite nice do what you like I don't care so it can happen and it can also happen if there's still content consciousness left in the teacher the tendencies the egoic tendencies may have become dormant and yet they're still waiting and they can then be brought back to life by projections of specialness from people around you and so others believe that you are very special and then that awakens the dormant tendencies of the ego and suddenly one day you wake up and say they are right I am very special and then you get the weird thing in teachers that they begin to speak truth and half and non-truth mixed together and that can be quite confusing to at that point it's better to go away and take a conscious breath because that's all you need really and then it often happens that the space becomes obscured again in the teacher the power of the teaching is lost and then the words that are being spoken are just from memory accumulated knowledge and some of the disciples may never notice it because they're so identified with their viewpoint of who the teacher is, which is mind they're so identified with their thoughts, their mind that they don't even notice the vital vitality of the teaching the true aliveness of the teaching isn't there anymore because they're just stuck in their minds so but here the important thing is in yourself see, the ego often comes in and you need to be alert and be conscious of specially any idea of specialness some people suddenly get the idea that they are Jesus when and the spiritual power that comes through is true, it's the same power that came through Jesus but that doesn't mean that they are the form, identity of again, the mind's misinterpretation is of course you are Christ, in essence you are Christ because the very same life consciousness that came through him is in you as your own essence in that sense you are of course everybody is Christ the Christ but that's not what they're saying they're saying I am and you are not or they say I am and you will be in ten thousand years time space consciousness simple thing, remember the just a breath brings in space it's worth more than a hundred spiritual books a conscious breath practiced throughout the day whenever you remember and then it more and more the space is there because every book is content now it may well be that if it comes from space if the book comes was written from presence then within the content is hiding space and so when you open a book like that you read a few lines and you transcend the content because the content always points towards the space the entire content of your life then becomes of secondary significance and that's called freedom from the world and that means whatever happens events or things that don't happen but you thought they should whatever happens in your life is only content and it never again matters absolutely one hundred percent not that it is not honored the world of form is also honored but whatever happens to you or around you in your life never loses the power to take away your peace to shake you the power to draw you in totally and not that you now have a separation between you and what happens, no there is a sense of openness but you are not dependent anymore on what happens because you have something better which is yourself which is the space that you are the stillness, whatever pointer you want to use and then you notice it for the first time when things that used to upset you now just happen and you allow them oh because you are rooted in being you allow what happens that in itself can be a practice for space allowing being aligned with what happens allowing it because it is there anyway it is happening anyway it is an event, there it is and there is the space Krishnamurti described the secret of his life once in a talk let me tell you my secret he said and everybody thought finally he is telling us we have been waiting for 30 years for it to come to every talk and every talk was like sand running through their fingers there was nothing there to grasp of course there wasn't because he was pointing to something that is beyond content so people were hoping to take something home after a talk and then they went back home and said what did he talk about he said I don't know, it's gone and this may happen to you also especially since you are not getting a folder with 100 steps for the next 10 years this is what we did so he said you want to know my secret I don't mind what happens that's it so most of the people didn't get it because they thought what next he is going to say something else so what does that mean I don't mind what happens my life is not based on content the content I described that in the book as your life and your life situation and what most people call my life what they are really referring to is their life situation that's what they call my life their divorce or their next marriage or the relationship they have now and their job situation and their health situation and their living situation and their financial situation that's my life what else is there so basically it boils down for most people to these things the physical situation healthy or not healthy their age, their relationship marriage, divorce their financial circumstances the place where they live the work that they do this work situation their function in society how society sees them what society tells them about them whether they are important or not and the weirdest most insane people are important in this world and many of wise people are not important that's all totally mixed up totally irrelevant of course nothing to do with your importance but that's how people see their lives when I go to LA there are many people who are desperately wanting to be famous actors the city is full of people who want to be famous actors and it's just in the nature of things that only a small fraction of those can become famous there can't be that many famous actors because otherwise if everybody is famous it's meaningless it won't serve the ego anymore and so many of them if they don't go beyond fortunately some of them come to our talks and then they see beyond that and go beyond that but if they don't go beyond that many of those their life is condemned to be frustrating and what they would see as a failure a failed existence I could have become a great actor but nobody discovered me and then they miss hundreds of other things that they could do or could have done but primarily they would miss who they are beyond the content of their lives so all that is the content and that is what happens or doesn't happen and the moment you become still or the moment you allow the content of this moment to be as it is not what I regard my life situation but simply the content of this moment just this moment to allow that you don't allow your life situation that doesn't work because your life situation is an abstraction it's a story so the story says my life has failed up to now but maybe I can still make it it says I've lost it all there's no point in starting again I might as well accept that because Eckhart says we should accept but that's a story in your head it's an interpretation and it's totally meaningless to say that your life has failed that you can't make it these are all stories that's not what acceptance is about it's not you're not being asked to accept a story in the head but that you're telling yourself and others about your life acceptance is only to do with the form that the present moment takes so if you're in prison then it's the acceptance of that you're sitting here and there's a window with bars and there's a little bunk bed and whatever the situation is around you and you're breathing this is how it is at the moment there that that yeah and it could be very unpleasant maybe you're cold, maybe it's noisy, maybe it's hot maybe you're still hungry it is but it is as it is at this moment it is as it is not the story I'm going to be in here for another ten years that's a story the acceptance is only needed for this moment and if you accept this moment as it is because there is never anything else the rest is abstraction there's only this moment and then it's an uncompromising facing the reality not the story with which you interpret this moment but the direct reality of this moment and people confuse that with a story they tell themselves about it here I am, my life has failed I'm just giving the example of prison because that is usually interpreted as a very undesirable life situation it could also be an illness, it could be a physical disability it could be some great loss that has suddenly happened to you whatever it is, I'm just taking a more extreme situation that usually people would invent stories about and would make you very unhappy if you are sitting in prison and telling yourself stories about your life you become very unhappy but if you stay with just this moment at that immediately the prison becomes for you a monastery no matter how unpleasant it is and Zen monasteries can be pretty unpleasant almost as bad as the prison some of them and in Tibet they even have the practice some of the monks, they go out in the middle of the night the temperature is sub-zero and they meditate naked or they put a wet blanket on you that would be called torture torture you stay with this, just this moment and the worse your life circumstances get the stronger the motivation your motivation will be once you know have a glimpse of the truth the stronger your motivation will be not to leave this moment does it mean you are not facing reality? no, it means you are for the first time facing reality because reality is the form that this moment takes there is, let's stay present for a while there is your sitting on the floor, on a hard chair there is your metal dish with the gruel or whatever you have just eaten there are the bars this is how it is at this moment there is nothing you can do unless you decide to escape, in which case that is what you do at this moment but if there is no possibility you stay with what is and you face it for the first time because any story that you invent about my life which is your life situation, is thought is an abstraction and that is not facing reality so the only way you can face reality is always to face the reality of just this moment and the worse it gets the more strongly motivated you will be not to leave this moment because the moment you leave this moment you will become very unhappy the moment you start thinking about my life because there is no such thing as your life there is only this moment you are life experiencing consciousness, experiencing the form of this moment but you are always, deep down untouched by anything the space itself in which things happen you are the moment you allow things to be as they are at this moment only you realize yourself as the space in which things happen and not as what happens you are not what happens you are the space in which it happens and at that moment you have stepped out of content of your life particularly when the content becomes so called unpleasant, it is vital that you step out of content, but only by facing the content directly, not by running away from it internally it's again, it's by facing the very limitations of the life of form at this moment and one of the greatest limitations is to be in prison, another perhaps even greater limitation is to encounter the limitations of your physical body when it happens you can't move anymore, or it's hard to move, or the body is getting so old or diseased to face directly, not to invent a story around it but to face the condition directly, this is how it is the very limitation when it's faced and totally allowed to be becomes an opening into space consciousness and that's the miracle of the turning around the turning around the worst thing in your life can be the doorway and will become the doorway, but you don't have to wait for the worst thing to happen to you it may or it may not well death will come eventually sooner or later, sometimes sooner sometimes later, you don't have to wait until they put you in prison or until the body fails or until the stock market collapses and the real estate market collapses, so even that's gone, who knows, I'm not predicting, you don't have to go around and sell your shares but the world of form is unstable you don't have to wait for anything just work with every little thing by choice face this moment at any moment directly and bring an uncompromising yes to it that's not, it is passive and active at the same time the passive seems to be that you say I allow this moment to be as it is but you cannot allow this moment to be as it is unless you bring an uncompromising this is how it is that's the sword that you can see in the face of the Zen master it cuts through time through every mentally constructed story to the reality of just just this then on the periphery of your life you still have, of course you have a past a kind of past, you remember it and you have a future but it's not heavy anymore, it's on the periphery of things so here we your life situation and your life your life lies underneath what happens your life even that's a mistake to say your life because language immediately creates illusion that's why some teachers never talk and for some reason some are mad enough to talk my life is an illusory statement even when I say your true life is not the content even that is not your life because there is no separation between you and life you are life you are life both in the unmanifested, timeless eternal essence of all life is in you as pure consciousness and you are a temporary expression of life in this form so there is no such thing as my life because you are life manifesting temporarily as this form so where is my life? you are life I am life experiencing the world of form as like this at this moment and then it will change and then it will change again and it will change again so I don't have a life and you don't have a life because the moment you say I have a life or my life you separate yourself from life and you think there is something there is me and there is life who is talking? life is talking you cannot be without life your very being is life so how can you lose your life?

it's only through mental abstraction that you can have the illusion that you can lose your life there is not you and life or could there be? who is that you talking without life? nobody could say me or my so isn't it great that you cannot lose your life because you don't have one?

so how deceptive language is and of course language is thought thought that becomes sounds very basic sounds so we are hoping to to understand the universe through that how could you? just a few sounds absurd so there is not it cannot take you to reality and it doesn't have to really what it's good for is basic things give me please a glass of water that works I am thirsty or whatever, please come here that works and that's how language originated, it's to reproduce to find symbols for things and then symbols for actions and there are still many words that are there that are simply originally imitated the sound of an action and then become like knock knock whistling, whistle whistle all these many onomatopoeic as I have called sounds that imitate actions, the sound of action, no more no more than that so let's go from one level of discourse you say your life situation and your life that's one level of discourse on that level it is helpful let's look at it for a moment from that perspective there is your life situation and there is your life and your life is vital, eternal your life situation is content and your life is space the formless unmanifested one eternal life that expresses itself in form temporarily as the content that's one level of discourse, if you want to go even more closer to reality even that's not true to say that it is your life it's just a helpful pointer it's not the truth language cannot encapsulate the truth so when we say there is your life circumstances and there is your life it's a pointer so all the stuff of my circumstances are not my life they are just the content of my life my fifth marriage my sixth divorce my bankruptcy my children getting into trouble someone close to me dying all content of life and then there is life and now let's say that's your life to find your life face this moment directly the form of it the content but not the story just this and then by facing it directly and accepting it go beyond the form if it's a limitation and usually form is some kind of limitation because even if you'd moved from a cabin or a trailer to a mansion at first it would look like a liberation and then you find the mansion has it's own kind of limitations different kinds of limitations you need staff to look after it there is always somebody around if it's in a good climate little ants may come in and basically it doesn't make much difference what kind of bed you sleep in whether you sit in a comfortable chair or not so comfortable chair it's not that's a big deal it's only when you associate it with me and the story it becomes a big deal my life situation my life and then it's not really your life because it is life you are it so we go from that level of discourse to even deeper and say it's not even your life it's life and you are it or even better because there is no ultimately on that level you and I it's not that you are it I am it I there is only one ultimately cause and miracles puts it beautifully I believe it's there there is only one of us there is only one primordial I it is the I of all beings the life essence in each form of life the space in each form of life which even physicists are beginning to discover because when they look at forms then they see that every life form including so called inanimate life because there is no such thing as inanimate life the table is full of pulsating it's a pulsating energy field it just looks inanimate through our senses physicists will tell you it is an energy field it's pulsating there are atoms moving atoms and molecules but the atoms and molecules that make up the table or the physical body or the flower they are so they are so few that both the table and the physical body consist 99.99% of empty space so much space is not only between the atoms even if you look inside the atoms you find even there it's almost exclusively empty space so you can see how the physicists view

[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 1:00:56)

It's not only between the atoms. Even if you look inside the atoms, you find even there it's almost exclusively empty space. So you can see how the physicists' view of the reality and the spiritual realization of what the essence of all beings is are coming together.

And you can see the truth of the ancient Buddhist texts before there even were any physicists. They were already writing that emptiness is the essence of all things. It is in form.

Form is emptiness. Emptiness is form. That there's ultimately, although we're talking here in terms of difference between form and emptiness, ultimately they are one because the essence of every so-called form is emptiness itself also.

It is one. And we cannot understand through sequences of sounds what that emptiness, which we call emptiness, does to sound. Emptiness.

So don't fall into the mistake of now believing that you know what it is. That's the mind. You say, emptiness, and then, oh, yes.

And then your child asks, what is the essence of all life? If you have an enlightened child. And then you say, emptiness.

Ah, OK, now I know. It's the same many times when children ask, Daddy, why is this like that? Why do the birds, how do the birds know where they are flying?

At the end of the summer, they fly 6,000 miles, 10,000 miles to another. How do they know where to go? And where do they land again where they first were born?

How do they know where that is? Yes, my child, let me tell you. It's instinct.

Ah, OK. And people who can reproduce that kind of knowledge tend to do well academically. And there are many other children who may not do so well academically because they're too deep.

And the schools don't recognize debts. They're not there to recognize debts. They're there to recognize and promote shallowness.

And so even Einstein, who could think quite deeply if thinking could ever be called deep, it's not really. But he could think better than many other people only because he had access to stillness. He was considered a little bit dim at school.

He was considered a little bit slow, not promising material. And it's only when they left him alone, the system left him alone, and he got a job in Switzerland at the patent office that he was able to do. He was slow.

He had to go within. He had to go into stillness. He had to listen there.

And then thoughts came. Then he had to go back into stillness. And then, ah!

And then one day he was lying in his bath, and he went very still. And then he says, oh, relativity. And that changed the entire view of the universe that we had up to then.

And then he came up with deep spiritual insights because he went into the stillness that all resides. And he said, the true value of a human being is determined by the degree to which he is free of self. I thought he was a physicist, but he knew.

Because all knowledge, doesn't matter what form it takes, it came out of his ability to be still. And the realization came out of that. And he said, the way we view reality as separate things and separate bodies and everything separate, which, of course, thought contributes to, separates, that he called it an optical illusion of consciousness.

That's our view of the world. You know what an optical illusion is when you see something that's not there. And so it's an optical illusion of consciousness.

So great. All that's required is to go beyond the pseudo knowledge of the mind. Not that you never use it again in this world of form for practical purposes.

It's fine. But to find yourself or the meaning of life or the ultimate purpose of things cannot be found in that realm of form. But it's there in you as yourself.

No time is required to be that, to find who you are, to be who you are. Just stillness, just presence, just allowing this moment to be as it is, the form of it. Don't fight the forms of your life because you want something better.

Go through it by facing directly, looking. Ah, that's how it is, that is. And so you burn up gradually.

The story of me becomes insignificant. Only remnants remain. Little memories that are helpful because it's good to remember people's phone numbers or your past husbands or wives, what you did.

It's fine. There's no problem there. There's no self in it.

But not base your life on the content of your story. And that's how the ego disappears. As thought identification is relinquished, ego goes.

Because ego is thought identification. That's all. Ego is thought plus emotion together, egoic entity.

Stillness, presence, dissolve ego. And you don't need to ask questions like, how long will it take before my ego is dissolved? It doesn't matter.

Just this moment is enough. All you ever need to be concerned about is this moment. That's all there is.

So it's not necessary to be present for the rest of your life or the rest of this retreat. Because if you told yourself, I need to be present for the rest of this day, for the rest of this retreat, I need to be present, that's difficult. Because you've created future in your mind.

And then you have a problem already. Am I going to make it? And already you would begin to forget whether you're present at this moment, worrying about whether you can sustain presence.

Just this is enough. Just this. The present moment is always enough.

That's the secret of life. It's all you need. It's enough.

Because there's nothing else. It looks as if the present moment were trapping you in form, because it takes some form. And people want to get out of it to the unlimited.

I want freedom. I don't want this. And even if you have a mansion, eventually it will feel like a prison.

And you sit in there and you look at the walls. I want to get out of here. The same thing that came when you were sitting in the cabin.

And then you traveled again, hoping to find yourself somewhere else. The world of form is always some kind of limitation, because form means it's limited. It's form.

No matter what situation you go into, it's some kind of limitation. It does not mean that you cannot try to improve your life on the level of form, but not hoping that you find some ultimate fulfillment in that. To play around with form is great.

I'm not saying, if you're in a cabin, you should not try to live in a mansion. No, why not try? Because you're playing in the world of form.

But if you hope that the mansion will free you from unsatisfactoriness, that's not going to work. But if you're already free sitting in the cabin, and cabins are great. I've lived for periods of time, people have put me up in cabins, and it was great.

It's one of the greatest places. I love cabins. Probably prefer them to a mansion.

So there's nothing wrong with it. But if you think you would like a change, this world is there to be played with. And then you try, OK, I'll make money, and then I can live in a mansion, and we'll try that.

Not that it makes any difference. So you're already rooted in being in the cabin. Then you can go out and play.

But if you're not rooted, you cannot go out and play, because it will be a desperate struggle to get somewhere. And when you get there, it won't make you happy either. But once you're rooted within, if you want to play in the world of form, participate in the world of form, and you'll enjoy whatever you're doing, because you don't need it.

And yet you can, great energy can flow into it. You don't need a particular result, and enjoy what you're doing tremendously. And then you'll probably get a good result, not that it matters to you.

So it varies. One person maybe say, it's so peaceful, why should I move out of my cabin? It's great here.

And all you play with is flowers. You go around, you water the flowers. Whatever you do, little movements may be enough for you.

Or you may say, OK, now I'd love to experience some other form. And then you play and go out of your cabin and into something else. Fine.

It differs. The way in which the state of presence manifests in humans differs. Some are happy to remain where they are.

They're home, inside. You're home inside. You don't need the psychological need for future goals.

Because that's so strong in the egoic consciousness. You need the next moment because you're not fulfilled in this moment. Why are you not fulfilled in this moment?

Because you're not in it. The only reason why this moment is not fulfilling is because you're not honoring it. You're not there.

The depth of it remains hidden. All you see is the external form of it and you're running away from it. If you're not running away from the external form of it, but face it directly and say yes, then the form gives way to the depth of the present moment, which is the formless, inseparable from who you are in your essence.

So life is a great adventure. What you do on the surface of things, because everything is the surface of things, whatever happens, situations, is up to you. You don't need things to be in a particular way to fulfill you, to find yourself through.

Finally they'll recognize me. When I live in a mansion, they will all come and want to be with me. And then you would encounter the limitation of being extremely wealthy.

You attract all kinds of people who are only interested in the mental image they have of you, if not in your money. They want to add something to their mental image. I had tea with this and that person, rich and famous.

That surely must add something to who I am, don't you think? I've grown a little bit bigger by having had tea with such and such. He called me the other day.

I had a talk on the phone with... As I was saying to the Dalai Lama the other day, I thought I'd just let that slip in. I didn't.

The ego loves that. We may have questions this afternoon, if any questions remain. Sounds coming out of one mouth and other sounds coming out of another mouth.

If no questions remain, we'll be happy, very happy without questions. And if somebody does not want to make sounds, they can write their questions on a piece of paper and we may look at it on Thursday afternoon for written questions. Some people don't like to make sounds in public.

Because you never know what might come out. What are they going to think of me? I don't need to mention, because you know it already, that life can be very enjoyable when you are rooted in space, the space consciousness, the unmanifested.

And it's only then that the world of form can be enjoyable. Because it doesn't matter that much anymore. And then you can enjoy.

But if it matters, it's hard to enjoy it. That's it. We often experience interesting weather on retreats.

As you know, there's no such thing as bad weather. Nevertheless, let's use that word for a moment. Bad weather is more suited for awakening than good weather.

The worst conditions for spiritual awakening would be ideal conditions. But life is merciful and generous. So usually you get what's right, what works.

Make sure you're in the body, present, not waiting for anything at all. You may sometimes experience, even on retreats, one could perhaps say particularly on retreats, in some cases, the pain body coming up. How do you know it's the pain body and not something else?

As we know, pain body is old accumulated emotion from the past that lives in you. And that is, as long as you're identified with it, part of the ego. Because the ego is whatever you identify with.

So when you don't recognize the old pain that comes up for what it is, it becomes part of the mind structures that we call ego. And it fuels the thinking of the ego and derives nourishment, the pain body, derives nourishment from the negative thought processes that are working overtime once the old emotion has taken possession of the mind. This is called the vicious circle.

How do you know it's the pain body and not an emotion that's being created at this very moment by some kind of thought? The pain body is usually recognized by the fact that the emotion is out of proportion to the event, the triggering event, its overblown reaction. And everybody can see it except the sufferer.

And if you're taken out of your everyday life where there are lots of reasons, lots of triggers, the pain body which has a dormant state and an active state when it's ready to become active from its dormant state, your everyday life has plentiful triggers that the pain body can use and react and then awaken through it. Because in one's normal everyday life, all kinds of little things don't go the way they should throughout the day. And the pain body will react, which will use a trigger, which could be anything.

A pain body that's ready to awaken can use anything, but it doesn't know that this is the trigger. And if something truly drastic should happen to you, somebody dies, you get home and your partner left you, just left a letter, or you get home and all your possessions are gone, or you suddenly find yourself in the street because the president of your company has disappeared with the money and your pension fund is gone too. And then, of course, on the level of physical, psychological form, you will probably experience a certain degree of turbulence unless you're so deeply rooted in being that no matter what happens, you just go and say somebody dies and say there is no death.

But that's not necessarily a desirable state because you're still here as form also. The form aspect of you will react to things that happen on the level of form. But the difference is when you are in touch with being, with yourself beyond form, with the stillness within, the turbulence that you experience, the emotional turbulence, does not touch the core of who you are.

There is always a core of peace. And even if someone close to you dies, let's say a child, perhaps the worst death for someone to experience is not so much the death of a parent when they reach old age, but the death of a child that seems inexplicable and it seems we cannot find an explanation for it. It seems premature.

And something like that will affect you. You will weep. But if you already live in surrender, the deepest core within you will shine at that moment with an enormous power.

And externally you're weeping. And externally the emotion is there. And underneath the emotion you feel deep peace, deeper than ever before.

I mentioned that before, that is always the case. The worse things get out there on the level of form, which could affect your emotional level also, the more strongly the deathless, the formless one life shines within you, and the deeper the peace. And anything that happens to you can then only strengthen that.

So you do not become callous or indifferent. No, you can still weep. In fact, these are the two sides of true compassion, that you have empathy with the suffering of form, but you're also in touch with the formless that is beyond suffering.

And you know that the Course in Miracles, before it all starts on page one, before page one, as a short summary of the Course, just three or four lines, these lines summarize the whole Course and that's all you need to know. If you know that, you don't need to open the book or any other book. Know doesn't mean know as a concept, but know in here, living knowledge.

Nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

That's the summary. It's the summary of all teachings. Nothing real can be threatened.

What does that mean? That ultimately what appears as a form can, of course, be threatened, but the form reality is not the ultimate reality. It is only a temporary reality.

That can be threatened, but it is not ultimately real. Within each form is concealed the formless that gives life to the form. The formless one life gives life to the form, appears as a form, which seemingly can be threatened, but nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God, means in knowing this lies the peace of God. So if something drastic should happen to you, there may well be, we can't predict, there may be a turbulence of emotion and underneath it a peace, particularly if something has died around you.

Something that was part of your form identity, which, however, you are no longer totally confined to. Something has died. Now, death means dissolving form.

A form dissolves. Where there was a form, there is now a whole. That's what death is.

Whether it's literal death, like somebody dying, and that's an amazing thing. When you go, somebody that you have seen every day, and suddenly in the same building, the same house, the same room where you used to be with that person, he or she is gone. It's gone.

The armchair is empty. The desk, there's suddenly an absence where there was someone, and the next day, completely gone. And that is the actual death.

And then there are other kinds of deaths that also leave a hole in your existence. Your partner suddenly disappears. Who knows?

It happens. Fallen in love with somebody else. Gone.

Or something that was part of your identity on the level of form. Your reputation. You did one silly thing, and your whole reputation ruined.

Everybody's laughing about you, or whatever, or criticizing you. And that also leaves a hole. Where there was a form, reputation is something, it's a thought form, a collective thought form.

People tell you that you're great. And then you take, you say, hmm, me, great, thought, VIP, me, VIP. And suddenly the world changes its mind.

Maybe you haven't even done anything. Maybe just some newspaper people thought they'd said enough good things, and now to make it interesting, they'll invent something. And suddenly the reputation is destroyed.

True or untrue, who knows? Again, it's a kind of death. There was a form that was part of who you thought you were.

Hopefully you were not limited to just that dimension. Because if you were, life gets very unhappy when a form dissolves. What it leaves, in whatever case, whether it's actual death or a kind of death, it leaves a nothingness, an opening, a space, where there was someone or something.

And to most human beings, that's extremely frightening. They're extremely afraid of the hole that's left in your existence when someone or something around you dies. It feels painful to someone who has never had any glimpse of the dimension of the formless, particularly to someone who has never had any glimpse of that dimension.

Because someone who has never had a glimpse of the formless, death, which is the eruption of the formless into ordinary life, which is concerned with content, it is the sudden removal of one important piece of content from your life, is the most frightening and painful thing that can happen to you, to a human being, especially if they have not, never touched that within that is beyond form. If they've already touched it, not even perhaps as a continuous realization, but if they have touched it, perhaps here, perhaps wherever, if they have had glimpses, then those initial glimpses that they have had of the formless within will become strengthened when death comes into your life, or rather, takes something out of your life, when death takes some content out of your life. And then it happens that some humans have grown enormously through death, and they say, it's because of that great loss that I went deeper within.

I had to. Something within said, it doesn't say anything, but it said, there is no death. It's the knowing that only the form dies.

And so death is the great opportunity of the formless dimension shining through into your life because it leaves the hole. So you can think of a person's life as consisting of content. They have a fabric constructed of things they put together like a tapestry.

A tapestry. This is my life, they say. That consists, that's my wife, there are my children, and this is my job.

There is my savings, and the stock market investments, and my dog, and it's all part of the tapestry of my life. And that's all, everybody has that. That's the content of your life.

And suddenly, and it happens sooner or later, this nice way, everything is in place, my life is okay, and suddenly something gets torn out of the tapestry. It's violent. And you have a gaping hole in that.

Here's my life, and there's a gaping hole in my life. But there's a grace hiding there because it's through that seeming absence of the form an enormous amount of peace. If you can be with it without rejecting internally, running away from it, an enormous amount of peace can come through the sudden eruption of the formless into your life, which is death.

And that only really happens if you don't run away from it, if you face it. And this will be easier if it is your practice to face what is, any moment. Because the form that this moment takes changes continuously, and one day will come, a moment will come, always the same moment, but a form of the moment will come, that is death.

It must come. Someone close to you will die, unless you die first. You will lose something.

Somebody will leave you. One way or another, they die or they leave you, or you die or you leave them. And so, if you are ready, this is beautiful, the practice of facing what is, and then you face that, and you look.

And don't try to explain or interpret. And if you are not identified with mind, it's easiest to step out of the mind, because the mind will go berserk, because it thought it had figured it all out. The mind thought it had figured out your whole life.

And then something happens that doesn't make sense. That shouldn't, that doesn't fit in at all into what I have constructed. And also it's a dreadful shock to the ego, which is the mind, because it shows you I am not in control, ultimately.

I'm not in control. So death, why is death so, is it taboo still in our civilization? Because humans know only form, only content.

They're afraid of that which is hiding behind form, which is the formless, which is God. If it has any meaning, God is the formless one life that is the essence of every form. And it shines more when there is death.

That's the grace that is concealed in every death, whether it's a loss, which is a kind of death, or whether it's actual death. There's enormous grace in every death. The greatest grace that can come into this life is through death.

One could almost say that every life form has a certain degree of density, and it obscures the light of the source, the one source of all life. And depending on its density, it obscures it more or less. It is our purpose here to become transparent so that that can shine through, which really means to find death already before it happens, before the form dissolves, to find death before death finds you, because it will find you.

It's only a question whether you find it first. And so what is death then? It is the formless one life.

Death is not the opposite of life. It's the opposite of birth. The moment you are born, you are condemned to death.

And everybody in this room will experience the moment of death. One could almost say it's already printed on you somewhere, a date, and it's hanging over your head. We don't realize how fragile, how unstable our life is on the level of form, how quickly what looked solid can dissolve, not only the body, structures, anything.

And our civilization is trying to conceal that. We mustn't just pretend that everything is okay, everything is lasting. There are some civilizations where people are still more comfortable with death.

Dead bodies are not hidden. And in the past it was the case in virtually every civilization. Death was normal, a normal part of life.

But as the ego grows, collectively, death becomes more and more unacceptable. I've actually heard somebody say that. Totally unacceptable.

So what we are doing here is we are finding death, which is really what is that, to find that which is beyond form. That's all. And death is hiding in everyone.

Ultimately, it's the god in you that's death, because it's a formless one life. And we cannot explain why death comes to a human being at a certain time. We cannot understand it, but everything is connected to the totality.

And in that sense, there's no meaningless event, because there's no separate event. Every tiniest event is not an event. It's only when we think about it, it's a separate event.

But everything that happens is part of the web of the totality. There is a reason why it happens. It would be futile to try and figure out what that is.

You can't. Very rare instances can you get a glimpse that it actually made something that looked bad make sense. But it is enough to simply realize and accept the fact that whatever happens is part of the web of interconnectedness, that's the entire universe.

And then you get something like that drastic event in New York a few years ago when the towers collapsed. Why did this have to happen to those people who were there seemingly unprepared? We don't know.

But there is a web in which everything is connected. And ultimately, only the form dissolves. Nothing real can be threatened.

Do we know how many people realized the formless a few minutes before they died on that occasion? How many of those? We don't know.

Probably quite a few. Every second somebody dies on the planet. No, no, no, no, no, no.

Continuously they are dying. And continuously someone is born. No, no, no, no.

The born goes a little bit faster. No, no, no, no, no. So here we are becoming familiar with death in a deeper sense.

We are dying to our form identity. Not that it doesn't exist anymore, our form identity. Our form identity continues as long as we carry around this form or walk around as this form.

But we are dying to identification with it, exclusive identification with it. And that is a death because we are dying to form. And the death is the entry point into that state which is also the state of life, what Jesus called eternal life, which doesn't mean it goes on and on, it means timeless.

He always talks about eternal life. You will taste eternal life. You can taste eternal life.

Timeless life. Not millions of years. That is within you, concealed in the present moment.

Formless. The formless one life. The rest is forms of life.

They're all hiding the formless one life, carrying it as the innermost essence within, which we could even say is the equivalent of the state of the universe before it became something. The beginning of time, some people call it. They say that before the universe came into being, it was one.

Now, nobody can possibly imagine, figure out, or explain what that one point was out of which the whole universe came. They call it an explosion. The Big Bang.

But before the universe was, what was there? And of course, no scientist can answer it. Nobody can answer it.

All you can say is there was nothing. And out of that nothing, everything came. And it's still coming because we are still part of the explosion, the original explosion.

It's manifestation out of the unmanifested. But every life form that has come out of it carries the origin of the entire universe still within as the unmanifested formless one life. So the point before all life started is still within you.

That which is prior to all form and that which is there when all forms are gone. As yourself, as God. You are that.

If God has any meaning, it is that. Not an entity somewhere in space or time, but the life within all beings. The consciousness, the intelligence, the life that lives within.

The recognition of that in another is love. The recognition of God in the other, the formless, which is death. Really, it's almost shocking to say death and God are one.

I saw it in a film some years ago. I think it was called Out of Africa, about a farm in Africa. And suddenly one night the whole farm goes up in flames and the black servant of the owner, who is a European, comes running and says, God has come, God has come.

It's all going up in flames. There's a deep truth there. And there's nothing more beautiful than the voluntary death that you are dying here.

And it's quite... It's not painful. It's joyful.

And when death comes, it's not anything to be feared anymore. And you will still weep when somebody close to you dies and feel peaceful at the same time. Because you have tasted the deathless within, or eternal life.

You die every time when you step out of a thought or an emotion, step back, disidentify, and allow it to be out of the form into the formless and realize that's who you are, the formless. Was disguised, was hidden in the form. You die every time when you accept this moment as it is.

The egoic entity dies in the state of acceptance of what is. That's why it hates it. That's why it always finds something to be unhappy about because I've got to find something here that I can complain about, find personally offensive, whatever it is.

And so it sometimes happens on talks or retreats. Although, as you may have noticed, there's very little that is being said here that anybody can disagree with because everything is so self-evident. The truth is so self-evident.

But occasionally a word or two may come out of this mouth that somebody could disagree with. And with some people it happens that when they hear something like that, they cling, suddenly something within them gets a hold of that statement and then they wait three days later when question time comes, not realizing that 99% of what's the truth that was self-evident that they also knew within. But they must...

This thing spoils it all for me. You said that and that's not right because I'm an expert and I can tell you that was quite wrong. It's probably true.

But it's probably also not very important. It's always wonderful. I walk a lot in the forest at home, untouched.

And when you look around, the forms around you, almost half of them are dying. They are dead or dying. In the process they're decaying.

Tree trunks, leaves, everywhere forms are entering the state of death or have died. So half of what you see in the life of the forest is death and the other half is life at first sight. And at second sight you realize the life of the forest comes out of the dying forest.

The dying forest is part of the life of the forest. Even on that level there is no death. There's just changing life forms.

Even on that level the dead tree trunk isn't dead at all. It's full of life. So wherever you look, life does not have an opposite on whatever level.

And the life essence is one with death. So ultimately death and life are one. The one life that we could also call God.

That's quite amazing. I'm amazed myself. I've never quite said it in that way.

But the truth is always the same, of course, but it always comes out in a slightly different way because it's always fresh and new. If you can completely accept the death of someone close to you then you can find deep peace in that enormous aliveness and yourself in it. A woman told me that she sat next to her son who was 30 years old as he died of an illness.

That's painful. It's probably more painful for a parent to witness the death of a child than it is for the child or the adult, grown-up child to see the death of a parent. And she sat with him and suddenly she was able to go into the state of pure presence.

And that was a few moments before he died. And she said when he died during those few minutes when it happened the entire room was bathed in divine grace. She felt an enormous grace coming out of the dissolving body filling the entire room and she had never felt so peaceful.

And at that moment she knew that death is actually also a benediction. It is not something to be feared. Some of that stayed with her forever.

But then she said five minutes later the mind started to become active and it said things about how dreadful it was. And then she started only then she started weeping and screaming and couldn't accept. But she had witnessed that in the state of presence and it had transformed her although she seemed to have lost it shortly afterwards.

Something remained within her. And it is always grace to accompany someone who dies. If there are any questions perhaps we can ask.

There may be, there's one person there and one person there.

Can you share your views about your thinking about monogamy and responsible non-monogamy and commitments made in the past and how they apply in the present? And if you're not with the one you love do you love the one you're with?

This concerns your life on the level of form and there is not, on that level there is not right and wrong. There is not one way that is correct and the other way that is incorrect. Commitment and responsibility.

Primary commitment is to be true to life. To live rightly at this moment. It is your commitment to this moment.

Does that mean that whatever emotion comes in can suddenly change everything? No. If you are committed to this moment you bring presence to this moment.

And presence provides continuity in your life also. It doesn't mean that you jump from one thing to the next because on this moment I'm suddenly falling in love with somebody else. This happens too.

But if you are with someone if there is more than a connection on the level of mind and emotions if the other person reflects back to you your own essential reality the formless one life which can only happen when you are still you can be still together. It can only happen when stillness is an important part of the relationship. That is all the commitment you need.

To be committed to the stillness in your relationship. It doesn't even mean that you need to every day sit together and meditate for two hours. It doesn't need to...

What that is on the level of form doesn't matter. Maybe you don't meditate but you are able to be with the other person and not invade the other person with words. You are giving space to the other person and the other is giving space to you.

You allow your partner to be. Your partner allows you to be. There is spaciousness in the relationship.

The only real commitment you need is to the spaciousness in the relationship. If you lose that, nothing makes sense. You might have signed a contract that you are going to be together for the rest of your life but that contract will then be broken.

It will suddenly become meaningless. First, the ego wants, of course, something like that because it says I need to be in control and I need to have security and I need to feel that we are truly committed so we have to sign something. And that may work if you are committed to spaciousness and stillness in the relationship then the signing could be a nice part of that.

If you are not committed to spaciousness and stillness in the relationship, no matter how many contracts you sign, they won't work. And because fluctuating emotions will take over, the mind will take over, mental positions will take over and you'll be battling out your battles with your respective mental positions, one against the other. Identify with your positions.

Identify with the emotions that go with mental positions. Make the other wrong. Periodically have to act out the pain body every week or two.

Have to feed the other's pain body until finally you've had enough and say that doesn't work for us anymore. And then something comes, okay, you forget about the signed contract and then try to find a way of undoing it. So the commitment is meaningless unless there's a commitment to spaciousness, stillness, spaciousness, stillness in the relationship.

That's the primary commitment. Now, that commitment being there, what you do on the level of form doesn't really matter. Whether you sign a contract or whether you say we don't need to sign a contract, we are committed to spaciousness.

And beyond that, if on the level of form, a time should come when we realize that somebody wishes to part for whatever reason, it would be done in the peace of spaciousness. Somebody would say this, I need to go away. Who knows what form that will take?

That doesn't matter anymore. You may be together for the rest of your life. Spaciousness does not guarantee that the relationship will necessarily be there for the rest of your life because everything has a...

Some relationships work, mature, everybody grows through them, and then it's time to separate, and perhaps something else, another constellation, another arises in this world of form. This can happen. That's all on the level of form.

So whether on the level of the two forms, a relationship is permanent or not is secondary. Ultimately, on the level of form, nothing is permanent. So if you don't leave each other, one or the other will die.

So you don't really... You do whatever you feel inclined to do with the partner, formal agreement, no formal agreement, whatever it may be. All of that doesn't ultimately matter.

All that matters is the primary commitment and responsibility, which is your responsibility to life, to be true to life, which is not lose yourself in the world of form because then there's no space, and all you have is two people with their mental content, their mental emotional content, trying to somehow make it. And somehow they make it to the end until somebody dies, but there is no lasting relationship without the space. So that is the question to ask then.

Commitment is absolutely necessary, but it is the commitment not to something on the level of form. It is the commitment to the formless in the relationship. Then it'll work out.

Even if it doesn't last, it'll work out. Thank you. Okay.

[Speaker 6] (1:09:40 - 1:10:10)

So could you speak about choice? So you're being still, in the stillness, and then there's what comes and what's choice, in terms of, well, just that, but then also in terms of creating a life situation.

In the unconscious state, which of course means to be identified with one's conditioning, the mind, the mental emotional conditioning from the past, which is the ego, it is obvious that in that state there is no choice because whatever you do and whatever you think is conditioned by the past. You have not woken up in that state. So you are simply acting out past conditioning.

No choice. Pain body, completely identified with that, acting out past pain and not knowing that it is past pain, no choice. So there are still many humans on the planet who simply have no choice, who do what they do because they're still immersed in the dream, called total conditioning of the dream.

And then gradually something happens in humans and suddenly there is a realization that they have a choice. And that often starts, often it comes through great pain. The pain is generated by the unconsciousness, the unconscious living.

The unconscious living becomes painful. You generate enormous amount of suffering for yourself and others. And then the suffering for many people suddenly wakes you up.

It's like dreaming a nightmare and you can't stand it anymore and you go, Oh! And then you go back. It comes for some people as the realization that they're having certain kinds of thoughts and they've had certain kinds of thoughts in their head for years without knowing it.

And in many cases these thoughts were very negative thoughts about themselves, about other people, repetitive thoughts. And you suddenly look at your own thoughts and see, That is a dreadful world in my head. And you suddenly realize, If I lived with a person who speaks what I think, it would be hell.

If I lived with a person who criticizes me as much as my mind does, it would be dreadful.

I would have left a long time ago. And where does that realization come from?

That comes not from thought. It comes from the suddenly emerging ability to stand back and see what kinds of thoughts are going through your mind. And that's the beginning of an awakening.

And that is the beginning of choice. Because first of all you also see that there's a relationship between your inner state and your external circumstances. And you can see that to a large extent your thoughts create what you experience as the world, your world, your reality.

So some people are stuck in a dreadful world. They haven't looked at the root of it. They think all the evil is out there, so they are fighting with machine guns and bombs, not realizing that the dysfunction is not in others, it's in them.

They haven't woken up yet. So you wake up out of identification with thoughts, for the first time are able to see the thoughts, and then you can actually say, I can change my thoughts. I can think different thoughts, not as easy as it seems.

Some thoughts are very deep-seated. You can change sometimes the surface of a thought, but other thoughts are linked to emotions, and they are not so easy to change. So it requires a great deal of presence and alertness to get in there and to sense also the connection between your thoughts and the old emotions in you that are still fueling old thoughts.

But if you get in there and bring alertness to it, you can, yes, you can change the structure of thought. And, yes, things like new age things that are actually good come in that are things like positive thinking, things like visualization, things like wanting to achieve something, change your life, and imagine that the change has already happened. You see already the desired reality as reality, and you feel as if it were already there.

That's how to... However, we have come to a little obstacle here, and that's called the ego. You do not need to be free of ego.

You only need a relatively limited degree of freedom from ego to be able to change your thoughts. Some degree, yes, because totally in the grip of ego means totally identified with thoughts, so there's nothing you can do. You can step outside and change the thoughts that you think, and the ego is still operating.

You can then... The ego will attempt to create a life that it feels will provide you with ultimate fulfillment or satisfaction, will give you yourself. And I know quite a few people who have done that.

They realize the power of positive thinking. They realize the power of visualization, which of course needs to be coupled with action, but if the two go together, it can be very powerful. Creative visualization, positive thinking, repetition, and after a while they feel better and they create a better reality.

And I've met quite a few people who have done that, and they created a better reality, and a few years later or a couple of years later they came back and said, I'm unhappy again, and it's just... I've got everything I wanted, but it's not fulfilling. It's not it, and I want to get out of it.

It's imprisoning me now. I got the place I wanted, I got the business I wanted, and now it's eating me up. I want out.

So we have... And many people are at that level where you have partial freedom from ego, but you're basically still serving the ego. The ego still has wants and needs.

And positive thinking can be used to fulfill the wants and needs, but they can never be fulfilled. So you always end up with not feeling quite... That's not it.

And then comes a higher degree of externalizing what is within, and that is not from the perspective of a limited, unfulfilled me that needs a certain change in my life situation in order to find myself, to feel fulfilled, to feel complete, to be happy. It doesn't arise out of that need. It is something comes that is one with the purpose of life itself, and that can work through you and create something that is not there to fulfill the ego, but is there to fulfill the purpose of the universe itself.

And when that happens, it still sometimes looks from the outside as if you were using creative thinking or visualization, but it's different. Let me tell you how it happened with the power of now. I've lived for years a relatively secluded life in the countryside in England, in a little house, and sometimes people would come to me for counseling, whatever.

Occasionally people would invite me to little groups. I would travel, do a weekend workshop, and it helped people. Some people changed.

It's basically what I do now. But instead of several hundred people, ten people came, sometimes three. Once I had one person came for the workshop, and at one talk I had to talk to myself.

On the level of my external situation, my life did not seem fulfilled, although a few people were deriving benefit and were waking up around, not many, very few. And I knew, surely there's more that is possible, but it just wasn't happening. I was not unhappy, but there was a puzzled sense of, there must be more, reach more people.

So I said, use me to life, which I am. I'm open, use me, I'm here. And one day I woke up and I had the vision of a book, and the vision came as if it already existed, and I wrote it.

I drew a circle on a white sheet of paper, and there's the book. And then I wrote, translated into 25 languages, read by millions of people, changing the life of millions of people, changing the consciousness on the planet. And I knew that book was virtually already there, or it was in the unmanifested.

And that was on my desk for about a year and a half. And this was not something that I wanted to bring about, it was a deeper knowing that this would come. And this tends to happen when life moves through you.

I had asked for it, it's good to ask for it. I had asked for it, and so life came, moved through, not immediately, the thing was on the desk for more than a year and nothing happened. A year and a half, approximately, it was on the desk, and I looked at it, it's coming, but where?

So life was moving through, and one morning I woke up, and I didn't know that was part of that, realizing I need to leave England. Why? I don't know.

I need to leave, I need to move to the west coast of North America. It was so strong that there was no question that I had to leave. And that was life moving me away.

I had to move to the west coast. I immediately started selling things, putting things away, giving up my home. It took a few months.

Buying a ticket, I knew one, two people, one in Vancouver, one in California. Went off to the west coast. I sat on the plane.

Where am I going and what for? I don't know. Life is taking me.

Arrived in Vancouver. Stayed for a few weeks. Traveled, took a Greyhound bus to California.

Had one contact there. Then I needed to find somewhere to stay that wasn't expensive. Somebody offered to put me up.

I went to a meditation meeting, and somebody said, I have a spare bedroom. And again, life had arranged in such a way, I suddenly see everything fall into place, to go towards the original vision. But I didn't know that yet, that it has anything to do with the original vision.

That person who put me up was a complete hermit. Had never any visitors, no social life. And he was out all day working in his office.

And then he came home. I was just sat there, surrounded by just walls. Didn't know anybody, couldn't go anywhere.

What am I doing here? One day I got out my old writings I had done. After each workshop, little works that I'd done, I often would take notes.

What I had said, what had come out. That wasn't a book as such, it was a collection of notes. I had that with me.

I looked through. And I read it for the first time. Before I just wrote it, I never read it.

And I said, wow. Wow.

Wow.

I knew it wasn't a book yet. And then I put it aside. And the next day I bought a notepad, a yellow notepad in a shop.

And then I sat down again the next morning. And an enormous energy stream came through. And I wrote, What is Enlightenment?

And I knew these lines were written. That was the book. And enormous power came through.

Nobody ever disturbed me because he was a hermit. After a few weeks, I had left him, and somebody else invited me. I didn't know that before.

And she was also a total hermit. No social life, no visitors, no phone calls. I was totally undisturbed.

Life put me from there to there. And every morning for four hours, five hours, the flow would come. Occasionally things that I had written were referred to, but also a lot of new things.

There was a powerful energy stream that had lasted three months. Then I had to travel back to England. And after the deadlock, got out my notepad to write more.

I stayed in a commune then because I didn't have a home anymore. Nothing happened. Couldn't write.

Nothing is coming through. All I could do was a little bit of editing. When I got a new visa, went back to the West Coast, immediately the flow started.

Then I realized life had to take me away from there because the energy field was not right for the book to come out. I asked for it at the beginning. So there was nothing to complain.

And then you have to... One more time it happened. I had to leave, get my visa renewed, back to England.

It didn't happen. I love England. England, something within me, resonates deeply with this piece of the English countryside and the emanation of that.

And yet the book couldn't come there. It needed the more dynamic energy field, the more open, dynamic, with less burden by the past of the West Coast. And that's where it happened.

So life, I became a channel for the purpose of life to come through me. So it wasn't so much as me wanting this particular thing, but suddenly having the vision of this would be, but without knowing how. And this tends to happen when you leave egoic goals, when you no longer believe that something that you might achieve out there will make you happy.

I never thought that that would make me happy, but I felt there is more that is possible. I'm open, do what you want. I was talking to myself because I am life, as are you.

And after that, everything fell into place, always. The book was written. It was published without ever needing to look for anybody to publish it.

And very quickly, two years after it came out, I found that old sheet of paper in my luggage. And I looked at it and saw it's all come to pass. Every little thing that it says here has already happened.

And more. And more. Millions of people undergoing an inner shift.

And that was the vision. So it was not so much a wanting a particular outcome, but realizing this is it. And then it comes.

Now you ask for it, and always every new situation, if I had believed that the new situation would make me happy, fulfill me, I would have been disappointed. Because I had no idea when you become well-known how many limitations this, new limitations this brings up in your life. It's not that great on the level of form.

And the demands that are made upon one's time, but the innumerable demands, all worthy requests, demands bombarded with... I had asked for it. But...

No longer being able to have one-on-one contact when there are groups. It was so wonderful when there were 10 people. There was a one...

When 2,000 people come to a talk, I have to be ushered in and ushered out because otherwise I can't get out of there for 2 or 3 hours. It creates a separation. New limitations come in.

If I had thought this new thing would make me happy, I would have preferred, oh no, that wasn't it. So it doesn't depend, it needs to... Yes, there is more that you can do.

You know that. And all that is required is for you to be open, and say, there's more, use me. And then see what comes.

But remain... The essence is to remain rooted, not to lose the present, so that you are rooted, that you do not come from a state of dissatisfaction, and create out of a state of dissatisfaction, which you could do, not quite as powerfully, but you could say, OK, I've got to create... It won't make you happy, and perhaps not anybody else either.

So there is the egoic creation, which is, you can try out, it works up to a point, and there is the creation when life creates through you, and all you need is the openness for that, ready to be used. And don't complain later when we find many new limitations, because no matter where you go on the level of form, you will find new limitations. And once you know that, it actually doesn't matter that much.

But if you expect it, liberation through some new life situation, that's not going to happen. The liberation is already now, from form. The liberation so that you are not dependent on form and on outcome internally.

Then it's much more. Only then can life work through you. If you are dependent on some form that arises, if you are not happy where you live now, you have to be first, get through the resistance now.

If you are living in a tiny place, or wherever, for some people it's a life situation, for some people it's where they live, the work they do, whatever it is. This comes to purpose. What is my purpose here?

It goes back to that. What is my purpose here? And this purpose is twofold, two dimensions, that corresponds to the twofold nature that you are, formed and formless.

Your primary purpose is what I, in the previous question, the earlier question, I called commitment. The primary purpose is your commitment to the now, to be true to life by being true to this moment. That's primary purpose.

It has nothing to do with anything else. It's your commitment to life and then no unhappiness is generated. This is what is.

It's an uncompromising yes to this moment, so you are committed to the formless, one life that can only be accessed if you accept the forms of this moment. And that needs to be uncompromising. Your commitment to life, now this is your primary purpose, no matter what happens on the level of form.

Primary purpose comes first, commitment to that. The next is secondary, but also you can apply purpose to that. Now, having fulfilled or rather fulfilling the purpose of my life at this moment and every moment, the only moment there is, fulfilling, having committed myself to this, being a permanent commitment to now, then you can look and see what is the secondary purpose of my life and that operates on the level of form.

Now, that's the mistake that people make, is they look to the secondary and think it's primary. The primary, it is quite possible that in some way the secondary may not even function for you anymore. You may only have a few more weeks to live.

You may have some other limitation, like being in prison. There isn't much that you can do on the secondary. There may be something.

Perhaps you can talk to other prisoners and tell them about the present moment. So, primary comes first, and primary works even if you only have one hour to live now. You have fulfilled the primary purpose of your life.

Surrender to now. Good enough. Your life is fulfilled.

But as long as you have time, and some of us still have some time, there also comes the secondary purpose of your life. What do I do on the level of form? Now, the more you are rooted in the formless, which is primordial intelligence itself, the more likely it is that you will know either as an insight, as happened to me, and it may only be partial knowledge because I didn't know why I had to move England.

I had very partial knowledge, but I know what I had to do without knowing why. That's a kind of knowing, too. Sometimes you only know a bit, but it comes as a realization.

It doesn't come through decision-making process, which is the mind. You suddenly know what it is that you have to do. It's a strong, and that is much more likely to come when you fulfill the primary purpose of your life because you are connected with the non-conceptual, unconditioned intelligence of life itself.

Then you will know what life wants from you, the so-called you in this form. That can come either as a realization, and then you have to obey it. You can't say, well, I have this strong impulse to move to the West coast of North America, but I hardly know anybody there and I haven't got that much money.

What do I do? Do I have to give up my home? It doesn't make sense.

Fear comes in. Oh, I can't do that. I didn't have much to lose, fortunately.

I didn't have a career or pension plan, so it was easier. But make sure it comes from the deeper level. It comes out of the peace.

It doesn't come out of an emotion that says, oh, now I have to do that. See, there's a power and a peace that comes with that when you know what it is that you have to do.

It's a peaceful but powerful knowing.

It is not a turbulent knowing. That's an emotion-created thought, and I wouldn't necessarily do what that wants you to do. Or if you are in doubt, wait a little, become present again.

Go within. And then you'll know if it stays, then you'll know it's right. If it's only a passing thing, then the next day you suddenly have a different emotion.

So it may come as a realization. It may also come as an external event that you don't know why just the right person or event, person comes into your life or event happens that corresponds to your purpose on the outer level of form. And that is sometimes called coincidence or whatever word you have for that.

And you can't explain. Many people have told me miraculous events and happenings. How is it that I met this out of millions of people, I met the one person who actually fit it into, who opened this door for me and did that.

But it works many, many times. I've seen it. So, if it doesn't come from within, it comes as an outer event or a person or it can come as something that at first sight looks negative.

It can come as a loss. If you said, I'm here, use me, be careful, it could come as a loss of something that you thought was your security but was in reality holding you back. And if you react with hostility, if you react to what happens when that loss comes, if it is loss for you, in some cases it is, loss often must precede the new.

If you then resist the loss and become negative about it, then you block the whole flow again. The loss was life removing the obstacle for you. And if you then complain about it and feel you are a victim of life, then you are creating a new obstacle.

The obstacle that life removed for you, you replace it with some thought that is complaining. So be ready then for anything on the level of form. Even if it looks negative, you will see when you accept it, how it quickly turns into positive.

And some people had to lose all their possessions before they could do the work they were meant to do on the level of form. But that's not necessarily the case, so you don't need to run away. It is miraculous what happens when you are aligned with primary intelligence, which is yourself.

But don't block it. So what could block it is resistance when change does come into your life and it's not what you could have envisioned and your mind says, that's not what I wanted. Well, your mind doesn't know enough to know what it is that you really need.

That's not what I wanted. And then you have to be uncompromising and accept it might even be the end of, it could be the end of a relationship, it could be anything. It may not necessarily be any kind of loss or end.

You can't predict what form it takes, but all we know is life begins to work for you when you are true to life, which is now. Then life becomes cooperative. Most humans on the planet do not yet experience life as cooperative.

They experience life as hostile. It's a struggle. It doesn't have to be like that.

Life can be cooperative, benevolent, empowering, but you have to contact life first. Find the life that you are first. And only here can you find it than now.

So here we have primary purpose, which applies no matter how old you are or what your life situation is. Out of the primary purpose, if you still have enough time, comes secondary purpose to do with your life in form. And it works beautifully.

Don't judge when things happen. Accept what comes, then change comes more quickly. Accept what comes.

With the acceptance, life speeds up. With non-acceptance, life is being held back. Accept whatever comes to you as the enlightened Roman emperor, perhaps the only political leader who was ever enlightened, Marcus Aurelius, who lived 2,000 years ago, said, Accept whatever comes to you woven in the pattern of your destiny, for what could more aptly fit your needs.

And therein lies enormous power in the acceptance of whatever comes, because when you do not accept what comes to you, you are saying no to life. And the mind says, I know better, I want something else. Accept whatever comes that is part of being true to life now.

Then the power comes through the acceptance, the non-rejection. So that's primary. Then the secondary purpose unfolds with ease, and there's no struggle.

Now the fact that there's no struggle does not mean that there may not be an enormous output of energy. Sometimes when I say there's no struggle, people think, well, it's going to mean there's going to be... There can be high intensity of energy output, such as happens here in our meetings, and it's joyful, such as happens if you should do writing, there will be great intensity that flows into the writing.

But not struggle, but intensity. When the book was being written, even my voice changed and became kind of more focused. And people said, what happened?

You have a different voice. I said, I don't know, it's an energy stream that's coming through. That's what's doing it.

So cooperate. Cooperate with life so that life becomes cooperative, because what face you show to life will be a reflection you get. If you don't cooperate, welcoming to life, whatever form life takes, that is true to life.

Then life cooperates with you. It works beautifully. So primary purpose, secondary purpose.

And that applies to everyone except to those who are going to depart from this world of form shortly, which could be anybody. Then primary purpose is enough for life to be fulfilled. As long as you have time on the level of form, secondary purpose will come in also.

There's the secret of human existence. Thank you. Now, as you know, tomorrow, if there is such a thing, only in the mind, of course, is Echo Adventure Day.

And you may well ask, what has Echo Adventure got to do with the spiritual retreat? And I'm sure one or two minds have been complaining about that. First of all, you don't need to go on Echo Adventure.

You can stay here and be quiet and just be still and walk around or sit and meditate. Nobody needs to go. On the other hand, you may find it enjoyable to go on an Echo Adventure and to bring so that the retreat is not separate from life, so that you bring together normal living.

Well, Echo Adventure is not exactly normal. But it's a little bit closer to normal than here. So you bring your presence into that.

I don't know what you do in the boat. You're going down the river on the little boat and you have to be really present, apparently. What do they call it?

Water, something, water. Rafting, white water. Rafting, something like that.

Well, that will keep you present. Our silence still applies until tomorrow morning. So we remain in silence until tomorrow morning.

Those of you who don't go on the Echo Adventure may want to be silent for the rest of the day, tomorrow also. If you're here, you might as well be silent. But that's an option.

One more thought has come in. Don't become impatient if your secondary purpose does not unfold immediately. That would also block it.

Stay true to life every moment. That's enough. The universe doesn't know much about time in the way that the human mind does.

Don't become impatient because you would lose... Impatience means you've lost the present moment. And one thing you can be sure of, at this moment, there's only one, you are where you're meant to be.

That is always true. At this moment, you are where you're meant to be. And then life unfolds.

If you remember that and know that continuously, that at each moment, the only one that is, you are where you're meant to be. This doesn't mean you're stuck in it. At this moment, you are where you're meant to be.

And if you know that, if change is destined for you, it'll happen much more quickly. You can never be anywhere else than where this is the best place for you to be right now. And this makes true at this moment, doesn't it?

It's not always obvious, but it's always true. Thank you. Some of you may know the story of a disciple in a Zen place.

It was time to leave and he went to the master and said, can you just write something down for me so that I remember what you said and the essence of it all. So the master got a piece of paper and wrote and he gave it to the disciple and it said, attention. That's what it says here too.

Attention. And the disciple looked at it and said, is that all? Surely just a little bit more.

I need just a little bit more. Laughter He gave it back to the master and the master wrote something else and gave it back to the disciple and the disciple wrote, attention, attention. Laughter Laughter And the same thing happened again.

He said, but please, I need a bit more than that. He gave it back. The master wrote again, gave it back.

Attention, attention, attention. And then the disciple got a little irritated and said, well, I know that by now, but anyway, what does attention mean anyway? I don't know.

And then the master said, attention means attention. Don't know what happened after that. Laughter Of course, all the good Zen stories leave you with a sense of and then what?

If it doesn't, it's not a good Zen story. And of course, the key to the story is in that and then what? That has no answer and nothing that follows it.

Laughter But you can also see in this story the desire of the disciple to have something tangible in form to carry away, to take away with him. He wrote this down for me and he's not getting it. Laughter Attention, of course, simply means presence.

The light of presence or the space of presence in which yesterday's echo adventure for those who went on an echo adventure, that light of presence or space of presence in which that appeared. The same light in which this room now appears. Temporarily, the only thing that's timeless is the light in which things appear or the space in which things appear.

The now, we call that the now sometimes. And you may have noticed the echo adventure is already receding. It's beginning to dissolve as an actual experience.

It has already dissolved. Now it remains in that form has already dissolved. Now it remains as a thought form, perhaps until you die.

And it may remain in your camera as a on film is also a form or a digital, however that works, but I know that it's form too. I don't know how exactly that works. And I know that that's not permanent either.

Eventually the digital record will also go or the photo will turn yellow at the edges. That's maybe after you die and then your children may still remember what that was and who that was and then if the photo survives which is after a while something happens to them then your grandchildren look at it and say that I think that was my great grandfather. And at some point they lose it and it gets into somebody else's hands and then they look at it and say these are two people on a raft.

And then maybe they find them in an antique store and they've written down approximately 2004. Somewhere in Latin America maybe. I don't know exactly where.

It looks tropical. But nobody knows anymore who these forms are. Sitting on the raft.

Now even if you had written a famous book or something and then people remembered oh that's that person who wrote that book, it doesn't help very much either because that doesn't survive that much longer either. Maybe another few hundred years. And it's only a thought form.

It's beautiful to see how everything evaporates. The end of our gathering is not here yet. I'm not saying that.

But you can see it on the horizon. And then the whole experience of being here. It's suddenly it's a past.

A thought form. And the essence is the space in which it appears. And the more you contemplate how quickly things dissolve, the more you're rooted in that which is not subject to time.

The still point at the center of it all. But it's not a point. It's still space.

All words are wrong. Needing an experience which is a form that hasn't happened yet or hanging on to something that's already disappearing, that's the normal way to live. Or fearing something that's coming.

There's always the movement between hope or anticipation of an event. And then there's the fear. If it's seen as something good that's going to add something to me, there's anticipation.

Oh, it's coming. And then you want to hang on. And you can't.

Or it's something that's perceived as a loss. All the retreat is coming to an end. Then it's seen as something fearful.

And yet the essence of this retreat lies not in any experience that you have here, but in finding that which underlies all experience. So the echo adventure is not, no matter how much fun it was, is not the essence of this retreat. Even the beautiful flowers and plant life are not the essence of this retreat.

Even this room and the people in this room and the words that are being spoken are not the essence of this retreat. Because all these things are going to leave you. Or you are going to leave them.

And it's not the essence why we're here. So if you, if that, if your mind clings to the outer form of this, which is the experience of the form of the retreat, then either you'll be happy that it's over because you go back to your own bed and nobody snores in your room, except yourself, and that's okay. Or it's something that's, it doesn't seem good because it's coming to an end and it was so nice.

But that's not it. To see the essence of this, why the very reason why we're here, of discovering that which underlies all experience. The now, the presence, yourself, the stillness within, in which it all appears and disappears.

And so this retreat you carry within. The essence of it is eternal because it's yourself. And then you enjoy the rest of your life, which isn't yours, because you don't have one.

It's going beyond form and identification with form, beyond ego. When you don't know the essence, then you're trapped in form, and you identify with form, and that's ego. Your life purpose is the transcendence of that.

That's the primary purpose. And it can only be transcended at this moment. The beautiful discovery that thinking and emotions are only a tiny fragment are not who you are.

That there's a depth in you that goes beyond me, the person. A temporary form. Variously described by different teachings and teachers as eternal peace, the deathless realm, the timeless dimension of consciousness, Buddha nature, Christ within.

And now you can see the story of your so-called life, the so-called your life, from the perspective of the eternal. And from the perspective of that which is not touched by time in yourself, you can see and realize it doesn't matter that much what happens. You rise above dependency on what happens, and that's beautiful.

Beautiful. And even if you have to go back to a big city and don't see a single tree anymore when you look out of the window, that's what is at that moment. And you can feel the essence of yourself as that in which that appears.

Because within you, you carry the essence of all trees. Because what is a tree other than a manifestation in form of the one life that you in essence are? The being that you are.

So the tree, the temporary manifestation, beautiful. All manifestations are ultimately beautiful because at their core lies the essence of all life. And that's why they're beautiful.

Sometimes the beauty is not so apparent. You have to look deeply to a concrete wall when you look out of your window if you should live in a big city, and that's your view. You have to look deeply and allow it to be and find that even there there's a beauty.

But you can only find that if you have found it within the essence of life within. All the trees are an externalization of that. And even if you should never, if they should put you in prison and you should never go out into nature again, you are the divine nature out of which everything comes.

So it is there in unmanifested no form within you. Life itself, to know yourself as life prior to form, timeless, still, present, formless, that's the liberation. The demand that the life of form should satisfy you can then be dropped.

Because very often the life of form seems to refuse to satisfy you. If you've lived for long enough and you don't need that long then you can realize that although some people never realize that the life of form does not have the ability to satisfy you and they carry on seeking. And when they're 85 or 90 they still look in the jewelry window to see, that's a great ring, I'd love to have that to add to me.

Or whatever it is. Not that you cannot appreciate beauty when you're 85 or 90 you can appreciate it deeply but I'm sick. To identify with a particular form and wanting to make it me and mine is seeking to be satisfied by the world of form.

And the more rings you accumulate in this tiny example, the more fearful and unsatisfied you would feel. So the beautiful thing is to be able to drop the demand that the world of form should satisfy you. And you can only drop that, you cannot make yourself okay, I shouldn't expect anything from the world of form.

That doesn't work. I shouldn't expect because it doesn't work. But it's only if you touch that.

Sometimes the seeing is enough to touch that in you that does not need to be satisfied by the world of form because it is prior to the world of form, it is the being itself, the life itself. And sometimes for some people it's enough to see how impermanent and passing and fleeting and ultimately unsatisfying everything in this world of form is, as long as you seek something there. Only as long as you seek something there.

For some people it's enough and they suddenly say, wow, it's all like dust and smoke and I'm trying to hang on to something or make it mine. And they see suddenly the impermanence. For some people it's enough for somebody, for one big loss or somebody close to them dying to see the whole thing in that one event of the unreliability the fleetingness of all forms and it hits them once and that's enough and it awakens in them that which is beyond form.

And that's the liberation. The liberation from form is the liberation from the world because the world equals form. It's the world of form.

Not needing a particular configuration of forms in your life anymore. It doesn't mean that you cannot play. You're not condemned to a totally passive observer of the world of form from now on.

But the observer is always there even while you participate in the world of form. The observer remains no matter whether you are passive at this moment and simply sit there or stand there or walk there and watch and let it all be and see the beauty of it. Or whether you participate in the world of form and in the midst of activity and people around you are running this way and that when you're trying to build a house or build this or build that or create this or create that.

And even while you're in action not to lose yourself in the action because the action also is form. The doing. People so easily lose yourself in the doing.

The doing also is form. So see that you don't get lost. You see how easy it is the moment you start.

Okay, what do I need to do now? Even with little things and most of life consists of little things. There are not that many big things.

99% of your life consists of little things. Even if you're a famous person it still consists of little things. After they acclaim you and you get a standing ovation you go back home and drink a cup of tea and then you say, okay now, here we are.

Or a cup of tea is brought to you. Then you miss out the beauty of making it. Of putting on the kettle.

The little movements. But it's still. It's little things.

People wait for the big things. They're rare and they're not that great either when they happen. The wedding.

And of course the wedding is inseparable either from the divorce or the funeral. The big trip that's coming and then on the big trip you always are where you are. You're sitting in an airline, an aircraft seat looking out of the window and then you arrive in the hotel and then you move your body from here to there.

But it's always just this moment. It's not. It's only an idea in the mind.

The big trip. The big trip consists of one little moment at a time. And that's again why there's something people, the dissatisfaction because there's always the clash between the mind forms that are generated by the egoic consciousness.

It's the big trip coming and it's going to be great and it's going to fulfill me. And when it comes it consists of ordinary things. And the rafting, okay, that's for a moment you get that stimulus of ha ha ha.

Ha ha ha. But you could have that all the time. If you were present with every little thing.

Just that. And then you don't depend on fun anymore. Not that you can't have fun but it means that every moment is fun.

Because fun means you feel alive. If fun has any meaning it's if you feel more alive and people make fun a goal in their lives because most of the time they don't feel the aliveness. So they think, okay, where's the fun in my life?

And there's no fun in my life. And they're looking. I need a trip, another or whatever it is, another relationship.

Maybe that will bring some fun in. Ha ha ha. And what do they mean by fun?

They want to feel more alive, I suppose. What else could it mean? Ha ha ha.

They want to feel the life that they are. The aliveness of themselves. And it's hard if you're looking on the level of form, you don't get it that often.

And some people spend their whole life pursuing fun through drugs and then they go out and listen to as loud music as they can. It even affects your hearing after a few times. At least I feel a little bit alive here.

Ha ha ha. Ha ha ha. And then always fly after a few hours, you have to walk out of the discotheque and then comes the, oh, you go down again.

And then even worse, the emptiness, not the true emptiness, but the emptiness of what now? And where's the next thing? And that worse thing after a while, fun.

Ha ha ha. So many people feel they're missing out on life. Ha ha ha.

And some people, no matter what age they are, 40, 50, 60, when is it all going to start? Ha ha ha. Some people call it the big break.

I'm not whenever getting my big break the big time. Ha ha ha. The big time is now.

Ha ha ha. Ha ha ha. Now if you don't realize that the big time is now, you're never going to find it, because when you think you have found it, it will turn out not to be it.

Ha ha ha. So to all fun seekers, Ha ha ha. The fun is the aliveness of life is here in this moment, and you know to get in there to find it.

Ha ha ha. Not away from it to find it. Get in here to find it.

And then you realize the very aliveness of yourself is the fun that you were looking for. Ha ha. And so does that mean I can't have fun anymore?

No, you're having fun already. Ha ha ha. Now what does happen, of course, the dependency on experiences goes.

So the almost compulsive or addictive search for more experiences also goes. In that sense, you're no longer a fun seeker in the same way in which you're no longer a spiritual seeker when you leave here or now. I hope nobody leaves here and continues to be a spiritual seeker.

Ha ha. Because you don't want that, and if your identity has been that you're a spiritual seeker for the past 30 years, it's time to step out of that and be a finder. And not a fun seeker either, but a fun finder at this very moment.

And you may find, and some people have come to me concerned, they say things we don't get fulfillment, I don't get fulfillment anymore through the things that I used to enjoy so much. And that all they mean is the external stimulus, things don't stimulate them anymore to such an extent, because they don't need them as stimulus, they're already alive now. So then you can go into an experience that before was great, like a ride on a roller coaster.

Now why people love that? Because it forces them into intense presence. And then they scream.

And then they... One person actually gave that as an example and said, I loved it so much, and the last time I just walked past it and watched the people and said, I didn't need that anymore. And he got worried.

He thought, I'm no longer... I can't have fun anymore. You can, or you may, or you may not go into the roller coaster, but there's no need to be concerned when you walk past it and just leave it, let it be.

Let them scream. Because you don't need the stimulus anymore, but if you can enjoy it, why not enjoy that? And that's the same with all experiences.

Sex, the need for it, that's an enormous need, one of the great needs. Of course it's built into the body. The body is programmed to seek it because it wants to perpetuate itself.

It wants to produce other bodies that's built into the very genes, it's nature. So it's nature for the body to seek that. And that in itself is not problematic, as you know, when you observe animals.

The sex that animals have is never problematic, because they don't have an ego that gets in there and want something. If they have sex, it's fine, if they don't, it's fine either. Of course they try very hard to find a mate, if it's time.

There's an enormous, it is almost, you can see once I made the mistake of not having a cat, a male cat neutered. And the, you can see the enormous force that drives that cat out at night. And it travels for miles.

And it gets, when it comes home, it's totally exhausted. And then it just drops. And later when I talked to a vet, the vet told me that unneutered male cats have a much shorter lifespan than...

But also you can sense the enormous force in them that forces them to go out and seek a mate. And it's getting more difficult these days in many countries because unsplayed females are hard to find. So they have to travel long distances and sometimes they get lost and they never come back.

But even that, which is almost, I almost felt it, the cat is suffering. I almost felt there's suffering in there. Needing it and being driven.

But there's no psychological suffering as such in a cat because the cat doesn't have a self image, an unhappy me that does not have a mate. It doesn't. Because it's only that self image that creates the psychological suffering that humans have.

And so for humans, there's not only the sexual urge that's built into the genes that you have at least when you're young and then gradually it becomes less, but to some extent it's still there, but not this overwhelming thing anymore. And then maybe when you're 80, you can finally claim to have transcended it. But to see that with humans, that is a great source for to feel alive, the stimulus.

It's not only the sexual act itself, it's also the whole thing that goes with it. The adventure of meeting someone and the games that are being played. The roles that they play.

It's rare that they are themselves when they, male and female meet. It's the dance.

Animals, some animals have their dance too.

They dance around each other. And then finally so some humans are addicted to that also. It's not that it isn't in everyone of course, but there comes the addiction.

It's a psychological addiction to this. It's I need. And it becomes part of the story of me, I need.

There's far more need in the mind than in the actual physical realm. The neediness of the egoic mind is far greater with its stories because even when you're not feeling sexual, you have this idea in the mind, I need a mate, I need a mate. You do at this moment, you're fine, aren't you?

Laughter Laughter But the story creates enormous layer on top of the true needs which are really they come and go, they pass. They are either met or they are not met. They come and go, they pass.

So the fun for some people, fun a large part of fun is that. And so they seek far more than what their physical organism really needs. Because it becomes part of the psychological need of me, I need the fulfillment.

I have the memory, I want to repeat the memory of it and so on. The feeling I'm not complete without a mate. Of course, on the level of form I mentioned it briefly in The Power of Now on the level of form there may always remain a sense of incompleteness or a longing for the other polarity because on the level of form you're only one half of the whole although you have the other half built in too, but you are male or female although every male has a female, also like the symbol of Yin Yang the opposite is also in that.

But yes, there is the longing on the level of form and it can never be truly fulfilled except in sexual union and that's very brief no matter how much you practice relatively speaking brief. So there's the, you can actually you can observe that yes, there may be the longing to have just male or female energy close to me you can sense that that in itself is part of the form as form and you can take one step back and allow that longing to be there and see there's a longing for that you don't even need to formulate it, you just take a step back and watch the longing then there's space around the longing and you are that, you are not the longing the longing is nature it's the physical nature, part of that but you are the divine nature, the formless the physical nature is form so you can watch that and you can allow it to be or you can go out into like the cat does and you can watch yourself doing that and give space to that and you sit in a bar where they meet where you meet people and give, and then you can watch yourself drinking don't drink too much because then the water may get lost and then you can, you watch a male or female at the other end of that room and one or two people have asked questions about that and you feel you're being drawn to that and you can watch that, you stay almost taking a step back and it's actually and then you always have more choice than before, you have the choice you can just carry on and watch you can watch perhaps you can even watch the awakening sexual desire without needing to act on it you have the choice actually, why make it into something where the next moment, and now I need the next moment one form of tantra would be to sit there and simply watch a slight sexual desire and allow it to be and then go home I'm not saying go home, you can do what you like but it doesn't matter what you do but the thing is you can you don't need to be pulled into the next moment, into the next thing, you can actually allow enjoy at any stage you can enjoy looking at the form of a man or woman why do you need to do why not simply enjoy that, notice that you're enjoying looking at it and still you take a step back from where you can enjoy it so you're no longer obsessed you're only obsessed when there's no space around it and then it's a bit like the cat goes now you cannot tell a cat to have space around that it doesn't it's not, the cat is not that's just not how it works for cats or it could be if you go to food food is another one where people some people have a strong sense of fulfillment through that and there's a similar there can be a very intense longing and there too you can observe that at any stage that you go past a window, there's a beautiful display of exquisite food and then you can stop and watch and you can feel the longing inside and enormous in some people it can be enormous I saw a Japanese they have some weird things on TV sometimes where they have these games and so people hadn't eaten for a long time and they would put these wonderful plates in front of them and they had to have willpower not to eat it and they were sitting with this plate of food there and going and if you then the person with the strongest willpower finally would get the first prize and others would suddenly go now of course that's not it because willpower is one part of you the formal one thought mental emotional form of you battling another mental emotional form of you say which one is stronger presence has nothing to do with willpower presence means at any moment you allow whatever arises at this moment to be there so if it's then enormous longing for the food that you're looking at you become conscious of the depths of what now is this you allow the longing to be there and you can see there it is and you can feel it well I imagine that it's not one long that I ever had but I had others and then there's a space around it and with the space comes choice there comes a choice you allow the longing and then you can actually make it anything that before was an obsessive reaching out to be fulfilled through it whatever it is anything like that can become your spiritual practice and that's tantra in a wider sense because tantra means ultimately I would say making something that before was unconscious conscious so there are many movements in humans that would draw you normally into unconsciousness the desire for food the desire for sex are two strong ones even breathing breathing is usually unconscious and one way of becoming conscious is making breathing conscious similar anything that is usually unconscious and you bring consciousness to it beautiful spiritual practice so and it doesn't mean that you need to change anything from what is you don't need to change what is at this moment the longing is there the mind may call it fun the mind might have a little and there you need to be there too to see what the mind is saying when you feel the longing you feel the longing for food and the mind is saying it's the evening it's another scenario you're at home you have a big fridge well stocked and even though you've had dinner you had dinner a couple of hours ago suddenly the longing comes and you walk over to the fridge and you open the door and at that moment you become conscious of the longing the neediness inside I need to fill myself with this but that's not what the mind is saying because that means you're making it something conscious the mind is saying you've had a hard day you deserve a break you deserve something now if you're not if you're not present then you don't you cannot see that thought as a thought then you are that thought and then of course you will reach out and the whole thing will be unconscious but if you recognize that thought you've had a hard day you deserve something because nobody else has given you anything I'm going to treat myself now nobody has given so you give it to yourself also again you're not in touch with yourself you think you need to give something to yourself because nobody else has done it if you were in touch with the being that you are you would see that the neediness is already fulfilled it is not to do with food or sex not that you never are hungry or want sex again but there is a psychological neediness at any moment stop and see when you feel make it conscious any fun things especially sex, food what else is fun?

the vicarious enjoyment of entertainment also addictive for many people again you need the stimulus and in many cases it's violent because little otherwise it doesn't work anymore because gradually you become dulled to stimulus and you need more and stronger and stronger doses so you might have noticed in cinemas these days that the sound in most films is exertly exaggerated you almost need to bring earplugs to films why?

because it seems they want the stimulus what for? and it's usually films that have no other merit except exaggerated sound and exaggerated violence and then every movement makes an enormous sound somebody goes stimulus you feel alive while you're watching it and then people come and tell me I'm a bit concerned I don't enjoy these films anymore well, that may be a good thing some films are still beautiful but they don't need the exaggerated sound effects and the violence that has no purpose it doesn't show the origin of violence, the consequences of violence but simply violence as if it were a normal thing and of course it is normal in this world at any moment bring attention to it attention to that moment and see what it is and then you see you don't need to be pulled into the next moment, at any moment even a longing is fine you can feel that, it's quite interesting to sense that in yourself if you feel hungry you sense that, now it may not be physical hunger, it may be mental hunger, psychological hunger sense that sexual desire you can sense that act or not act but you have choice and it's nothing to do with willpower just by having space around whatever condition arises at this moment whatever the condition is external or internal condition to have the space around it by allowing it and being there as the one who says there it is step out of it consciousness is then free and that's the beginning of transformation many things that before were unconscious that had you that were controlling you begin to transform any kind of addiction smoking drugs drinking sex for some addiction observe the urge to smoke observe the urge to reach out for a bottle and some of you, I know that there's alcoholics anonymous, they have done quite useful work very useful work with people although there are one or two things that I would correct that just to do with your identity but some people have become conscious through an addiction it woke them up it created suffering and it forced them into being the observer into being the conscious witness so any addiction watch it watch the force of it the force behind it and give yourself let's say if it is smoking or drinking or a drug make it into a spiritual practice and say ok, I'm so lucky to have that now I can make that into my spiritual practice give yourself a space, let's talk in terms of time five minutes instead of reaching out for the bottle or the cigarette it's so unconscious, most people don't know that they're reaching for a packet of cigarette when they know it they're already half way through the cigarette and then they realize, I'm smoking you see how conscious it often is and other people, they're half way through a sandwich or have already consumed the sandwich when they realize that they have been eating a sandwich that's how unconscious it can be because while they're eating a sandwich, they're immersed in thinking so when you feel give yourself a space also in terms of time in which you simply allow the longing to be there without acting on it you don't suppress it, you allow it to be there, you don't say I shouldn't have this longing you say there's the longing and here I am and you continue to feel it give yourself a few minutes and there you sit in front of the fridge or the bottle or the packet of cigarettes if that's what it is and bring consciousness to what you sense now you may find that the enormous neediness or longing subsides as you bring consciousness to it not necessarily always it may also be that after five minutes it's still there but you are also still there and because you are also still there, you have a choice now you have a choice, you can still reach out and light the cigarette you can still open the bottle and pour yourself another drink or whatever it is you can or you cannot the longing is no longer all consuming now if you are truly addicted to a powerful drug then you would need enormous presence and you probably need help in the form of somebody next to you or close to you who can sustain with you the presence that you need to counter to counteract the if it's like say you are addicted to heroin or some very powerful drug that pulls you into unconsciousness then it's quite possible that at first there's not enough presence in you to counteract the enormous pull of that addiction but somebody with you who can then at that moment when it comes sit with you and you can both sit together in a state of intense presence can get you through that particular wave of addiction because it comes in waves and then that you may need for a while to be with someone who can hold, sustain the space of presence with you because when you are sitting with someone in presence there's an energy field in which you are joined as of course also happens in this group here there is an energy field of presence that arises that is a unifying energy field and it's extremely helpful to be with someone who is rooted in presence and he can sustain it so if there is a powerful addiction in you, you may need help initially until there's enough presence in you so that when the wave of addiction comes you can sit there a strong addiction is almost similar to pain body and often associated links into the pain body and it lives in you almost as something that possesses you and it will attempt to use your mind and you will think thoughts to justify that the substance that you are taking now, they are totally justified whatever the thought is the thoughts will then, because the addictive force will have moved into the mind and will control the thoughts and with that you very easily justify, you tell a little story why it's right to do this now whatever it is if you are not there as the observer of your mind then the thoughts will take you over and you will act on those thoughts and you will do what the thoughts tell you to do, not realizing that the thoughts are being controlled by the addictive energy field so it's vital that you are there not only on the level of what you feel the force behind the addiction but that you are also there as the witness, the observer, the presence behind the thoughts of the thoughts that arise out of that intense longing because otherwise the thoughts will fool you every time and I know some people for years they've gone through the cycle many times they've been to rehabilitation centers and so on and yet it's still there it still takes over their minds but some of them gradually through that dreadful affliction gradually their presence grows more and there are some people who are destined the world calls them addicts but some of them are destined through their addiction to rise to intense presence and that's a painful way of spiritual realization and development but that's for some people how it is there is a spiritual teacher I believe who was Stephen Levine who was I believe addicted and that was for him was part of his the addiction turned out to be his teacher and so that it can be like that the worst thing in your life can turn out to be the greatest the very thing that awakens you and so it is often also that very sensitive human beings in this world they live in this gross environment and they cannot stand the pain of it, of this world and so many of very sensitive people become addicted to drugs at a young age because the world to them is so painful and they can't stand it and they don't have the spiritual guidance at that age there's nobody around them that can easily explain to get in touch with what they already have but all they know is that the world is dreadful and is painful and they can't stand it and so they need to dull they believe they need to dull the pain and you take one and you take another and then that's but often hiding behind the external appearance of the so called addict which is another mental label lies a spiritual being that perhaps is an enormous ready for awakening often more ready than the well adjusted humans so but we were just talking about extreme forms of addiction but remember every human being unless they are already truly rooted in the formless life that they are is to a greater or lesser extent addicted if only to the great addiction that every human carries which is thinking and then you wake up at night and you say I need to think a bit more can't stop thinking what is that?

It must be surely an addiction if you can't stop thinking can't stop it, no I must have more thought no if you ever said that to yourself you would immediately become conscious thinking doesn't even say I must have more thought it just creates more thought so that addiction of course is going away, that's the primordial addiction in humans, the addiction to thinking that and it is that addiction that prevents you from accessing the deeper dimension that is below thinking out of which thinking comes but is far vaster than thinking so work with if there's whatever is in your life it's fine whatever it is if you bring presence to it it's your teacher at this moment it's whatever condition it is one mistake that spiritual seekers make is that they believe that on they need to reach perfection as on the level of form as the human being that they are to become totally and that doesn't work because the level of form must have always some imperfection there's always one or other little quirks that perhaps in the unconscious state would be an addiction but you still have certain things you may continue to like coffee you may occasionally have a drink it doesn't no longer matter when you're rooted in presence you could have a drink and it doesn't make you unconscious you can enjoy anything and be present you don't need it anymore to give you the sense of aliveness but little quirks remain some spiritual teachers remain smokers and then the people came and said that doesn't make sense why do you need to smoke and he said well I'm talking of course of Nisargadatta and he just enjoyed it it didn't matter anymore he could smoke or not smoke probably but he enjoyed it the body enjoyed it well that's how it is sometimes people come up to me at Starbucks and say you drink coffee? you shouldn't be drinking why do you need coffee? I say I don't need it but I sometimes enjoy a cup of coffee now I wear hats talking about limitations in different life situations so on the level of form there's always been this or that you don't need to become perfect as a human being not a perfect human there's no such thing because the dimension of perfection resides within you as the formless that is perfect because it is beyond form but nothing that is in form is perfect because form means limitation so you can be good there but that means you're not good there because form means limitation so not to seek perfection where it cannot be found however when the formless shines through the form then the form who you are as form is a relatively benevolent entity although it's not perfect but it is a relatively benevolent entity so it is not a form that creates hell around itself and wherever you go there is a certain blessing that comes with you it's not through the form not because you as a human are perfect but because the perfection shines through the form so giving up that and so you don't need to be to feel that you are not there yet because you still do this or you still do that you may continue to do it who knows until the body goes and that's fine you don't make yourself suffer anymore and that's one reason is because you don't demand that anything should be different from the way you are you give yourself the form space to be also and then you don't suffer and you create a superstructure and say I should be different if you allowed all the imperfections and you are the space then you would already be a master with your imperfections and also just mention it briefly because you know that there is not a future state for you to achieve if you still believe that you need to become enlightened in other words to achieve the state of enlightenment as if it were something that you can add to yourself or something that will suddenly transform you into miraculous being which you already are but you won't know it if you think that is going to come in the future enlightenment or let's call it the egoless state I want to achieve the egoless state and of course the egoless state cannot be achieved in the future or in time it is only by looking through it now that the egoless state is here now a state that you want to achieve is a mental concept in which that is endowed with self and as such you can never reach it because it is an abstract concept of who I want to be not realizing you are it already so the egoless state it does not lie in the future it has nothing to do with future you cannot make it into a goal you cannot make whether you call it the egoless state or whether you call it enlightenment you cannot make it into a goal goal implies future because the very entry point into the egoless state or the enlightened state is the present moment if you make it into a goal that you want to achieve you miss the entry point because you are looking to the future because goal implies future and that is the dilemma of all spiritual seekers because they listen to spiritual talk or read a spiritual book and say there is such a thing as the egoless state or the enlightened state and perhaps I can achieve it too and immediately they make it into a goal project it away it becomes mind a mental image of who I want to be future and not realize that their very search for to actualize that image prevents them from being it now because the entry point is here, this moment only the ego can only be transcended through accessing the power of the present moment no other way enlightenment is only in the power of the present moment, nowhere else so it's never, it's only humans who give up the search who realize it's already here so you have to, one way or another, either because you are totally frustrated with the spiritual search or because you suddenly see the truth of it give up the search as if it were future there is still there seems to conflict with certain teachings that say basically there are two conflicting spiritual teachings one says, that seems what I've just said, but it's not quite it one says there's nothing you can do and you might as well totally relax because you can't bring it about there's nothing absolutely nothing you can do about it so let go, forget about all, some teachers say that forget the whole thing just have fun the other teaching says if you do not want enlightenment as intensely as a man, a drowning man wants air you're not going to get it now what I had what I just said seems to be more towards the other, that you cannot make it into something to want or to get but really the truth is hiding you bring the two together and how does that look? how can you bring those together?

on the one hand there's nothing you can do, that's true and on the other hand, an intensity is required you bring the two together, the very intensity that is mistakenly interpreted as an intensity that's driving you towards a future goal can become an intensity that is driving you into the present moment that's the uncompromising intensity there's only this moment and yes, there's an intensity there that goes, takes you deeper into this, it's not an intensity that drives you into future there's nothing you can do, it's true in the sense that if doing requires future and time, that doesn't help you and of course, going into the present moment and becoming internally aligned with the present moment isn't really a doing in that sense, there's nothing you can do you can only allow the present moment to be, and go deeply into it it's a question of how you use language but so in that sense, they are right there's nothing you can do and the others are also right the intensity is required the intensity with which you embrace the now so that's there's the point no future state you're not becoming something that you are not now and so you may have heard some spiritual teacher saying, you're enlightened already and that's deep down, that is true every human being is already complete within, on the level of form there are all kinds of things that perhaps you could still do and play around with, and add to yourself and learn or experience but in the depths of who you are your essence identity is already totally complete it doesn't require more time or more things to be added to who you are in your essence and really that is what matters in that sense, only future can only prevent you from being it finding it, and being it now so it's for some people hard to get rid of this idea, because it's no more than an idea in the head, that I need to achieve something become something but it's not really true, so it's truer to say, you are already it, you just need to realize it that you are already fully yourself you are already fully yourself you don't need more time or more of anything to be who you are already now you're already divine timeless, eternal in your essence everything else is on the level of form and it's a dance a game, a play of form there sometimes you get more and then you lose again you can play so, no more spiritual seeking intensity, yes but the intensity that drives you into the now not an intensity that wants to actualize an imagined state me as the enlightened one which you already are there was one psychologist some years, many years ago who lived, I can't remember the name he talked about self-actualizing and self-image-actualizing I don't know if this is exactly what he talked about but most people live in the realm of self-image-actualizing they have a self-image that they want to actualize that's the realm of delusion and that prevents them from the self-actualization that is right here now now it's a pity that you have to drop the idea of me as an enlightened one we can now see by Meister Eckhart in the 13th century the mystic said he used the term God quite often of course God is the essence, the formless essence of all life that you are the greatest obstacle to God is time now we can be thankful for the ego because it was a necessary stage in the evolution of humans and in realization as some Buddhists say if there were no illusion there would be no enlightenment it was a necessary stage was it fun? no it was a search for fun but so questions such as but when will I when will I finally be free of this or that the ego this, when you don't need that future moment, just this is enough you are already free now by being that which allows whatever condition is here now to be as that, you are already free by not losing yourself in the condition, you are free that's freedom and then what condition arises doesn't really matter that much anymore some may be called good, some may be called bad, but also here from that space spaciousness that is there once you allow the condition you don't depend so much on the good and bad of conditions anymore there is a liking and a disliking of what I like I dislike that, I like that I dislike that then you can just it is as it is you can still do things to change conditions that's part of it but in the meantime, is always is even while you change is in all whatever it is little things or big things if your body is ill now, illness is already an abstraction is already a mental concept so don't lose yourself because when you if you lose yourself in the mental concept I am ill, that's already a double illusion what is the reality of the illness at this moment and at this moment it may be you feel pain you feel perhaps a disability you feel weakness that is what is at this moment, or it may well be that you have an abstract knowing that somebody told you that you have an illness but you can't feel it yet that's possible too so it would not be the reality of this moment what is the reality of this moment, the condition of this moment bodily, physical condition you feel what you feel at this moment like weak or pain or whatever it is discomfort discomfort that's the reality of it at this moment and what can you do you allow because it is now that doesn't mean you cannot take any action to get better but the primordial action is the non-action of allowing what is and that we come again to the primary and the secondary the primary is to allow whatever condition is here now to be as it is then you can seek there may be something you can do you may have to see someone, a doctor a healer, you may want to change your diet something may be required on the level of form also that's secondary but the primary is and so any action that arises out of the primary is then present action and you are more likely to take the right kind of action if you are present first, so the action doesn't arise out of fear or out of anger with what has happened to you or out of depression or sadness because it's become a story in your mind, you say that's not fair you become a victim life has done something to you these are all mental stories always staying with what is what's the condition now, that's what is and somebody who wrote a book about healing some years ago said spontaneous healing which does happen and is much more likely he found that out through actually experimenting and talking to people many, many people he was a doctor or is a doctor those people who have accepted first were much more likely to be healed than those people who had strong this goes very much against what our culture tells you, which makes the illness into an enemy, because it makes everything the ego makes everything into an enemy so you need to fight the illness make it into an enemy that's not how healing happens. Healing comes first with allowing because there's some imbalance there that's why the illness is there and to some extent certain imbalances may always be there as long as you live in this mad world and so see don't fight it don't make any condition into an enemy that includes illness the illness is not an enemy so healing comes with allowing the condition, whatever it is which doesn't mean that you accept that you are ill that's a story in the head well, I have this illness and I might as well accept it no, that doesn't work it's a story that you've created acceptance refers to the direct and immediate condition of what is not something you tell yourself in the head so you don't accept an illness you realize illness is a concept accept this it even happens sometimes that the concept and the medical system doesn't know about this yet but some people are beginning to realize it, that the very concept of certain illnesses creates many more of those illnesses because you have a mental concept now and so many there are far more illnesses now than there were before because we have more mental concepts of illnesses, different illnesses and suddenly so many more people you have suddenly discovered a new illness and suddenly everybody, not everybody but many, it appears everywhere oh, that's strange how the mind and that are connected it becomes more and more differentiated it is true that some things are also new, they develop but the more you emphasize the concept of it the more of it you see you find and of course some have taken that to extremes there are some religious practitioners who can totally deny the reality of illness there are some churches I believe science can't remember the names church of religious science they have some truth there they have touched a truth there they say, they read ultimately it's an illusion which is true because everything on the level of form is ultimately an illusion so they totally deny the existence of any illness which if it's done truly can be very powerful healing I suspect that very often it remains still on the level of mind so being with what is remaining and that's true change comes then when you bring presence to what is you don't want you don't demand that this should be different whatever the condition is and amazingly then it is different it changes and action you can take that is intelligent that doesn't come out of denial it doesn't come out of anger or out of fear much more likely to be intelligent action you go to the right person to help you or you do the right thing or you stop doing the wrong thing because you suddenly see that you've been doing something that's created it this afternoon which at the moment is only a mental concept we'll address some further questions it happens in written form unless something else happens we don't know as they very nicely add often here in Spanish speaking countries si Dios quiere if God wants when they say we're going to do something you add si Dios quiere that's true because you don't know what's going to happen the ego thinks I'm in control we don't know the word that I use a lot that some people get irritated by is maybe and then Kim says did you tell him that you were going to do this when he asked you to do it he said you told him yes and I said no I said maybe because there's nothing more than really you can ever say you're not in control whatever the total, what is it the universe wants yes this is going to happen at four o'clock it's going to happen maybe in some countries where they have an innate wisdom and not so much ego yet they use that word a lot too there's some countries where people tell me people always say maybe and other countries where people are not quite as unhappy yet as in the west yet like Indonesia or Bali, people tell me that the language they speak there doesn't have a past tense or future tense it's all present well that's a little help however the western mind which is the egoic externalist is creeping all over the planet it's everybody's destiny to go through it and then transcend it but this can be done more quickly now don't need another thousand years a sometimes beautiful line in the course in miracles sometimes quote it has taken time to misguide you so completely but it takes no time at all to be who you are thank you as usual I don't know what to say but there are lots of questions waiting usually there are more questions than answers not only on retreats also in the human mind there's no end to the questions the human mind can ask one of them is and then what? what happens next? after that?

after enlightenment then what? we already addressed strangely some of the questions when I looked through that were asked this morning to some extent especially questions to do with wanting to become enlightened and some questions connected with sex and things like that entertainment entertainment fun but we may come back to a different perspective on those so I hope the two or three questions that are to do with I really want to be enlightened and so I believe this morning already gave the answer to that that it's not a goal in the future if you make it into that that's the sure way of not being enlightened also some questions are very similar they're duplicated two or three or four of them so we'll see do any of our the questions are quite good by the way very many good questions that are helpful to everybody but don't feel personally offended if your question doesn't come up it does not mean it's not good enough or you are not good enough because your question hasn't come up or whatever the mind can think of why mine hasn't come up if you have any true vital question a vital question is different from a mind made question a mind made question is curious about this and that speculating like theories a vital question concerns your very being and if there's ever a question that you truly need an answer to if you become still the answer will come or the question disappears in the stillness and that's often the case sometimes people travelled long distances to see a teacher with prepared questions in their head such as happened to Paul Brunton who discovered so to speak for the West, Ramana Maharshi and visited saw him his very highly trained mind had prepared some extremely intelligent questions and when he came into his presence Ramana Maharshi just looked at him and suddenly he said all the questions dissolved in presence they became unimportant and secondary so he didn't need to ask those, it's maybe some later point he asked a few but right there when he met him he realised the relative the only relative importance of any question so any vital answer you already know it you just have to be still enough to access the knowing the knowing is not necessarily conceptual, it may not even come as a thought there is a knowing that is deeper than thought there have been some awake humans who were in that state of deep knowing but could not express it through words it just didn't translate into words so all they could do is just sit there and in India there are always a few teachers who are that way, I mean there are thousands of teachers but relatively few true ones and of those few true ones there are always a few who simply sit there and that's enough some even lie on the sofa or bed and that's enough now they don't reach that many people because a video of somebody lying on a sofa isn't it's not that interesting the knowing the very source of all knowing is in you and anything that is being said here has been said or is being said is immediately recognized by the source of all knowing that is in you as you sit here it's as if you were speaking to yourself that's how it works occasionally the mind may interfere and say is that true, is the distance from here to the moon really he said the distance, if I gave some fact and the fact happened to be not right, that's possible then the mind might come in and say oh that's not quite right and then the ego may come in immediately after and say he's wrong, I must tell him that he's wrong, I must tell him that I know better and then he would lose the rest of the words but the vital words you know, they're recognized immediately, that's why it's pleasant it is you feel deeply alive as you sit here because your own truth is there it is not separate it just happens to come through this form the form is transparent, relatively speaking and so it comes through but you are transparent enough to recognize it if you were dense, all these words would be totally meaningless what's he talking about so the recognition the sense of ah yes you listen to the talk just as I do this form it's the same as you don't know what the next word is going to be, I don't know what the next word is going to be not that it is channeled in a narrow sense of the word, not that I feel there's an entity, but it is consciousness there may be some helpful entities too thank you better be careful thank you but these entities, if they are helpful where do they derive their wisdom from from the one consciousness, so it always goes back to the source if there should be an angel next to you, then what is that, a manifestation of the one source this is a short one and what of the new earth the new earth this, I'm writing a little bit more these days and that may turn into a book it seems the provisional title is a new earth, but it's only a provisional title a new earth of course the words come from the bible they appear in the book of revelations which also called the apocalypse which tells you about everything collapsing the whole man-made order of things collapsing that's what it is about, symbolically and then when it's all collapsed the writer says, and I saw a new heaven and a new earth out of the collapsed world rises a new world so that's in a way where the title comes from, a new earth and I saw a new heaven and a new earth that's what it says and the way I see that is a new heaven is a new consciousness that is arising, this is causal in humans the transformation of human consciousness it's the inner heaven is the inner world a new earth is the outer manifestation of the transformed consciousness so the question and what of the new earth the answer to that is we don't need to be concerned about the new earth all we need to be concerned about is the new heaven and that's why we are here because heaven is the inner the inner transformation of consciousness the outer, the externalization of that as a different world that humans create once the shift has happened that is obvious that politically economically, socially in every respect the structures, the man made structures and even the buildings and the cities and so on will be very different from that which the egoic consciousness creates so our gathering here is the arising of a new heaven the inner the rest comes automatically when it comes to making choices about life situation are there some decisions that are wrong and some choices that must be avoided because they will lead into greater selfishness in other words are some choices absolutely wrong or will eventually all choices bring us to wakefulness what then is the basis for making choices in the relative world now to some extent the answer is already here in the second question and that is all choices eventually bring you to awakening even if they appear wrong if they are wrong now wrong means they lead you into more delusion they lead you into more ego, they lead you into more suffering for yourself and others perhaps usually they go together if you make yourself suffer you make others suffer so if they are wrong in that sense then yes they bring about suffering and delusion and eventually suffering wakes you up so there is ultimately nothing wrong as such you cannot say that anything is wrong any choice that you make because if it is you will suffer and then the suffering will wake you up and that's a relief to know that eventually every road that you take will get you there but some are longer than others some go the roundabout way a bit more pain a bit more time and suffering the basis for a right choice of course is presence and to become still so that it comes from a deeper level of intelligence and not the conditioned mind or an emotion that you are suddenly overcome by and immediately act upon so there are always, you can make choices should I stay here or should I move should I marry this person or not, should I leave this person or stay with him or her should I leave my job should I leave everything behind and move to India should I go and help the needy in a poor country should I many choices and whatever you choose if you bring presence to it then you're fine and you've made the right choice the best choice the realization of what it is right for you to do does not come through thinking that is the main thing so in a way you could call that the basis for making choice in this relative world for making choices you can think for a while you can even write down the pro and cons of this choice or that choice if I do that but then on the other hand but even that won't give you a definitive answer the true realization and usually when it comes out of presence it comes as a ready made realization of this is what I have to do but don't mistake a strong emotion for that because that could be but the next day it'll be gone that remains the realization remains you can wait a few days and it'll still be there and you can wait a week or two or three weeks and still it remains whereas emotion will fluctuate so don't mistake a sudden or even a thought coupled with an emotion for it if it's very strong some thoughts have enormous energy behind them I have to get out of here just okay now this could be mistaken for something that comes from and it could be but it may not be just okay wait see what how you feel let sleep and then get up in the morning and see if that's still true if it's true it remains true because it comes from a deeper level when the realization came I had to leave England it remained with me I woke up in the morning and I had to go to the west coast and then okay that was it the next day it was still there the next day it was still there and a week later it was still there and then I knew yes that's it it was not arrived at through decision making because decision making is limited it involves thinking thinking always involves opposites if it comes from presence it's almost like a ready made answer ah this is what I and there is so that really choice means there is no choice in a way suddenly something comes and you almost have no choice anymore that is that is a true choice is no choice and even there the ego can still interfere and it can say oh no you don't you shouldn't do that what about your pension plan what about this what about that so those are wonderful when it comes though still you are the more likely it is that a realization of what is right if you are at a crossroads or feel they have to what is right will come suddenly ah yes I mentioned also yesterday that the sometimes the answer comes in the form of an event when you are present sometimes it comes from within as a realization but when you are present the answer to what it is what is needed if there is a choice in the external may sometimes come as an event that suddenly comes into your life and that clearly opens a door where before you didn't know and suddenly the door opens here so you have to also be alert to see what kind of events are happening while when you need an answer you become still and then see what the answer may come from without so to speak it may come through a person also an event a person that you meet an event that suddenly happens and even a so called bad event can sometimes be part of the answer but ultimately there are no mistakes there are only temporary learning situations because just look back on your life well if there is something to look back on I'd like to I've been told that the youngest person here is 12 years old I believe and it's wonderful thank you for being here and so present you are certainly more conscious than I was at 12 and I believe the oldest person is 91 is that right?

91 or something like that so it's and that's exactly it's wonderful to see those are the where consciousness needs to enter the incredible opportunity of old age for awakening and the wonderful thing when already at a young age that new consciousness arises it's beautiful to see so if there is if you look back on your life if you are 12 there isn't that much to look back on but and you haven't had time to make many mistakes but if you look back on your life you will probably discover many mistakes so called mistakes shouldn't have done that that was the wrong choice that took me there and I did that for years and then I realized it wasn't it and then I chose the wrong partner in some cases and another wrong partner and yet it's all taken you to this moment it's all taken you to this moment of presence and so it worked one could almost say retrospectively the meaningless jumble of events of your life becomes meaningful because presence arises now the arising presence now makes even gives meaning to the seemingly meaningful past because it's taken you here all the mistakes and all the chaos has taken you here if I look back on my life it was one mistake after another really one mistake after another the whole university thing was a mistake many things that I tried turned out to be mistakes and until the book was written if somebody had only looked at the externals of my life one would have said this person made too many mistakes that's why he didn't get anywhere externally from an external viewpoint and some of my family and relatives took that viewpoint and yet something suddenly came out of that it's almost like the that's perhaps why the lotus flower is the symbol of the consciousness in Buddhism and it grows out of the mud it has its roots in the mud and then suddenly out of the mud comes that incredible beauty out of that so be glad about all your mistakes they were not mistakes they might have been before but they're not now because presence is arising it's taken you into presence that's what it was supposed to do so it worked or if you need a few more then okay for the first time I understand true compassion but only in my head when I am presence one life doesn't come to me I believe he means when I am presence he or she means when I am presence the realization of the one life doesn't come to me so the person understands compassion mentally but has not yet experienced it especially in certain cases like I don't feel one with a snake a spider or George Bush am I doing something wrong? no no it doesn't quite work like that to feel that when you are presence and you watch a snake you immediately feel compassion or you see somebody on television and you immediately feel compassion compassion first arises first you need to remain present and look it's not just okay I don't feel you need to be able to look at a being a life form and continue to look and then usually presence first arises is not when you see the intact life form compassion arises when the life form the form begins to become broken and at that moment when you are present compassion arises because at that moment you see the dual nature of that life form whether it's an animal or a human or some other life form being one with the dual nature of yourself the form, the impermanent and fragile form being broken and out of that the opening that is there when the form breaks and it could be not necessarily death immediately it could be a serious injury an animal that is injured or a human that is injured and then you would when you are present and you contemplate the form, the fragile nature of the form and that which is beyond the form can then come through more clearly and that is what resonates with the formless within you and then it can happen that there may be a human being whom you did not like at all in ordinary day to day living maybe somebody at work if I say who is the person that you least like in your life can think of that person and then if you imagine that person suddenly having a serious accident and you are there witnessing it and lying there all the that which is not essential in that person all the conditioning of that person that you had mistaken for who that person is all the unconscious conditioning that became the person that you disliked and the dislike strengthened the dimension of person egoic person in you all that suddenly becomes irrelevant or collapses completely and if the person had a strong ego a lot of role playing and posturing and suddenly that person has a serious accident all that would collapse and you would see something shining through that is not the conditioned unconsciousness that is the ego and the same would happen in an animal, a suffering animal even if the animal you didn't like or even feared when it begins to be the form breaks up then compassion arises and that is when you experience compassion fully and for the first time and when you the more you become rooted in the formless the more you feel it then a time suddenly you may realize you feel it even when the form is still intact you can look through the form and all the behavior patterns and thoughts that are manifested by this form that are only temporary formations not who that life form is in its his or her essence and so you can look through it and you can still see the unconsciousness on the surface if it's a human being you can see the limitations of the animal life form, the animal the scorpion or whatever it is but they do what they have to do according to their form they have certain limitations and certain animals will if you approach them probably bite you maybe not, miracles happen if you are totally present they may not bite you we don't know, you have to try it out but it is in the nature of the scorpion to bite we can't help it and it's in the nature of humans to do similar things they are not yet conscious enough they go there was a story, I don't quite remember the details there was a spiritual teacher and a scorpion that scorpion fell in the water or something and the teacher took it out and he got bitten and it happened again and the master took it and the disciple said, why do you take can't you see that you get bitten every time he said, well it's in its nature to bite and it's my nature to save so you don't it's the limitation of the form and that applies to humans and also to animals animals are usually much easier to like than some humans because there is less the being shines through despite the limitations of their form they are still closer to being than humans there is not the density of mind that's in the way there is not a mentally constructed person that's playing a role usually animals don't play roles except for very few dogs and cats that have lived with roleplaying humans for too long they get a little bit of roleplaying you see the beginnings of an ego in some pets that have lived for a long time with people with strong egos then they get, oh there is a little developing ego in that little dog but most of the time animals remain amazingly sane despite the humans they live with and so that you look into the eyes of a cat or a dog and there is so much goodness yes the cat has its limitations and the dog has its limitations the cat when it sees a bird it goes the mouse quivers they look at a bird and the mouse goes now the cat cannot yet be the witness of that so there are the limitations of form in humans and animals and they are more pronounced it seems in humans even in some ways so it's look at first compassion then you learn what compassion is by witnessing when the form is no longer fully functioning it begins to break up in one way or another and then if you truly watch then you feel no matter who it is that is having the accident or is close to death or whatever it may be you will feel compassion arising because the essence begins to shine through and you recognize it through the presence which is the light from your essence and whether it's George Bush or whoever it doesn't matter or a snake or whatever laughter that just comes from the question laughter so and then compassion as presence deepens in you you will be able to look through the limitations of form in animals and humans in the snake, in the scorpion in human beings you can look through that and you can have compassion with unconscious people because you recognize that what they do comes out of their conditioning it's ego, it's collective it's the collective unconsciousness of humanity there's not a anybody there really it's an expression of the collective unconsciousness of humanity and they manifest it it's nobody's fault as such and yet of course yes they make themselves and others suffer through unconsciousness the consequences of unconsciousness are suffering and that's how awakening also happens a person with a strong ego and everybody sees they're playing a role if a little thing happens to that person like say a person, a man or a woman with a strong ego walking along the street and they slip on a banana skin and they just, it's a minor fall everybody laughs the stronger the ego the more people will laugh because there's the discrepancy of the role and suddenly showing they're not in control and what happens to them but if something drastic happens nobody laughs anymore because immediately all that evaporates the whole level of ego and if you're present you will even run if you have enemies I hope nobody here still has enemies you would run and even save your enemy because at that moment you realize that was all in the realm of relativity nobody is your enemy in essence and it's compassion so with everyone you share, with every life form you share the precariousness of the form and the eternal of the essence and when you weep when a life form dies that's because you share you recognize that's you also you see yourself there also you share the fleetingness of the life of form and you can weep and the peace that you feel at the same time is the realization that both you and that life form are ultimately only temporary expressions of the one eternal life and that's where peace emanates from that realization put the two together and that's compassion I'm visited by an uneasiness or anxiety that what I'm doing to increase moments of consciousness is not enough a feeling something is lacking blocking the way there's a pill I need to take or if I just remove an obstacle or listen to another tape a shift will come occur this panic wakes me in the night several times a week is it a result of psychological makeup or disposition of a warrior or is it a message from unconscious realm to be listened to or is it fear and then it says at the bottom if you think I need medication don't read this question well I read it I believe there's one little mistake in the question a slight misperception it's in the first sentence I'm visited by an uneasiness or anxiety that what I'm doing to increase moments of consciousness is not enough this may be the anxiety that you experience here under these circumstances there's simply the condition of fear or anxiety and the mind according to your circumstances attempts to find an explanation for the anxiety so here the mind says I'm feeling anxious because presence isn't arising or it's not enough yet I feel I need more and that's why I'm anxious it's likely that in other circumstances or at other times in your life that also came or will come and will take a different form but the anxiety and the fear are there and usually the anxiety or fear are misinterpreted by the mind in the same way that in a dream often you have an underlying emotion that gives rise to the dream it could be fear or anxiety it could be something else it could be some other emotion and then suddenly you dream a dream that is the illustration of that emotion and it seems that the dream is causing the emotion in the dream oh I felt fearful because I dreamt that there was a monster running after me but it wasn't the monster was created by the mind to explain the fear and that created the dream and in the same way in normal wakefulness there are primordial emotions and fear is the most primordial emotion that humans carry inside that the mind interprets in different ways it says I fear because there's not enough money in the bank my job is not secure I don't know how much longer I'm going to live my health is unstable my relationship may collapse I have so many reasons I have fear because and then comes whatever it is in your surroundings not realizing the primordial condition that everybody has inherited that is part of everybody's pain body is the condition of fear every ego lives in a state of fear even if they look big at night they have nightmares and in the morning again they play the role and then the fear comes also at other times but disguises itself in different forms it can come as anger so anger is usually the disguised form of fear so the fear is there and let's just see allow that to be there and see it for what it is it's fear and even that's a label it has a certain feeling quality to it and you can observe that with your inner eye so to speak in other words feel it feel what the fear feels like and maybe not even call it fear anymore it's just a mental label it is something, yes, it's something in here that I feel and there it is at night you wake up and you feel that and then the mind will quickly come in and try to find an explanation if you're here you might think I'm feeling fear because I'm not I fear that I'll never be present enough or it might think I'm fearful because I have to go back home soon whatever it is so instead just be with the fear directly and say that's the condition of this moment a turbulence a shaking a quiver or a feeling of can't even call it fear maybe it's some kind of dread that's what I had it wasn't quite fear but it was a kind of dread of everything of life itself because I only knew the life of form and it became more and more alien there was a dread of the whole world as described in Jean-Paul Sartre's book Nausea aptly entitled Nausea which is the nausea of the world he described, I read that book later, what I felt the dread of even looking at an object even looking at the walls at night makes you feel almost sick

and so it's tempting for the mind to find an explanation and my mind did that for a long time it explained my life situation is so insecure I'm never going to make it I'm miserable nobody likes me everybody thinks I'm nothing all kinds of stories and yet there was the primordial condition of dread and so can you if that arises it is the condition of this moment the form that this moment takes you're in bed, if it is for many people it's in bed at night particularly because there seems to be something about it that triggers it and so you lie there and you have fear can you not escape into thought when that happens because if you go into thinking then you're leaving the emotion you're not there witnessing it you're escaping from what you feel and your thought processes will be only a reflection of what you feel some explanation so can you stay with that feeling and simply say there it is give it space almost step back from it or endure it by surrendering to it sometimes there was one teacher who called that practice conscious suffering you surrender to what you feel don't run away just stay with it and feel it it's not going to kill you that's for sure if you allow it to rise into your mind and you go into thinking it might kill you, it has done that because it might drive you to the bridge and then you jump off but if you face it directly it's not going to kill you and so you stay with it and the more you allow it the more that which is no more than trapped energy begins to transform as because it's the light of consciousness that initiates the transformation of it so any kind of pain physical or emotional that still arises, but you have to look to see whether it's being created by a thought that you're thinking at this moment in which case you can see the fallacy of that or whether it's old and the fear that most humans carry is old fear it's of course contributed to by dysfunctional thinking continuously about the ego's attempt to control the future you think about the next and the next moment that you can't control, it creates more and more fear but if you stay more present live increasingly in presence then you are not creating new levels of fear on top of the old that's already inside you as part of the pain body you don't create new fear the more present you are, the more you realize there's nothing to fear in this moment there's only something to fear in the next moment which is conceptual so the fear is created by the conceptual reality in the mind that creates future and it's always uncertain therefore fear comes mixed up with hope sometimes they go together, you don't know what it is are you hoping for the future to come or are you fearing because it could be good or bad so anything painful physical or mental but be alert to see whether it's being created if it's not being created now it's old, it just comes you wake up and there it is stay with it allow it to be give it space and then it becomes if it's physical pain it consumes the ego quickly it has done that in some people who have suffered acute physical pain prolonged physical pain it drove them to surrender and that is called conscious suffering it's to surrender to whatever it is that you feel at this moment then it becomes like a fire it's beautiful some teachers and this is not what I advocate here, so don't get me wrong it's not part of this teaching it's to generate some kind of discomfort or pain and then stay conscious as it's there, you disidentify from the feeling, from the form that feels the yogis do that in India sometimes stand on one leg for six years and these are considered holy men in India there is some truth hiding there we see it this looks so mad and yet it is one way of being the witness anything that you allow to be don't run away from and surrender to completely brings about presence but in many cases of course in India there may be a few true ones in many cases it's an ego device to get recognition or money from others who consider you to be a holy man or woman, but some of them are real so they do the most the weirdest things to inflict pain for years and years some sit in the same place for 20 years or sit on painful you know the famous bed of nails but there is a truth hiding there too not that you need to do that because life gives you enough to work with you don't need to generate additional pain life is very generous it always gives you exactly what you need and that's all you need to work with but it's called conscious suffering when it does come it's the condition of this moment so you embrace the condition of this moment surrender to that and there is space around it light space there is a disidentification from the condition and it's beautiful could you please help me see clearly about this I find this week when I have been more still and less mind activity than ever before I have deliberately not read or allowed my mind to go off on long trains of thought that I am experiencing a numbness, an inert kind of inactivity but it feels more like dullness than aliveness the thought comes I would rather have the highs and lows than this blankness and neutrality I am not sure I want a life that is so tranquil it seems too uneventful and uninteresting what is the switch that brings in the aliveness, joy, exhilaration, etc this seems all yin with no yang now of course life the manifested life the world won't leave you alone anyway so it will continue to be interesting because the world will come in and challenge you and that makes the life of form interesting the question is will you lose yourself in that and it's no longer interesting it just becomes a burden it becomes depressing it becomes a place of fear when you lose yourself in it but yes why not have an interesting life in the world of form you don't have to give that up now presence is not interesting, that's true this is not entirely what he says about presence is not quite it yet, we'll see but one thing is true presence is not interesting because interesting can only apply to the world of forms where you can look at and say isn't that interesting look at that and look at that and then you work something out and the more you work it out the more interesting it gets there are many things in this life that are beyond interesting nature if you truly look at it if you look at nature from the point of view of mind only it's interesting because then you analyze the different species of birds and how they behave and you start writing things down and look it up in books and see how the trees work and what kind of leaves and compare the leaves to other leaves what families they belong to that's all interesting if you look at nature from no mind it suddenly becomes completely uninteresting but yes, it is alive sacred beautiful but you couldn't call it interesting if you watch the sunset if you watch the sunset and you have a camera and you have measuring devices to see the intensity of the sunlight and little tables and scales where you write it down then the sunset is interesting and then you can watch the sunset and just allow it to be see the majesty the beauty and the mystery of it you can no longer call it interesting it's of incredible beauty and vastness but it's not interesting because interesting means little bits and pieces interesting means you're cutting it means forms different forms in different pieces and the more you cut the world into little bits and pieces the more interesting it becomes and the more active the mind gets oh, isn't that interesting let's talk about this let's talk about the sunset now now, that level has its place for certain things in this manifested life that level measuring the sunlight may be useful for certain purposes but if that takes over your life then your whole life becomes reduced to the dimension of interesting which means it's the dimension of mind that cuts things up can never see the wholeness of things and that's a dreadful reduction so if your job is interesting and many jobs these days are extremely interesting then that's what you do but make sure that the other dimension is present in your life that which is not interesting so that you're not trapped in interesting which is trapped in the mind so yes the dimension of presence certainly is not interesting you're right there but it's alive I recommend to the questioner particularly to associate the state of presence more with being in the body and to sense the aliveness that you are as a body in the body with the unseen aliveness that is it that dwells in every cell of the body certainly it's not interesting but certainly it's alive it's full of life and so presence can deepen presence is not a head phenomenon it includes the head of course but presence is not generated by the head it the entire body and every cell in the body when you're present is alive it's alive with presence aliveness so it's a whole body phenomenon presence and then you will no longer feel that it is just a kind of lifelessness uneventful and uninteresting yes that's true but you have enough interesting in the world that's not going to leave you as long as you're here the world will give you lots of interesting things more than you want you can say leave me alone I've had enough, I've had an interesting life for too long so that's guaranteed but the state of presence although not interesting is deeply alive so go deeper within and realize presence is a whole body phenomenon and then it's not only that the body feels more alive the world around you also has an increased aliveness an increased I say for many people who are totally identified with mind the world that surrounds them is dead because they reduce the entire reality around them to concepts mental concepts and almost nothing gets past the filter of mental concepts in their world other human beings, nature they make everything interesting other human beings they talk about them all in terms of concepts they make themselves into concepts they inhabit a conceptual reality and they call it that's me they have concepts about who they are and that really means that the whole world becomes dead to you it may still be interesting but it lacks the vital aliveness so you inhabit a deadened reality and so they walk through nature and all they see is concepts the more knowledgeable they are the more concepts they carry in their head trees, what they are how they work and they know it all and then what comes after years of living in concepts life becomes old because they're always the same concepts you cannot experience anything fresh and new anymore because you've been there done it oh that's another one of those trees I've seen so many of those, many many because it's reduced to a concept and human beings so I've met that kind of person many times I know exactly what they're like somebody made me a compliment once, a woman with an enormous ego although occasionally she had glimpses she said I know whenever I meet anybody I immediately know almost everything about them I know what they're like I know what they're like in bed I know everything know everything she had so much knowledge of people on her level it was actually true, she knew she could look through but all she ever saw was the ego in the people, not beyond that but often on the level of ego she was often right and quite often also wrong because ego projects a lot also and so she's talking to me I know them all and then she looked at me and said but you, I don't know it all can't work you out that's because I was not interesting to the just present and she always often looked at me suspiciously kind of just trying to catch something that's interesting there maybe an emotion or thought but I immediately I experienced presence as sometimes intense and sometimes as a peaceful space in the background so that can vary it's always the presence is there, sometimes it obliterates almost the entire world but other times it's the background peace and whenever she came into my field of awareness I could sense an incredible heightening of presence the moment she came in I could feel so this was the question about interesting and so on go into the body and find that yes presence is alive but not interesting you're right there but you have the whole world there for interesting and your mind that's still there sometimes it happens that people walk out of talks, sometimes people come for the wrong reasons or because a friend said you must come to this talk it's really interesting and then they come to a talk and after 10 minutes they just can't stand it they have to walk out because they realize it's not interesting at all it doesn't work on that level and if they cannot access that in themselves that's beyond interesting then it's they can't stand it it's just too boring you have often said that if it were not for drugs and alcohol human beings would be insane or driven to suicide yes I believe I've said that imagine taking away alcohol drugs and television what would they do would they run around mad in the streets and all the children the poor children who are addicted addicted to television addicted to the video games suddenly no more TV and no more video games all interest being taken out of life and all they are left with is the trees and the flowers for many years of my life I tried to save my sister from herself by attempting to prevent her from accidentally or purposefully killing herself until eventually it became clear to me that her soul, spirit or inner presence was no longer accessible it was as though she had surrendered to everything outside of her inner she had surrendered to everything outside of her inner being her life situation was promising substantial financial means a loving supporting family two beautiful young boys intelligence and youth my question should I have clearly knowing her suicide was can't read the next word becoming a reality should I have continued to prevent her passing knowing she was choosing her destiny fully in some cases you do all you can and at some point you need to surrender and release that person and I believe it seems that's what you did you do whatever you can but there is something in some human beings that is so heavy there is so much pain in some human beings it seems that for some reason that we cannot explain through the mind they just need to be allowed to go through it they go through their hell nobody can understand it they are creating their own hell so it seems and something within them seems to be driving them there may be times when there is some consciousness and your hope comes up they can be reached for a little while and then they fall back and you reach them again they fall back sometimes it's somebody close, maybe somebody close to you, maybe a child, maybe a brother or sister in your case but some parents have had similar questions that their children went into drugs and so on and no matter what they did they tried for years to save them they tried everything and finally they had to be they had to release them you can still help but you can see that there is not more that you can do so there is no need to feel that you failed in any way we cannot understand often the purpose of certain lives of humans why they need to go through that but there is a purpose they need to experience the pain sometimes the awakening comes just before they die it can come a moment before they die the awakening may come after they die the life, the form the energy field no energy is ever destroyed or lost the life form that temporarily is a physical form is of course indestructible because it's one with the one life it's only a little ray or spark of the one life and eventually every life form which is only a cell within the totality of the one life another way of putting it eventually every life form realizes it's oneness in the early stages the oneness is natural nature lives in natural oneness with the one and then gradually as life forms evolve life gets more and more difficult because the oneness seems to be lost, the realization of oneness and the individual me becomes more and more pronounced and then life gets more and more difficult problematic because the me is far removed from the, so it seems and then comes the return journey, the return journey for the evolved life forms does not come until there is suffering, and some have to suffer more than others and so it is the suffering that is the destiny of every evolved life form that is prior to finding the way back to the full, to the conscious realization of oneness and the suffering, if you look at your own suffering you can see that it has it's place it has had it's place it has deepened you you probably wouldn't be here without it you would be watching TV or something like that so you can see that it has produced the deepening and so it will produce the deepening in every life form so the release, when there is nothing more that you can do, you still love them you love them, you love the essence, even though the essence may be heavily obscured you know it's there and it may still occasionally shine through in the glimpses and you love that as yourself but as far as actually helping them, there may come a point when you see, I've done everything, should they come yes, you help again the inner release is important because it's a surrender that also helps them, it doesn't help them only visible material or physical form reality but in many ways you can surrender for them they cannot surrender, they are in intense pain you surrender for them, which means you accept that that is where they are at, at the moment, that is their due their choice, do we call it choice or do we call it unconsciousness, it's not really choice, it looks as if they were choosing suffering, but there's nobody really there who is choosing it's the suffering that is simply perpetuates itself the pain body wants more and more pain and so when that reaches a critical point, the awakening happens and it may not happen in every case in this lifetime or in this form but the energy that you are goes through metamorphosis that's a continuous metamorphosis of energy and it's not it seems wasted, it seems that a lifetime is wasted, but it's not that's the strange thing nothing is ever wasted but you may not know that until the awakening comes as we said earlier, retrospectively that which seemed meaningless and full of mistakes suddenly makes sense has meaning, because it took you to awakening and that's the case with every life form and so for some humans their existence here is a kind of crucifixion, and they don't it seems in this lifetime they don't experience that which lies beyond the crucifixion surrender and the transformation of the cross from a torture instrument to a symbol of the divine and the ascension which is symbolic the realization of who you are there's one question here it may even be the next one one concerns the suffering of a human being and this question concerns the suffering of an animal life forms one can say, yes the human probably suffers more intensely am I projecting my own misery and suffering on the dying baby puppy lying right outside of the door of Pura Vida by wanting to hold him help him and save him while everyone ignores him if you can save save it's a beautiful thing to do and then of course you have to also recognize the enormous amount of suffering that's still happening on the planet in human forms animal forms and the human madness inflicting an incredible amount of suffering on the animals also beyond the suffering that is there the animals are more can suffer better than humans unless the human begins to surrender in which case suffering works beautifully it burns you up but animals die better than humans and suffer better than humans they are closer to the unmanifested within them you can see when two animals one animal is about to devour another at some point the other the animal that is dying becomes very still one could almost say they've already died millions and millions of times in the same way and so have humans they've already died so many times it's so familiar the animal is able to withdraw to a deeper place where it touches the formless and when death comes the animal goes there and humans can do that too we are going there, here you go, you draw away from the form into the formless and you touch that and that's the reason why sometimes cats who usually purr when they are happy one of the most beautiful sounds they are a very healing sound a purring cat if you are unhappy just put a purring cat on your stomach or belly and although I lived with cats for a long time or had cats for quite a few years I rarely experienced cats the cats around me were usually ok, I rarely experienced cats in distress but when I talked to, I visited a vet and there was a cat there, very fearful of the vet and the cat suddenly started purring so that extremely fearful cat suddenly started purring, I said to the vet why is it that this cat can't be happy because obviously it's full of fear and the vet said the cat fearful cats in great fear often start to purr the vet had some explanation for it but I don't believe it was the correct one I believe that when cats see a threat to their life, to their form they withdraw to the formless, the being underneath and the moment they touch that they feel the goodness of life the aliveness they touch the formless and then they purr and on the outer level they still fear but the fear makes them go in so deeply that they touch that and so that's the what is hiding whenever the form is in suffering whether it's human or animal form there's always that and some humans cannot consciously access that yet but it's there it's quite possible that your sister accessed it just as she died, as the form dissolved, she may have accessed that and suddenly seen the whole suffering took her to the point of death may have touched it very deeply we don't know, but it is it is the destiny of every life form to return to that the early the life forms still are in touch with it, gradually they lose it and then you return so if you whatever we can do we do to help and save if there's a puppy you can take the puppy home or feed it but there's an enormous amount of suffering still on the planet and if you think about it you'll go mad if you think about the amount of suffering that's happening at this very moment to humans animals you would go mad you have to be everywhere and a lot of the human suffering as well as the suffering of animals that are caused by humans is caused by humans that comes out of the madness of the unenlightened human egoic consciousness about 85% of human suffering is generated by humans for themselves they make themselves and others suffer and so we have to look also beyond that, the suffering for some reason that's what is now and even that has a purpose within the evolution of the whole the whole is beyond the forms the forms are temporary very temporary expressions and the suffering of the form has its place too it doesn't mean that you callously say oh it's all good yes it is all good but at the same time you may weep that's compassion because you can empathize empathize with the suffering form but at the same time if that's all there is, that's not true compassion, you have to go deeper and see that ultimately nothing real can be threatened and nothing unreal exists I will save some questions perhaps for what we call tomorrow I have some more in my room too that may come there's some more here, some have flown away but there's some more here, I'll put them in also, questions there's somebody asked me about a Marshall Plan for Economic Assistance to poor countries, is that person here? thank you maybe tomorrow I can mention that, I saw that may require a little bit more one person that I know quite well is on the list of people who contribute, Peter Russell, I may have a word with him and see what we can how we can help in that way that's also there's always the level of form on which it's good to help on the level of form wherever you can never losing touch with a deeper level otherwise you'll burn yourself up on the level of form as many therapists know as many social workers know as many people who work in third world countries know if you're not rooted here you will burn yourself up because there seems to be no end to it so the balance needs to be there between being rooted in being and helping on the level of form and then it's a different kind of help too there's more than just the physical or material help I believe the questions that have blown away have already been answered there some of you will be here tomorrow morning some will go away again for a while on another adventure, it's good to try out presence when you go into when the external absorbs your attention a bit more and to remain present when things happen you're on a bus or whatever that's good practice there's movement after this for those who whose body need presence flowing into movement not only in the movement class but also we mentioned that briefly when you do little things little everyday actions bring presence see if you can perform it just with such alertness that the action is not a means to an end but an end in itself do little things all that you do naturally you have to do them anyway so why not bring presence into them washing your hands drying your hands walking from the living room to the bathroom walking up the stairs in your house putting the cup on the table taking it from the kitchen on the kitchen top counter top and put it on the table the cup travels to the table and that's the space of presence any lifting something picking something up a pencil, a pen just that movement you associate a certain spatial movement with presence that's a great help to associate a spatial movement of your hands that's of course also to do with what the movement meditative movement is also about but also to practice it in everyday life in some Buddhist meditations they have the meditative walk the walking meditation which can look a bit strange if you and they do it very slowly sometimes it's overdone a bit but I would suggest a bit more natural walk but slow enough so that you don't make the way you want to get to as more important than the step you are taking now that's the main thing to be conscious of the step you are taking now just a little few steps here in the garden picking up the phone your hand reaches out grabs grasps the phone and then it goes to your ear and putting it down so your the thingness of life becomes interspersed with spaciousness because otherwise you get absorbed by the thingness if you don't bring space in so you bring the space into the thingness of life otherwise it's one thing after another and there's never any time for meditation I couldn't even think of meditation well, bring it into the very thingness so that the thingness doesn't take over not quite as stormy as on the last day, the last night of the last time we were here nevertheless it's quite windy today sweeping away the accumulated stuff of thousands of years of conditioning water was a nice idea to start with I was thinking and worked for quite a while it made life more interesting and then gradually it got out of hand or became dysfunctional because it approached or is approaching the end of its life span in an evolutionary stage of being identified with thinking always critical when an evolutionary movement comes to an end and something new is about to come out of the seeming collapse of the old always a critical moment because you never know whether the new is coming well, it seems to be coming here it is coming here it's always a critical moment just as those of you who saw the butterfly butterflies in the well, you see them flying around here but in the where the waterfall is they have a whole house full of butterflies many are hatching and some are still waiting well, they're not waiting they're just there transformation is coming the butterfly becomes a caterpillar and then the transformation happens and I've said it before the caterpillar at some point becomes dysfunctional before it becomes a butterfly because it's the end of its life span in that form just as humanity has become dysfunctional in many ways because it's this is the end of something nothing new is coming the caterpillar is not going to go much further it must be apparent to everybody if there's no change what new is there going to come out of that state of consciousness so the new tends to arise not within the structures that were created by the old consciousness although here and there it happens too but it comes outside so the new consciousness arises not within not usually out of the organized religion although there are some a few exceptions some churches have a certain openness and it can arise there too but as a whole the new is not arising out of the existing structures that are mostly reflections of the egoic consciousness so you don't find anything truly new or transformational arising in the universities, they get bogged down in further and further analysis cutting things up into further smaller and smaller pieces of mind knowledge universities the established traditions of writing there's no spiritual writing, people don't know how to classify it in some old bookstores I remember in England that was 20 years ago in the main academic bookstore, it was a huge place in Cambridge they had a little section where you could find things like the cause in miracles and other works to do with the changing consciousness and they just didn't know how to label that section it didn't fit into anything they knew so they labeled it phenomena and many people living in this world don't quite know where they belong and fit in anymore, before it was relatively comfortable, all the structures were rigid and established, everybody knew where they belonged and now this where do I belong, because the structures that are there don't seem to be that this is not where I belong so where do I fit in many people feel they are misfits others are functioning within the established structures and bring the new consciousness in from within the underground, they are undermining the existing order which isn't really an order it's something that has become dead and they are undermining it from within, that's good too I'd like to look briefly at just a few more questions because almost every question concerns everybody I'll start with my favorite here I no longer have any questions thank you laughter it is coming more naturally to see all else arising from one without mind or position the clearer this knowing the stronger the fight I seem to be exerting, it is like my ego wants credit for witnessing it all, instead of being one with it all ego wrestling ego knowing the futility of this does not help, the process is getting very tricky ego witnessing ego witnessing messy business any words of advice in deepest gratitude for speaking truth thank you it's true that sometimes the ego which is no more than a thought that you identify with the ego is no more than a thought that you identify with, then it becomes an egoic thought and becomes part of ego, when you recognize a thought as a thought, it's only a thought and it's not problematic thought becomes problematic when you become it, or it becomes you, or it pretends to be you then it's ego so yes a thought may come in and say I'm so present look, now I'm really there laughter that's possible and that's not doesn't matter that much if you recognize it as a thought no more now this is important not to have a right relationship to your thoughts a relationship as if you were relating to a little child comes up with all kinds of nonsense and occasionally the child says very wise things that can happen too and yet it's just a thought and it comes and the mind goes listen, okay you pat your mind on the head laughter now thought wants to be taken seriously but as you may remember on probably our first day here or may have been, or maybe it was another retreat, I don't remember we said one of the things to remember here as a kind of mantra or rather as a kind of pointer is don't take your thoughts too seriously they like to be regarded as a problem because the more you regard your thoughts as the problem, the more thoughts the more thought is generated laughter so if thought can pretend that you are faced with a problematic situation I just can't get beyond my ego I don't know what's going on then that generates more thought the ego is no more than that the unobserved mind that's all so always bring back when you think I just the ego is getting hold of me again I don't know how to get rid of it just a moment where's this moment what about this moment it's the we've already pointed awakening into this moment back into this moment, what is the reality what's the problem what's the problem well my ego is playing up well where is that what's the problem take one conscious breath one conscious look conscious listening perhaps even some other senses conscious being in the body that's the present moment that's the beginning of it and then there's a depth there's no problem except the movement of thought so be be in the body be in the senses be in the breath and then allow if there's any thought left allow it to play don't show too much interest look I matter, I'm so important and then no, you don't need to show that interest it's a thought, that's it come always back what's here now, what's the present moment and then first you come to the form of the present moment sense perceptions breathing and then you begin to go beyond form and you go into the inner body because it's the entry point into the formless and then the inner body and presence merge as one and then you're present with every cell of the body and there's a field of spacious aliveness underneath all the forms in which there's no problem ever and that's the present moment the direct present the present moment in its essence the formless now and then there's the manifestation of now which includes your thoughts always come, look for the now look for the now when you think there's a problem, look for the now if there is a problem in the now it's not a problem, it's a situation that you need to deal with and if you face it the ability to deal with it the power to deal with it is there it comes out of presence if it's a true situation or a challenge now, look at it face it and say, what do I have to do what action is needed and then you become still and an action arises you might not even ask the question the action may arise spontaneously so there are no problems they're all mind manufactured challenges, yes challenges can only be in the now if there's a situation that your mind carries around it's not here now when the time comes, you deal with it or maybe you have to think about something now but that's not a problem which flight am I going to catch to go home or something like that that's good, that's practical and you think about it and then it's done get out of problem there is no problem and you are not problematic now that's very important because the ego loves to especially as presence arises the ego loves to pretend that you are a problem to yourself and you can get stuck in that for years something that I need to work out but you don't really need to work out presence cuts through rather than works out you know there was this knot in ancient Greece the guardian knot somebody had tied a big piece of string it seems into a huge knot and nobody could undo the knot that was thousands of years ago and there was a prophecy that whoever would undo the knot would become the most powerful person on the planet something like that so everybody tried they all went to the knot but it was too complicated and then a young man came and he looked at the knot and he drew his sword and he cut through and they say he became Alexander the Great or something like that and he conquered most of the known planet that's the sword to undo yes but not through trying to work out the complicated me cut through the sword of presence so the knot of you is undone and every ego is a knot the mind tied itself into a knot and then energy cannot flow very well through a knot if you take a tube and you tie it into a knot the energy this is why the ego is not an open channel for life because the energy finds it very hard to get through because each sword blocks it, the me sword the future I must have, I need, I want I should, they should, I shouldn't every sword blocks life the full flow of life and then that's reflected in the emotions that tie themselves into a knot that's the pain body life energy that is no longer flowing and so people who have strong egos, in other words are very identified with mind and emotion you can see them, they're walking knots whatever the predominant energy of that particular manifestation of ego is so cutting through you are not a problem don't believe the mind when it tells you that you are a problem or even that you have a problem one conscious breath just you can bring it down one conscious breath brings you back to ah

where am I? oh oh oh I'm alive

[Speaker 1] (5:15:34 - 5:35:38)

I have experienced the presence now without ego during a 24 hour period of time however when I awoke after a night's sleep the extreme sense of presence was gone I achieved this state by asking myself the question who am I and who is the I that asks the questions the same question and contemplation does not work anymore and the brief moments of the now are so short am I stuck in comparing the problem is that I know what I'm not experiencing do you go in and out of the now or are you always present, first part of the question it sometimes happens either through a shock danger, great loss or sitting in a retreat that in some people there's a sudden eruption of presence and they're in amazement, suddenly ah and usually it doesn't stay, occasionally it does, but it's rare usually that eruption is like a flash and then it dies down and then after that you still get glimpses as pointed out and then the mind comes in very strongly and says I want that back and the mind says I lost it or it says when is it going to come back how is it going to come back it's not uncommon for something like this to happen the sudden eruption of intense presence and it's not uncommon for it also to subside after a while and then what you're left with is the seemingly insignificant present moment and you have to go back to that you have to go back to the seemingly little insignificant this and then presence comes again but this time in a different way whereas before it came like presence comes gradually creeping up from behind so to speak from the background at first it's hardly there and then from the background you sense something in the background which is yourself which is the consciousness that you are the unconditioned stillness at first you hardly notice anything it's just the present moment and it's fine so presence comes more slowly seeps in gradually no longer drastically like a flash of lightning that can be a prelude to a more permanent emergence of presence and then gradually there's the background, you are there as the background piece at first a distant background piece and then gradually the sense of background piece becomes stronger and then there tends to be a more everlasting emergence of presence and the flashes are beautiful, they're interesting when they come and even there as it emerges there may even be a flash again of intense presence and then it becomes a permanent not of experience because presence is the very foundation of all experience so presence sometimes is seen as if it were an experience, for example what happened to you, one could consider that as an experience but it isn't really because what came in was the very background of all experience, it came in so strongly that it almost obliterated the foreground and that happens to some people and to one, occasionally it happens it comes and never goes away and that's not even the greatest thing because it could complicate your external existence when it comes so suddenly as it did to Ramala Maharshi who kind of, he was just lying on his bed and experiencing so to speak his own death he had disidentified from form completely when he was 17 years old and then it took hold of him and he left he took a train to some distant temple and he sat down by the temple or later in a cave and didn't want to move anymore the sense of presence was so overwhelming, the being he disappeared in the being of presence and for years he said people had to put food in his mouth and then it took years to adjust so that he could function again start eating and after years start speaking he was not given medication because he was lucky enough to live in India and that happens to people in the West it's not recognized, everybody would say this is a symptom of a mental breakdown if you go to a doctor, unless you happen to find a conscious doctor there are more, there are some doctors here who are bringing consciousness in so if you're lucky enough yes, or a conscious psychiatrist but often if you go with something like that, imagine what you wrote here go to see your doctor about that unless he or she knows so don't try to repeat an experience it wasn't an experience, it was something very powerful, it gave you a taste a kind of satori satori doesn't last but it's a taste but what now comes is the gradual from behind the last part of the question, are you always present do you go in and out of the now no the now remains, presence remains the only variation is the intensity of it, it's sometimes in the background as a peace a peaceful field in the background of all experience and sometimes it comes more strongly there's the it's really, life is a play between the background and the foreground the foreground is what happens any happening including thoughts and events and sense perceptions anything to do with form is the foreground of life where things take place but how is it possible for these things to take place, how is it possible for these things to be, what is the light in which these things appear what in what light do they, what is it that gives them life, what is the life that underlies it all, that is the background, that is essentially who you are in your formless dimension and knowing it that frees you from being trapped in the foreground of your life which is a dreadful fate because then you're trapped in what happens or doesn't happen, continuously dependent on events and people and what things, what these people say and what they do and what happens or doesn't happen needing, wanting all that is trapped in the foreground so the background is the light in which it all appears, but so to speak you could have, I gave the image already of a film projector there you have the film behind the film is the light the light doesn't change the film is there and it's only through the light that the film comes to life and then you see all these figures being projected which are all different ways in which the light is obscured that's what you are as the form you are a way in which God is obscured, every form now if you identify with only that then that's a very, very limited view of who you are now if the figures that are being projected as actors whatever they do on the screen, they go through drama because usually a film is to do with interesting things and so that they go through the motions and they repeat the same, you run the same film again and it's like humans and now imagine that a character in that one of the projected images becoming self-aware while all that happens, suddenly who am I? and that question would draw him or her back to the origin I'm no more than the light a projection of that light, the essence of me is light so the character would suddenly perhaps for a while continue to play, but no and then the kind of play would also change because he would no longer play out the old there would be something new the play would become maybe less interesting but deeper more beautiful, more harmonious with an enormous depth of aliveness to it so presence is there and sometimes presence can almost obliterate the background can come into being, the sense of being can be so strong that it obliterates almost the foreground so events everything in form is almost so tiny because it feels like and I'm talking about this so that when it happens to you and I know to many it's already happening it's like there's a you are a sphere, I may have said that already, you are a sphere a ball and you sense the inner most essence of that sphere and everything else in your life is the surface of that sphere, the wave movement on the surface of being all events, all happenings, all sense perceptions, all thoughts, all emotions the wave movement so sometimes your consciousness goes more into the form without losing awareness of the center within, the still and at other times it may shift more towards the being itself and then the forms look quite irrelevant so there's a shift, sometimes certain situations bring out more presence I mentioned if you're facing a critical situation you would either fall into complete identification with old reactions or you would become more intensely present now that there's quite considerable degree of presence in you it is likely that any challenge will pull you into greater presence rather than pull you back into unconsciousness which would be the normal thing that a challenge does to a human being, they become more, they're pulled into unconsciousness the fear comes, the egoic fear and so on. Facing a person with a heavy pain body, facing a person with a strong ego, also like the lady I described yesterday came, you would become, suddenly feel intense presence because you have to the ego otherwise would pull you into identification the pain body would pull some emotion out of you, it would push some button somewhere as this lady said, I know exactly how people function, I can look through them and of course she also knows their buttons the pain body in her knows exactly what the right thing to say to get a response of emotional reaction and it can then feed and amplify it and feed it back to them and then get it back so sometimes you face humans and when you look into their eyes what you see is their being their liveness is being obscured more than usual by heavy emotion an emotional entity that wants something from you, it might attack you, it might whatever, who knows what it wants, but it wants a reaction it's just waiting for a reaction sometimes you meet people in the street walking with heavy I call them walking pain bodies and they're just waiting for an excuse to get angry at you and when you look into their eyes you have to be the sort of presence and then miracles are possible then it can happen and I have experienced that quite a few times that the sort of presence, even in a heavy pain body can cut through cuts into the through the pain body and you reach the essence of that person and for a moment the pain body subsides and there's a true communion, a true meeting and then you walk away and probably the pain body will come back but that person will have experienced something that they won't forget they have touched something that perhaps they hadn't touched before within something true and they might mistakenly associate that with you as a person, they might think you did something to them they might, the ego might even the ego, the suspicious ego might even think that he must have done some magic tricks on me, I don't know what he did but I can't trust him I can't trust him there's one long one and I'll have the short one first how can we concentrate to lessen the all around the planet fear the fear all around the planet almost paranoid that has arisen since September 11 how can we concentrate to lessen the fear, almost paranoid collective fear better not to ask how you can lessen the fear but how not to be drawn into it because you lessen it by not feeding it, by not contributing to it so many things that you watch on TV and so on in the media are produced by the egoic mind which lives with continuous underlying fear and really this event has brought it out more brought it out more to the surface the collective egoic fear so not to be drawn into it it's the fear of death but really it's only the fear of death of the ego so when you when you listen to the media when you listen to the politicians you listen to the reporters or whatever whoever they are on TV radio, read the papers don't you have to be as conscious there as you are when your mind goes because it's no more than the collective aspect of mind it's somebody else's mind and you have to be present while you listen to the news as present as when you listen to your own thoughts you have to be there as the witness of the human mind particularly when you watch television and realize that there's the human mind in its egoic state it says why you should be fearful, it tells you why you should be fearful I saw a nice science fiction episode on TV last year they visit some other planet and the people who live there have no technical gadgets they live totally simply in little huts and there's some evil race that's threatening to come to this planet and invade the planet and the people from earth want to save these seemingly innocent people who have nothing and the main character of the earth people is talking to one of the elders of the people they have this long hair and talk very little and have the ability to be invisible when they want to but he says these evil people are coming to get you you have to do something, we can help you, let us help you and the elder says we are not afraid and the earth character says then be afraid

laughter laughter

[Speaker 1] (5:35:59 - 5:50:03)

and then towards the end of that episode finally they give up and say we can't help these people, what do we do laughter they will be destroyed ok, you go ahead, they will destroy you ok, we have to go now and then finally the elder at the end says to the earth people look up there and he goes and suddenly they look up in the sky and they see a kind of a shimmering city of light floating in the sky which is usually invisible and suddenly the earth people realize that these people are a hundred times more advanced not only than the earth people but also more than these technologically extremely advanced evil ones and they function they have no ego whatsoever and of course no fear whatsoever and because they have no ego it's easy for them to be invisible and the entire civilization is invisible to the gross energy vibration but of course the punchline in the film is be afraid laughter so the ego wants you to be afraid it lives on that the ego itself means a sense of separation the otherness of others needs to be emphasized by the ego the fact others want to do something to me that's what the ego lives by because that creates a separation between me and the others the other of the others it always emphasizes the otherness and then fear arises at the otherness in ancient primitive villages where people have had little contact with the outside world usually they are afraid of strangers that's also they also have ego there's the fear what are they going to do anybody who looks different speaks differently, behaves differently look through the human mind when you watch TV be present, observe what's behind what they say don't get drawn into the detail what is what are the assumptions behind what they say which are all ego based unconscious mind patterns so not to be drawn into it to be there as a witness of the TV news so you don't watch the TV news like oh no you have to be the background to the TV news as you are the background to your mind and then you don't feed the collective that's enough that is your contribution to not feeding that level of unconsciousness on the planet and more and more people realize that then it won't grow anymore it needs unconsciousness yes paranoia is the right word here paranoia means everybody the enemy is everywhere it's an interpretation of the other as the enemy is paranoia what does he want, what do they want what are they plotting and it's everywhere, you go into companies big corporations what everybody is afraid of everybody else plotting against us, little groups here, little groups there so watching TV especially the news is good spiritual practice and it might even be good for enough people to watch the news from that state influences because your inner state is connected to every other human humans are connected at the level beyond form to each other of course and so your inner state influences even if you don't speak or meet others it has an influence it strengthens that in others when you enter fear the fear of the whole of humanity enters you and strengthens your fear you link in, you tune in to the fear of the entire collective on the planet and when you go beyond presence arises also you link into each other human who is present and that's the beauty of it there's an enormous strengthening through that so whenever you watch the news just sit there as a presence and then more and more others will also sit there and eventually the news changes that comes later that's the outermost manifestation the outermost manifestation is there politicians are also the outermost they come they'll be the last to change except for occasional miracles, they are possible too this is long but it's relevant relevant two days ago I had a massage and I relaxed so much that something new to me happened I became a kind of presence and I experienced my thoughts only as disappearing shadows like a big bang in reverse there was nothing for them to hold on to I felt like I was dying, somehow slipping away then yesterday during my echo adventure I fell out of my raft in the river the water was rushing into my mouth and nose I got very dizzy and was carried into some rocks, still more water inside of me and everyone seemed so far away I thought I was dying there in this river I never saw before I cried later, I cried after my roommate fell asleep people were so kind to me I feel like death is so close that I'm afraid suddenly my chest hurts I'm still crying today, thank you yes, the vital the two incredible initiations you had one, the massage when the mind-made structures subsided and that was a kind of death and then a brush with death on the river physical death and you're right what you say here death is so close and that's true and it's good to remember that death is close, very close because death is actually you look at it from the perspective of form or the foreground what looks like death when you say death is close and I'm afraid of it you're looking at death from the perspective of the foreground from the perspective of the background, death is life so here you can see death ooooh I'm afraid of what? of life the one life timeless, eternal, myself just shift be the background, that's death there's death the formless death is no more than the transition between form, from form to formless and it's beautiful so it's a great life is miraculously arranged it in such a way that you had two wonderful encounters with the reality of yourself to reverse what the character in the TV film said don't be afraid there's nothing to fear but don't try to explain to convince yourself that there's nothing to fear shouldn't be afraid go deeper where you realize that there's nothing to fear become still there's nothing to fear because there's no death it's only a perspective please address recognizing egoic thought from action and words which arise out of presence for example write a book move to the west coast of North America and so on how do you know where something comes from how to recognize egoic thought from something in a way the answer is already in the question as is often the case how to recognize egoic thought how to tell the difference between egoic thought from action and words which arise out of presence egoic the answer lies in the word thought the ego is consists of thought and it's a thought that arises it may be a strong thought it may be an obsessive thought it comes again and again and again it may be a fleeting thought one day you think this is what I have to do and then the next day you think oh maybe that's not it so it could be also an obsessive thought that gets hold somewhere in a corner of your mind like an old record that's stuck and it plays it again you should be how to recognize it because what arises out of presence the outer manifestation of that may also be a thought but there is a deep inner knowing a non-conceptual knowing that is not thought so the energy behind it is very strong and it's always a peaceful kind of energy it's not jarred it's not turbulent in the emotional sense there's a powerful knowing a realization comes, there's no question about it and then the outer manifestation oh that's it and you can't argue with that you know it so it's direct and immediate knowing that tells you the difference it's good always to just feel what's the feeling quality is it just a thought in my head or is there a deeper power underneath it out of which the thought comes a peaceful silent power out of which that thought comes that's presence and action also action can come out of that and action that comes out of ego is either premeditated wants to achieve something through it some kind of agenda wants to enhance or protect the me so that's if in doubt it's probably just an egoic thought but time helps in that sense just wait because thoughts come and go and they wait and see the next morning you may have a different thought but that means before there wasn't that feeling quality behind it anyway so that's to watch out for what's the power out of which the thought comes it usually it feels good it feels just right there's a rightness the rightness to it and the energy that comes it is deeper than emotion it may touch on an emotion also because everything is connected it may touch an emotion but it is deeper than emotion the rightness of that yes that's it let's just take as you know questions go on and on but I must tell you I've never thrown away a single question that I have received on retreats I have a collection huge amount of questions on pieces of paper and when I take them out most of them are great maybe another book will arise a book of questions and answers not that you will need that anymore but there may be some others don't wait for another book you don't need that what kind of language can I use to help my child understand presence the pain body as far as presence is concerned language is not very important to help understand your child may even be completely unnecessary to help your child your child doesn't really need to understand presence your child needs to see what presence is for him or herself by being with you and by recognizing that he or herself has that also already born with that ability that just becomes obscured in our civilization at a very early age your presence teaches the child to be present that's the teacher words are not really required you don't need to tell to your child look at me now that's called presence so the state of consciousness that you are in, in the home environment teaches presence and the child absorbs that and something within the child responds to that and that will counteract the madness of the world in which the child probably still finds him or herself maybe if the child is lucky maybe the child is at a school that's more enlightened than the normal school that's possible and even there you cannot be in this world and not come into contact with madness even if the child is relatively protected the madness is there so it comes you have to counteract all the massive influence of the mad egoic collective mind the media, the television the video games without making the child feel that the child is missing out on something no TV here in some cases that may work there will come a point when the child feels there is something mysterious there called TV and I need to know what it is but your presence is the teacher the pain body is somewhat different the pain body, and I've spoken I've addressed it a few times already in groups I'll just say it briefly now the pain body which the child will also have either greater or lesser some children come into this world with strong pain bodies others relatively weak some develop a pain body very quickly especially if they live in a very unconscious environment which is not the case with your child because you are here so the child will have a pain body, strong or not so strong but the child will have at times the pain body will come and it comes when something minor provokes a very strong emotional reaction of pain withdrawal complete withdrawal screaming and weeping throwing things, throwing themselves on the floor hysterical fits in some cases or long weeping attacks, sometimes some babies you can already recognize strong pain body and you can feel when you listen to the crying of a baby and you've given the baby everything and it's still crying some babies cry because they want the attention and the moment you give attention they stop it's better to keep the child close as they do in other ancient civilizations the child stays close to the mother's body for a long time that's an enormous help the separation from the mother's body at birth is the most natural thing that immediately the pain body grows because at first the baby was one with the mother and then the people they take the child away and put him somewhere else dreadful so perhaps slowly we are learning the importance of the child retaining contact with the body of the mother and then that's already that will lessen the development of the pain body because then it's a gradual separation from so if your child has a heavy pain body it doesn't mean the child is spiritually less advanced many spiritually extremely advanced humans have heavy pain bodies that's their teacher it all works if I hadn't had a heavy pain body I wouldn't be sitting here if you didn't have or had not had a heavy pain body some of you you would not be here so the child will have pain body attacks and if it's a heavy pain body then they are very very noticeable and maybe frequent yes, then words can be helpful but presence also comes first for you to stay present while it happens because even the child's pain body wants you to draw you into a reaction at that moment each pain body wants more pain so the child's pain body when it is active and playing up it wants any form of pain even physical punishment it would want it yes more pain and some very unconscious parents punish the child physically because they cannot resist the pull of the emotional pull of the pain body they are not conscious enough to see that in themselves and they own pain body awakens and complete unconsciousness so it's for you to stay present not being drawn into the drama to see it, to recognize it that's the pain body, that's all you need you can't say much at that point the next day, a few hours later or the next day or two days later then it's the time when the child is relatively present then you can talk what happened the other day what did it feel like when does it what was that thing that came over you I'm just suggesting, the questions will come from you out of your presence what was that thing that came over you yesterday when you threw yourself on the floor and couldn't stop, wouldn't stop screaming how did it all start what does it feel like in you does that thing have a name it's a temporary way of stepping out of identification if you ask, does it have a name and the child might say, no it doesn't have a name then you could ask, if it had a name what would be its name does it have a color no, if it had a color what color would it be and so gradually the child develops the ability to observe to step out so you do it afterwards next time it happens again you can just point out as it starts is it coming back by then it might have a name or a color is it coming back and then in the middle of it you can say, there it is now the child probably won't hear you because the pain body is there and it will scream even more when you say, there it is so you have to say it gently but something behind the pain body will be hearing that there will be a small amount of presence even while the pain body is going on and then after it subsides again you again let some time pass and then you say, it was again and point out if you still have a pain body do you remember what happened to me last week when I started shouting at you or at mom or at dad that was my same thing in me and so gradually the child learns to be present while it happens and that means the pain body is not being added to it's not deriving more food it's not feeding on anything anymore so that's a beautiful way and children will very quickly learn to observe it at first they can't be there while it happens but after a little while you notice there is a growing awareness in the background while the pain body happens and then that's a gradual coming to an end a gradual shift will then happen the pain body is no longer renewing itself and it's gradually becoming transmuted and that's beautiful so that's the way in which presence itself requires no words pain body requires a few pointers but even there presence is the prerequisite for dealing with the pain body in yourself or in others the world of form another helpful thing is just one more not to let the child slip away at an early age into the conceptual realm and believing totally in words and concepts I've said that before, I'll just mention it briefly there comes a time when the child demands to be fed words and concepts what's that?

[Speaker 2] (5:50:03 - 5:50:04)

yes

those are the questions what's that, what's that at that stage they want concepts words, they want the names of things what's that, and what's that at some later point other questions come why questions that adults sometimes they're very interesting questions the adults stopped asking themselves those questions a long time ago and when the child asks why they suddenly say, I don't know forgot to ask that question but let's stay for a moment with what's that that's a tree that's a flower that's a car that's this table names of things don't say that is say that's called because if you say that is the child will confuse the word or the concept with the reality which is infinitely deeper, it loses touch with the actual direct experience of reality and as it accumulates words and concepts, it begins to live, it begins to believe that when it says this is a tree that it actually, that's all there is to know about the tree and later it might go to biology class and then you get a few more names to attach to the things that happen to the tree or in the tree or the names of different trees and then that's it, immediately the depth of that tree recedes and what is replaced by a dead a relatively dead thought form, free and so that's how language and concepts deaden the aliveness so when you teach a child language the child should stay in touch with the actual thing, so you say it is called, not it is, and encourage the child to continue to look look at it there, to continue to touch to feel, to look, to listen to show him, look there touch, look so that it doesn't always, it's not obscured, everything is obscured with words and concepts, stay with the reality and the child also stays with the now, here, there look, there listen, look so that some of the direct experience remains for the child so that because we had to go through the way most of us we were deadened by concepts and then later had to break out or the world of concepts got just life shook it so much that it started to crumble a bit and we could start living again so all the whatever you teach the child is always see, there's always more beyond the words, so that the child knows that there's always more beyond the word the reality beyond the word your name, you can say the name you are that's the name we've given you, John you are not John, that's the name that you have, that we chose for you it's not you are not your name it's just a name the world of form which could also be called existence because existence is anything that stands out, x means out stands, from Latin stand standing existence is the world of form and it stands out as a thought as an emotion, as something the world the existence is about to change for you, as it always does because this form is coming to an end, the being which is timeless, underneath existence being existence existence flows out of being being however remains untouched it's timeless it's who you are essentially that was the essence of our gathering and it cannot leave you, because it's one with who you are this form was only an opening an opening for you to get a reflection of your essential reality no more so that's why I said when you took the photos, yes it was a nice window, relatively insignificant window frame, but nice, not because of the frame, there's nothing special to the frame it's the light that comes through the window it's not the so don't get attached to any window frame it's essentially being with yourself, that's why you're here, not with me as this form it's essentially, you are here to be with yourself because we've been, the world has gone, as Causing Miracles says, it has taken time to misguide you so completely the world is has gone such a strange ways that yes, it seems strange that you had to travel to be with yourself laughter but miraculously it worked laughter and then, soon a time comes, maybe already here when there's no need to travel to be with yourself and yet, if that is what you enjoy, if you get an even stronger deepening of yourself when you sense the reflection through some other window frame that's fine too you can travel, not that you need it anymore, you don't need it because you're ready one, with yourself and you can feel yourself and that doesn't change, so what changes is the periphery of your life the stage setting you know when they change the scene we go from act one to act two they move the furniture on stage they create a new so here you are as the consciousness and then you see suddenly the whole thing, Pura Vida disappears, somebody pushes it aside and then and then you see there's an aeroplane seat and somebody puts some plastic food in front of you and then come familiar surroundings oh, and a little doubt in the head, did that actually happen?

but you can feel something here that confirms that yes, something did happen but not really, the essence of that which happened was not in time because it's still here now and then life may change the stage setting and many suddenly could happen again in more drastic ways suddenly, oh you can move here, move there or you stay where you are it's the periphery, whatever happens is the periphery and you can participate in it you're not just a passive observer of the periphery because you also act upon the periphery but you act from the more you act from here from being in touch with the background and the intelligence and the power of that flows into the periphery the foreground then that is called in Buddhism right action so you're more likely to act, to do the right thing knowing that ultimately you cannot do the wrong thing because you can only learn and as we said the other day every choice will eventually take you to the same place which is yourself the awakened you some choices just go round and round and request tips about surrendering surrendering is so simple but the mind doesn't know that it says it's the hardest thing to do to surrender yes it's true that it goes against the habit patterns of the mind the habit patterns of the mind are to live in resistance just little pointers are enough allowing allowing this moment surrendering only concerns this moment that's something you do not surrender to a life situation you cannot surrender it's pointless and even counterproductive to say I might as well accept that I'm a poor little so and so that I have failed, I might as well accept that nobody loves me I might as well accept that I'm going to be lonely for the rest of my life I might as well accept that I live in this little hole and I'm not going to get out of it I might as well accept that I'm stuck in my big lifeless mansion and nobody comes to see me anymore and all the people who come just want my money I might as well there are so many life stories you do not surrender to a life situation because a life situation exists in time all you surrender to is this moment so you have to single out this moment out of the life situation it's like cutting the segment of now out of your life situation so I gave the example before you sit in prison your life situation is that you did something or maybe you didn't even do it, it's even worse they put you in and you were innocent you did or did not do something but the fact is that they gave you 25 years and you've been in for 10 already then you have another 15 to go that's your life situation and then you say I might as well accept that my life is really being destroyed, it's not much when I get out I'll be too old to do anything I made some dreadful mistakes or the world did something dreadful to me and I might as well accept that it's all come to an end and a pointless existence no, that's a story that's a sense of self based on a story you have to out of the story you cut out the segment that is called now and now what do you end up with then, you end up with breathing looking whatever the perception is there, there's a cell chair, bed if you have one chamber pot whatever it is or more, maybe you have to share the cell as some of you know, the owner of this place spent some years in one of the worst prisons in Florida and that's where he woke up sharing a cell with 25 or 30 violent men who were listening to loud music all the time there was no air conditioning almost no air coming in through the little windows the cell was meant for 6 or 7 people and there he was stuck, hell on earth and then at some point he was left with the present moment because if he left the present moment it was dreadful just this, cut out there's just what arises at this moment, the noise the heat discomfort but it's not even, discomfort is already the beginning of a story it's just what you feel this is what I feel that the uncertainty of we might not wake up the next morning because often people would, inmates would kill other inmates which is one other way of life removing future from you they had taken away all his possessions threatened to put his child in a home nothing left and then surrender happened but only there was just this cutting out what is the reality of this moment or whatever condition arises at this moment, that I say yes to because I cannot do otherwise and that is surrender you take any, you get out of, cut out of your life situation the segment that is now first you have the form of now the moment you say, you bring a total yes to the form of now because you see the absurdity the madness of denying it how it creates pain, how it creates suffering, how it strengthens the false me that lives on suffering the moment you see that that the only sane way to live, even in the midst of insanity because it's up to you to break the insanity you can't wait for the world to become sane, the world around you I'm just people are so unconscious, I'm just complaining about how unconscious other people are and even spiritual people they're just talking about, they're all unconscious it's all what about you what are you complaining about who is it in you that's complaining what's wrong with this moment go in here now this is what is a yes an uncompromising yes because everything else is futile and insane creates suffering that's the end to ego it cannot survive anymore in the uncompromising yes, it's a sword surrender has a passive aspect and the active aspect the passive aspect is I allow this moment to be as it is and if there's a gesture that goes with that it's your hands in the same way that some female deities, it embodies the essence of the power of the female Virgin Mary, Kuan Yin the allowing embracing what is embraces, I allow this moment to be as it is the other aspect of surrender is the sword and they both in a way it seems almost like a contradiction in order to allow you also need the sword this is what is and the sword is the uncompromising yes to what is so there is the surrender is both masculine and feminine in one and then that's the form of this moment is no longer judged is no longer complained about, the form that this moment takes is as it is, that's the sword and you embrace it it always is as it is already and with that unconditional yes something opens up within that is deeper than the form you have gone through the form not by fighting it but by surrendering to it the what looked like a wall in front of you suddenly opens up, what looked like the greatest obstacle to your awakening becomes the opening for your awakening that's the miracle that's always non-opposition non-fighting that is the secret of surrender and you don't need to wait until they put you in prison or you are in hospital or an earthquake destroys everything you have although it may happen too there is little surrender and big surrender in ordinary life what you practice is continuous little surrender and surrender, what is surrender even surrender is temporary, it's a temporary device, surrender is the shift from no, an inner no to an inner yes then you may have to do that many times during the day all the little surrenders all the little things that happen the little shouldn't be don't want to be here, they shouldn't do that so many times little surrender and then the more that is practiced the more surrender becomes your normal state when surrender is your normal state it's not surrender anymore because surrender is only the shift you don't even have to think about surrender anymore it is natural then for you to be in alignment with what is it's a natural way to live and then somebody says surrender, I say what surrender then even surrender disappears it's a temporary thing because it's a shift yes to no, it's that surrender but for a while that is something that you bring into your life until surrender disappears then you live one in alignment inner and outer are no longer in conflict and that surrender is no longer even spoken about and there it is that's the simplicity of it and that is all of us to surrender until we come even to the end of that to the end of surrender and live in natural alignment with life that's all natural alignment natural state natural alignment beautiful simple not living like that is the difficult way that's the simple way although the mind will tell you no no it's the other way around simple thank you thank you something something perhaps the most precious thing in your life is inner peace because no matter what you get in this world without that it's not really worth that much

so in any moment

[Speaker 1] (6:24:29 - 6:29:10)

or situation if you can remember that then you realize that the situation is secondary yes of course you have to deal with it if it requires action but there's always something else that's more fundamental more vital because even if you achieve what you wanted but through this the action you lose inner peace it's not that helpful anymore whatever it was that you achieved what is it worth because inner peace goes away is obscured through mental judgments concepts that you completely believe in so it's not something you need to find it's already in you that's the amazing thing even in the most seemingly insane person there is inside there is the core of inner peace stillness aliveness I can only use pointers and as I use the pointers hopefully hopefully you go within and see if at this moment you can realize the reality of what the words point to otherwise they are only words something in you loves that inner peace and then there is the ego in everybody unless it's dissolved already that wants something else it's more important it says or it says you won't find inner peace until you get this or that and there is always a postponement if you listen to the egoic mind it says yes I want peace but before I can get there I need this and this and this unless this and this and this I can't really fully go into that it's just not can't do it now first Jesus talked about that when he said people get an invitation to a wedding it's a parable people get an invitation to a wedding and they all have another excuse, one says well first I need to deal with some real estate that I have and when I get that out of the way I'll come, somebody else says first I need to do that there's always the excuses always start with first I need to and one even says first I need to bury my father and even there Jesus says let the dead bury the dead

radical statement what he is saying that if you haven't found that dimension within yourself you are as if dead it doesn't mean it's not there in you potentially it's still there but in the meantime you are as if you were dead you're not dead, it's like saying let's say to use a deficient comparison let's say you have a billion dollars in a Swiss bank account but you don't know it so you are poor you are as if completely poor because you have no idea so you behave like a poor man and you ask for please give me a penny not knowing that there is a vast treasure of course a billion dollars is absurd, nothing compared to that the analogy is deficient but that's okay all analogies are so let me first well first I need to think about this so that it doesn't work first comes that and everything else then begins to flow with greater ease and again Jesus says what you thought you needed for your happiness once you realize that the kingdom of heaven is what you want it's your first choice then everything else will be added whatever you thought you needed for your fulfillment and peace will be added you don't need it anymore but you need to choose peace first which implies you surrender to the present moment and you step out of the judgments of your mind in other words you die because the false self lives on non-surrender and judgment and denial of the present moment, it can't tolerate the present moment that's why it says first I need to look somewhere else and do something else so yes I forgot to mention that you need to die because that's what it is but what dies is false anyway but as long as the false is mistaken for the real it's a little bit as if and only really if you're fed up with the suffering that the usual state of consciousness the ego has created for you then you begin to be ready to say okay I'm fed enough I'm fed up with suffering to the ego suffering often looks like a positive thing it's a perverted way of looking at things oh I'm so anxious at least I feel alive, I must be alive because I'm anxious I have enemies so I must be important I have huge problems I must be an important person with such huge problems because without my problems who would I be these are implied thought movements, they're not conscious because the moment you make them conscious you see their absurdity I'd like to talk today about something people have been periodically asking me what do you think about this book so I thought I'd bring it along and tell you what I think about it but not only that we'll see because there's no point in talking about something one has to go deeper into it to know it knowledge about and true knowing the difference in that so people have been asking what do you think about A Course in Miracles well here it is it's heavy paper is very thin like the bible and it's about as long as the bible some of you know it well or have gone through it or are still going through it some of you have heard of it some of you have tried to get into it but didn't like it some of you have never heard of it so it's been around for a few years this came out in 76 and it is a self study course for inner transformation I'm telling you this just very briefly you're supposed to study it by yourself some people go to groups too it's divided into three parts the long text the lessons one per day for one year 365 and the workbook for teachers which is relatively short at the end it's an incredible phenomenon it's a book that was channeled and just the same as with other spiritual writings only a small percentage of channeled works are actually quite deep just as small as anywhere else sometimes people are immediately impressed when something is channeled in other words some spirit or presence talks through you and some people the moment they say this is channeled they say

ah

of course you always have to remember that famous saying just because they are dead doesn't mean they are smart so it can be at first very impressive if the person suddenly goes this is so and so speaking good afternoon entities and then you can't question anymore yes so a small percentage of channeled works go deep and I believe Course in Miracles does but it certainly is not for everybody and certainly I'm not telling you oh you now have to do the Course no, you may we'll see the it is not for everybody not everybody needs it if presence is already transforming your life then that's where the Course in Miracles wants to get you basically so it's already there for you if presence is already transforming your life your relationships the way in which you experience reality it's already doing that increasing inner peace increasing freedom from externals and reactivity towards other people and external conditions if you are already experiencing that then you don't really need it, you may still enjoy reading it but you don't need it if you've been following this teaching and of course something in you has drawn you here that which is real has recognized the truth yes and as you are here something within you responds so that's wonderful but if that is lost the moment you start dealing with people and situations and if that has happened continuously in your life it's happened to a few people that there's presence when they are quiet, not disturbed it's beautiful, they can access stillness so that's already a huge breakthrough, huge breakthrough you can access stillness when you are not being challenged by anything and your mind subsides for a while because ultimately you are really only challenged by your mind, it looks like the situation but it's your mind interpreting the situation that challenges you and takes you out into disturbance so if you already can access that in moments when you can become still and beautiful that's enormous breakthrough but it may be that despite that you very quickly lose it in this moment you relate to other human beings and you go into the usual thing as if you had never heard of any spiritual teaching and only you can know that or you can ask the people who know you if you don't know it, what do you think of me me old friends family members well you might not get an objective opinion there then I would say try to apply the lessons of the Course in Miracles because it uses relationships as spiritual practice, that's one of the main focal points of the Course in Miracles is using relationships with other humans the most difficult challenge in your life in this lifetime is other humans relationship with other humans there's no doubt that that is the greatest challenge but it's also there's no doubt that it is there that the new consciousness needs to come in and change the way in which you relate so that a different energy you put out a different energy you do not contribute to the madness of the world so you put out a different energy in relationships, you dissolve conflict you are the bringer of peace and you realize that's your main priority in life, in the terminology of the Course in Miracles you become a teacher of God teacher doesn't mean necessarily that you explain something, no you live it and by living it you teach it so then that might be a helpful thing to apply the lessons everyday one because the lessons are meant to be applied in everyday situations in relationships I'll give you later one or two examples or three of the lessons and what they can do applying the teaching in everyday life and that is a reflection if you want to know where you are at in your spiritual growth which is not a good term well spiritual growth is probably fine personal shrinkage spiritual growth so if you want to know where you are at in your personal shrinkage personal shrinkage and the corresponding spiritual growth St. Paul was it St. Paul, he talked about that he says I must diminish and Christ in me must grow so something the light shines, begins to shine through so the criterion, sometimes not easy to know where are you at in your spiritual growth and personal shrinkage is to look at all the people that you relate with both people you know intimately and people, other people let's give you a reflection and the absence or lack of conflict your ability to dissolve conflict as it approaches you in the form inevitably not of cats and dogs they are okay even a barking dog that's not a big challenge but a human, a barking human and as that comes towards you, your ability not to react in the terms of the cause of miracles one would say to forgive to look through the error in the other to look through the ego and it's there everywhere to look and forgive not to equate somebody's egoic behavior with who they are, that's forgiveness in the terms of the cause of miracles you say if it's not love that you get comes to you from another human it's a call for healing and help so it reinterprets how you would usually interpret when somebody is offensive or whatever you reinterpret that it's to change to change your perceptions you reinterpret it and you realize that this mind would say obnoxious person it really is a call for healing and help because that person is out of touch with the reality of who he or she is doesn't know the oneness of all life so that's a helpful thing and then there are many other lessons to apply to situations with other humans in daily life especially your ability to heal situations one stumbling block for many and for some the stumbling block will be so huge that they cannot do a course in miracles even those who might need it but there are many other ways you can apply presence the terminology it uses is limited but that's form anything in form has its limitations so the course in miracles has certain limitations and they regard the terminology which is old fashioned Christian terminology that's one for some people that's fine they actually love because the terms that had become perhaps to some extent lifeless or meaningless to them suddenly they see that there is a deeper meaning to all those terms like Holy Spirit or Atonement which should be pronounced At-one-ment and so on so for some people that's a nice thing they can see that perhaps they were brought up as a child there is a deeper dimension to those terms for others they say I can't stand it I can't stand the fact that God is a he and God is the father what about the mother that's the limitation of the course in miracles it's the terminology if you can look beyond it and see what it points to is nothing to do with male or female but the terminology has that limitation if you can look beyond it fine it's no longer a barrier if you continuously feel an inner every time it says father God or he female pronoun is never used once in the whole course there is no she but that doesn't mean that it excludes women it just so it's only you can find out for yourself whether that is a barrier for you and if it's too much of a barrier if you cannot look beyond it forget it it's fine even course in miracles wouldn't say that you have to study a course in miracles it says no this is just one of many forms that the universal curriculum takes the universal curriculum is the where we are all going but there are many forms of the universal curriculum and there is not one form of the universal curriculum that is the right one there are many many and you will be drawn to whatever universal curriculum corresponds to your inner state and what most draws you and that's something to do with form of course you want to go through form to reach the formless in yourself but there are certain forms to which you the form that you are drawn more than to others and those can more easily take you beyond form if you try to force yourself into a form of teaching that does not resonate with your inner then that becomes a great hindrance perhaps you were born into a certain form of the universal curriculum which may not correspond to what you truly would be most helpful for you and then it would be good to find another so the universal curriculum every teaching is a form of that universal curriculum but the essence of the universal curriculum is to reach the formless within yourself which is where you and God merge where you and the source of all life merge where the little me realizes its true reality where the little ripple realizes that it is the ocean but continues to be a ripple for a little while but if the ripple and this is taken from the course in the text if the ripple and the ocean thinks of itself as separate imagine that the ripple and the ocean

world becomes very threatening because the vastness and just who am I on this little short left thing on this vastness and all the other ripples are my enemies what do they want laughter and the waves and if the ripple could realize by going within I am the ocean temporarily appearing as a ripple

laughter

oh that's great laughter of course I'm not going to last that long as a ripple but I'm eternal as the ocean what a liberation another analogy apart from the ripple course gives the analogy of the ray of sunlight and if the little ray forgets that it is actually part of the sun because the light that comes to you from the sun is actually it's an extension of the sun but if the ray forgets that it is an extension of the sun it's little me laughter doesn't know where it comes from it doesn't know its source it just looks around at other rays and says who are you laughter I don't like the way you look laughter laughter but if the ray could find its source oh then you can enjoy all the other rays because you know they're all the same source and then you can look at another ray through the source so you go in and then instead of looking at the other from out here you look at the other from the point of view of the source and you realize the oneness so you go you don't look like that that's two me and you you go there where we are both come from the same source and you look from there and see oh we look like two but we're actually one laughter that's the realization of oneness the greatest liberation there is and really that's again what any spiritual teaching is designed to do for you is to take you to that realization of oneness which is nothing to do with thinking thinking creates duality you have to go beyond thinking to realize oneness cause and miracles is a teaching of oneness as miracles are all but it does that in a very strange way because most people who study it they come from a belief in duality and so the cause and miracles uses the language of duality to gradually take you to oneness it doesn't immediately use the language of oneness so it talks about God the father is with you of course ultimately God the father and you are one and God the father is also God the mother but it takes you by the hand to take you where you are and then gradually take you into the realization of oneness which is where the words are not important anymore and when you get to the third part of the workbook with the lessons it says words are beginning to be less and less important from now on and the lessons get shorter and shorter and it says the words are only the beginning what comes after the words the state you enter after the words is what matters so it takes you gradually into oneness but it can be at first confusing because the language is the language of duality which you still hear in most churches there are some other Christian teachings that express duality more directly like Joel Goldsmith for example he is a Christian version of what in India is called Advaita non-duality which is the deepest truth of Hinduism beyond all mythology Advaita means oneness or not two non-duality Joel Goldsmith is a Christian version of that and ultimately Cause and Miracles is also a Christian version of that but Cause and Miracles does not express oneness as directly it just takes you there now you might think this was channeled that probably was channeled to some monk in a remote mountain monastery in the cell or nun and the strangest thing about it is that it was written in New York City and it was not written by a priest or nun or monk it was written by a woman who was a professor of medical psychology at Columbia University and she said of herself perhaps the most unlikely person spirit could have chosen in her opinion she was she didn't understand the cause very well and certainly as she herself said she couldn't live it she was just the medium through which it came and at one point she asked the voice that she heard it started one day shortly after her colleague at the university they were constantly fighting he she and her colleague and all the other people it is quite normal in most institutions constantly bickering and fighting and complaining about each other and intrigues and fighting for position and so on and her colleague another professor of medical psychology said to her one day there must be another way and a little bit later something started inside her and she realized perhaps this is the answer first she had visions strange visions in one she saw herself it was a kind of dream she saw an ancient chest and she went in a cave and she opened this ancient chest and out of it she took an old parchment and she started to unroll because the parchment has rolls left and right she started to unroll it to see what and she saw writing on the left but she couldn't quite decipher it and writing on the right more and more and the central panel was blank and then she heard the voice that later started to dictate the cause to her and the voice said if you read what's on the left you will know the past if you read what is on the right you will know the future and then she looked again at the central panel and there just had two words that said God is and then she rolled it back to where just the central panel was visible and she said I'm not interested in past or future this is all I want this is what I want God is and the voice said congratulations you've made it this time this is all I want just this that was the choice was present moment I don't want to know past and future and she had a few more visions and then one day she heard a voice coming inside her which said this is a cause in miracles please take notes laughter laughter and the it started with a summary of the whole cause and she was writing I'm going insane I'm going insane she was an atheist laughter I'm going mad but she had to compassion was strong she had to write and then it came the summary before the whole cause started the summary of the whole cause which by the way if you understand it that's it you can go home laughter nothing real can be threatened nothing unreal exists herein lies the peace of God of course she didn't understand it but we do do we laughter nothing real can be threatened nothing unreal exists herein lies the peace of God few more things came through and the next morning she went to her office at Columbia University and talked to her colleague Bill and said

I'm going mad I'm going insane this what's happened to me and he said okay calm down let's see what you've written and then we'll decide if you're mad or not and she showed it to him and said this doesn't look mad I would do a bit more and that's how it started and then every morning she would bring it into her office almost every day the dictation came she would go into her office lock the door he would come in they would lock the door because of course they couldn't tell anybody else and they went through it and it took seven years and sometimes when she got interrupted in the middle of a sentence and a day or two or three days later she picked up the pen again the voice would just complete the sentence immediately so it's just quite a phenomenon I love it I actually realized yesterday when I picked it up because it came to me that I had read somebody else had asked what do you think about it so it came to me that I wanted to talk about it today I hadn't actually opened it for several years and it was lovely to open it again and many many years ago for when I lived in England still for a while I used the course shortly after I discovered it I used it as a medium through which to teach and so I would have little groups and workshops and sometimes spent a whole day on just one lesson read a lesson and talk about it and some people even people who didn't like the Course in Miracles they came and said now we understand it so it did help to have some to express it in somewhat different words I'd like to give you just a taste of and as we do that see if we can get to the very essence of it as we are here because what's the point otherwise can we get to the very essence of the Course in Miracles here not in 365 days from now but here okay okay let's see let's start with lesson one and if we can do lesson one completely you will have done the entire course any lesson if you can do it completely it doesn't say that here but I'm telling you if you can do it completely which means live it that's the entire Course in Miracles you don't need to pick it up again and lesson one is a little weird well some of the others are too laughter by the way there is the writing is varies in power and intensity to some extent but the most there are many very powerful and beautiful passages of great spiritual power and beauty in the text some extraordinary passages lesson one every lesson has a title the title of this lesson is always just one sentence nothing I see in this room means anything and then what you are supposed to do is look slowly around you practice applying this idea very specifically to whatever you see this table doesn't mean anything this glass doesn't mean anything this chair this carpet doesn't mean anything this hand doesn't mean anything this foot doesn't mean anything this flower doesn't mean anything then look further away it says apply to a wider range that door doesn't mean anything that light doesn't mean anything apply to anything you see it says before don't try to understand what this is all about well I'll tell you what this is all about but I'm sure you know it do it no more than this is the beginning no more than twice a day preferably morning and evening not more than a minute or so this is for beginners not more than a minute or so a comfortable sense of leisure is essential as you do it use it indiscriminately don't exclude anything specific so what is the purpose in that the purpose

this doesn't mean anything the purpose is to

wipe the blackboard clean on which the blackboard that's full of scribbles interpretations projections opinions judgments thoughts imagine a blackboard full of scribbles so you take this lesson and some of the subsequent lessons you take a sponge or whatever you do and you begin to wipe it's a voluntary relinquishing of all mental judgments and concepts all the meaning lesson two gives you a little bit further it says I've given everything I see in this room all the meaning that it has for me wiping the blackboard clean it's also an act of humility because the ego says I know and you're beginning to admit that you don't know and so that something deeper in you can come forth that had been obscured by the one who thought he or she knew lesson three says I do not understand anything I see in this room or wherever you are so you're letting go of interpretations in the next lesson you do it with your own thoughts these thoughts do not mean anything they are like the things I see in this room so you're letting go of investment in identification with thoughts so beautiful early lessons and really if you can do lesson one completely so what did I mean by that let's try and do it completely nothing I see in this room means anything now if you do that completely what happens inside you your mind has nothing else nothing more to do you stop thinking doesn't mean anything so that's it nothing else to think about so if you could do it completely it would lead to the cessation of thinking what remains of you if the thinker subsides or dies what remains of you if the movement of thought subsides the essence of who you are the formless you can say the Christ or the Buddha nature whatever terms people have used to describe it that's what remains the unconditioned consciousness the timeless the eternal no past no future so that if you do this lesson and live it you're no longer imposing interpretations and you everything there's a clarity of perception as you look at things and humans a refusal to think act of surrender and you become innocent like a little child but there's a enormous energy there in the terms of Causing Miracles it would mean the power of God in you also of course it's you're totally present the moment that happens you're totally present Causing Miracles calls it it is the practice of the power of God in you this is the practice of the power of God in you the present moment the Causing Miracles calls the holy instant it has some wonderful passages about the power of the holy instant of the present moment they are like meditations I'll read some very short passages and let's treat it as a deep meditation oh by the way did you know that the ego wants you dead but not itself oh did you know that when the Causing Miracles uses the word brother it includes sister which really brother means every other human okay so we have to look beyond that limitation let's do that so it says if you believe there is a space between you and your brother you are insane wow I'm not going to say anything about that I'll let you not work it out but feel the truth of it because mentally you go insane if you start trying to work that out feel the truth of it fear is not of the present but only of the past and future which do not exist there is no fear in the present when each instant stands clear and separated from the past without its shadow reaching out into the future each instant is a clean untarnished birth in which the son of God that's you emerges from the past into the present this lesson takes no time for what is time without a past and future it has taken time to misguide you so completely but it takes no time at all to be who you are begin to practice sorry take this very instant now and think of it as all there is of time take this very instant now and think of it as all there is of time there's nothing there's only this instant nothing else which is the truth there's only this instant nothing can reach you here out of the past and it is here that you are completely absolved completely free and holy without condemnation from this holy instant where in holiness was born again you will go forth in time without fear and with no sense of change no sense of change with time you go back you go into time but there is a continuous realization of the timeless within yourself the dimension of formless consciousness itself in this redeeming instant lies heaven start now to practice your little part in separating out the holy instant you will receive very specific instructions as you go along now the next sentence is important I quote it occasionally to learn to separate out this single second and to experience it as timeless is to begin to experience yourself as not separate to learn to separate out this single instant and experience it as timeless is to begin to experience yourself as not separate so through that intense presence the delusion of separation also subsides and you can then from there look at another human and sense the oneness beyond bodies and that comes out of the presence and that is the sort of as I call it sometimes the sort of presence cutting through time it is only your weakness that will depart from you in this practice for it is the practice of the power of God in you all you lose in this practice is your weakness it is the practice of the power of God in you use it but for one instant and you will never deny it again God knows you now he remembers nothing having always known you exactly as he knows you now this still uses the language of duality but it gradually takes you into the realization that you and God are one the holy instant reflects his knowing by bringing all perception out of the past thus removing the frame of reference you have built by which to judge your brothers once this is gone the Holy Spirit substitutes his frame of reference for it the veil that has been drawn across reality is lifted nothing has changed yet the awareness of changelessness comes swiftly as the veil of time is pushed aside the veil of time is pushed aside this is the primordial spiritual practice no matter where you go at the core of any spiritual system is this whether you go to Buddhist meditation or wherever this is the the primordial spiritual practice and to hold that to hold that intense awareness of now or awareness of awareness consciousness of being conscious of consciousness whatever you want to call it it transforms everything so beautiful beautiful meditations here you can see how it all comes together I'm focusing here on this particular aspect the power of which really is the center of the whole course now just to give you a taste of two lessons they kind of go together 33 and 34 you can use it as a little sample if you want to use it for the rest of the day today just as a little sample the title of the lesson is there is another way of looking at the world today's idea is an attempt to recognize that you can shift your perception of the world in both its outer and inner aspects full five minutes should be devoted in the morning and evening applications the shorter exercise periods should be as frequent as possible specific applications of today's idea should also be made immediately when any situation arises which tempts you to become disturbed for these applications say there is another way of looking at this any situation where there's even the slightest disturbance or irritation you use that there is another way of looking at this that's all just that remember to apply today's idea the instant you're aware of distress it may be necessary to take a minute or so to sit quietly and repeat the idea to yourself several times closing your eyes will probably help in this form of application there is another way of looking at the world the next lesson on the next day is I could see peace instead of this I could see peace instead of this search your mind for fear thoughts anxiety provoking situations offending personalities or events or anything else about which you're harboring unloving thoughts note them all casually repeating the idea for today slowly as you watch them arise in your mind and let each one go to be replaced by the next the shorter applications are to be frequent and made whenever you feel your peace of mind is threatened in any way if a specific form of temptation arises in your awareness the exercise you take this form I could see peace in this situation instead of what I now see in it if there is depression anxiety or worry use the idea in its original form I could see peace instead of this it's a re interpretation of how you would habitually interpret events in the world I could see peace instead of this so hopefully you'll get one or two disturbances today because otherwise there's nothing to practice with now it is possible of course that you're already at peace to such an extent that the disturbance does not arise anymore well that's even better and there's no need to practice the world will always challenge you in the form of people situations and ultimately always comes down to your mind you're ultimately only challenged by your mind disturbed by your mind you're not disturbed by the situation you're not disturbed by the situation you're disturbed by your mind really really yes so that's amazing realization isn't it it's so easy to forget because the deep conditioning is so deep seated and there's nothing personal in that it's not your fault if you forget if you say that's my fault that's more illusion illusion the conditioning is so deep seated of not realizing that ultimately it is your mind that creates your unhappiness of anxiety of fear so it's not what your mind says it is it's your mind so your mind says look at there look at that situation and you say no I'm going to look at you no no don't look at me look at he did it look I didn't do anything like a little child that's what children do isn't it no I didn't he my brother did it so there's the power of awareness in you and that we are here as we sit here it grows the your power of awareness just you just need to be here it grows as you sit here even though occasionally your mind will come in and say I'd rather be somewhere else and then it subsides again and then presence grows as you sit here because that's the essence of our gathering presence in the meantime a few words and concepts some of which are helpful and some of which keep your mind from doing harm while you sit here but it is an energetic process as we sit here beyond what you listen to with your ears that's secondary there's an energetic process at work that has nothing to do with concepts towards the end of the course it says the use of words is almost over now and that's after 365 days there's almost a little paradox there because on the one hand one could say well the course gives you time to reach the timeless in yourself and that is true it is a paradox but it is addressed in the text also so it gives you time on this level here to reach the timeless but at any moment that realization can be there so it doesn't say you're not going to get there until you reach the end of the course you can get there at the very beginning already or rather realize that you're already there it's a very radical thing the course of miracles takes you to the edge and after that you jump off we've been jumping off already takes you to the edge of the mind trying to understand mentally mentally letting go of that also going into this beautiful state of not knowing no longer needing to impose judgments on the world going to the state of not knowing that's where any spiritual teaching comes out of that not accumulated knowledge it comes out of that openness any creative act comes out of not knowing so you need to become comfortable with that state which is also the state of course of not thinking or not looking to thought for some ultimate answer fulfillment or identity really what I teach is and what you get to what the course aims to take you is what is the core of all spiritual practices the end of compulsive thinking thinking thinking you can still use thinking if you need it but it doesn't use you anymore you are no longer the thinker, your identity is no longer based in your thought activity the ego is gone then I am not the thinker, yes thinking happens but I am not the thinker I am the vastness out of which thinking happens and into which it subsides so go to any other teaching who by taking thought can add one qubit to his span of life I suppose in one translation by taking thought do not take thought for the moral, for the moral shall take thought for the things of itself, that's the old translation in Jesus do not take thought for the moral, the moral shall take thought for the things of itself only the present moment exists the person who was taking notes when Jesus was talking forgot to write down only the present moment exists go to any teacher Advaita in India, some of you are familiar with it, some have never heard the word, the teaching of non-duality, the teachers of non-duality how can you reach the realization of non-duality? By not thinking that's non-duality the moment you start thinking again you're back in duality so to realize non-duality the oneness of all life and your oneness with all life and your oneness with life itself, because all life is all life forms but life itself is the unmanifested one eternal life God to realize your oneness with that there must be a cessation of birth, continuous birth of forms and then there is just the ground out of which the forms come, that's it that is the realization of oneness and only then when you sense that in the depths of who you are you can look upon the world with love until you can sense that love is an illusion you may try very hard to be loving okay, I must be loving I must be really patient with him but of course you can't hold that for too long I've been loving now for two hours and you're still behaving like that I just can't love anymore so it's only when you sense that and you can look upon the world of form and realize they're all just temporary expressions of that one that I am that's a verbalization but the knowing is beyond words and that's peace, that's where you become the true teacher of God to use the terminology of the Course in Miracles because only then can you teach peace and only then can that power flow through you into this world that the Course in Miracles describes as a kind of delusion a kind of nightmarish dream a little bit like the Matrix and deep down people know that there's something not quite right with what we perceive as the world and the dreadful things there's been people when they see this film The Matrix there's been some, of course it's not the real truth, there's not computers that are doing it but machines that are doing it but there's some underlying truth that we're all walking around in some dreamlike state, this is not it that dreamlike state we need to wake up and so people get drawn they got drawn to that movie because there's some core truth there which says you're a dream walker and you need to wake up and it's wonderful when they saw the city scenes in the film and all these people walking around and then the protagonist is being told that they're all dreaming which is not quite true in the sense that it's shown in the film but in a deeper sense it is true so the oneness the realization of oneness comes with that Advaita, non-duality which came out of which is the deepest truth of Hinduism where Hinduism transcends all the huge mythology that they have which is interesting as long as you can't realize oneness keeps you busy and you get a few distant pointers to oneness through stories and images oh nice, very nice yeah but it's not quite there's a more direct thing there, Advaita is Vedanta the end of the Vedas it means that's going beyond that, it's also beyond concepts now Advaita in Hinduism has become fashionable in the west lately teachers are springing up every day of Advaita like mushrooms now some are great but many can't stop thinking and they're teaching Advaita from the point of view of the thinking mind and how to tell the difference it's very easy, go and listen to an Advaita teacher and if you feel a little bit sick when you leave then that's not it sick in the stomach I feel much worse now than before they tell you things like it's all an illusion your problems, what's your problems it's an illusion and then they go back to their wife and say where the hell is my dinner laughter and if you challenge them on that they say nothing to do with me that's an illusion too laughter Krishnamurti, the whole teaching of Krishnamurti another beautiful expression of the universal curriculum one particular form of the universal curriculum what's he talking about can thinking get us to this realization can thinking get us

let's investigate can it get us there

[Speaker 1] (7:39:54 - 7:42:29)

and an hour later no it can't oh okay he practiced non-thinking frequently didn't practice it came kind of naturally that's where the teaching came from so if some of you we're all in the terms of causing miracles you are the teacher of God because you are practicing that if you become a spiritual teacher in a more formal way not the Advaita one unless you have that realization not the mind the mental teacher but the true teacher you may feel that you're never quite ready to teach if you feel you're now ready to teach that's probably not it that's probably the ego but if you feel you're not ready to teach and yet something the situation calls upon you to teach in one way or another formal or semi-formal or informal it could be simply somebody asking a question or there's a group of people whatever it may be or somebody says oh come and talk to us me? yes well I have nothing to say well that's good then come and become comfortable with not having anything to say because we don't have anything to say either you may feel uncomfortable with it but if somebody can become comfortable with not knowing and sit in front of a group and not thinking that I should be speaking now or I should know but just become comfortable with the state of not knowing you may find that after a minute or two you say something a word suddenly comes it might be something very simple here we are in the present moment what does it feel like to be in the present moment

let's find out

[Speaker 1] (7:42:30 - 7:42:44)

I feel a slight disturbance because I'm sitting here talking to you I don't but it's just the same thing

[Speaker 2] (7:42:47 - 7:42:49)

constantly becoming present

and then words come the one who is teaching is always the one who is most empty that's where the power comes through and of course in the west we are only gradually learning that there are spiritual teachers some spiritual teachers traditionally don't speak they have a different way of teaching they teach by being present or still

[Speaker 1] (7:43:30 - 7:44:00)

and just looking at you that's beautiful too here we have a mixture of words and looking and who is looking when I look at you who is looking the person or something deeper if I'm not thinking when I look at you then the person isn't looking consciousness is coming through and what is it that you recognize yourself something within your response you say oh it feels so good and consciousness recognizes itself so you're becoming who you are yourself beyond the story and your history what a dreadful story mine is too it becomes unimportant as far as your identity is concerned this is your identity it has no form and you can't call it anything you can't even call it man or woman certainly has no age has no form you can't say what it is you can't examine it it's the I it is I I without a past I without a future isn't that amazing but that is what emerges as you let go of obsession with thinking and then gradually you learn to not lose that or have it obscured even when did you start to think again so that thinking is interspersed with spaces and so that you even feel the space while you think and speak if you can feel the space that you are the consciousness in the background while you speak then your words have power and are fresh and new and creative and then your relationships are loving and peace flows out from you the challenge is not to be drawn so much into thinking that you're going totally out again so to hold that to hold the awareness of awareness so to speak and then speak be aware of the danger of the how the mind has enormous momentum especially if somebody asks you what do you think of the republicans or the democrats or whatever it is and before you know it you lost space completely well I'll tell you what I think or whatever it is your ex-husband wife opinions what's your opinion the Buddha talked about the the thicket of opinions don't get involved in that he said drop your opinions relinquish your opinions oh really what the Zen master said beautifully he didn't even say drop you don't need to drop your opinions stop cherishing your opinions just that but of course what are opinions thoughts a bundle of thoughts are your opinions so when the Zen master says stop cherishing your opinions he's saying stop cherishing your thoughts stop cherishing your thinking you can still have it of course you still have it but you don't cherish it which means really you don't attach a value to it that it doesn't have you don't look to it for your identity you are not totally drawn into it it exists there but here you are a much vaster presence and here's your little opinion rather than the opinion pretending to be you and getting so you can then play with opinions okay I think that's how it is but you might think differently and then you don't have to be disagreeable when you disagree because you only become disagreeable when you disagree if you identified with your opinion your thought if you're not identified you don't become disagreeable why do you become disagreeable because you feel threatened in your sense of self why do you feel threatened in your sense of self because you identified with your thoughts there's a self in your think It's like a delusion of self in every thought. Freedom from that, what freedom?

Nothing real can be threatened, nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

Oh my gosh, it feels like another world. It feels like another world.

[Speaker 3] (7:52:54 - 7:52:58)

Feels like another world. Yes, multiple worlds.

The question kind of evaporated when I was raising.

Wonderful.

Anyway, what prompted me first is that the first speaker was speaking about forgiveness. A few months ago, I was listening to a Hawaiian teacher about Ho'oponopono, it strike me. He's a co-author of a book called Zero Limits.

It's just, not worry about who else is here because there's nobody really here other than us. The inside is far more important than outside. And so really, in Ho'oponopono, directed to ourselves is really, doesn't matter, only the divinity or the zero who is the space can only forgive, nobody else can.

I'm not capable of forgiving except who I really am. Like one of the earliest Eckhart's teachings, Power of Now. Power of Now.

So it's like saying to ourselves, pretty much to ourselves, and I know if I say it, even doesn't make sense to me, but inside it somehow does in those moments. Please forgive me, I'm sorry, thank you, I love you. It's just saying to ourselves.

And according to this teacher, when I say I love you to ourselves, it actually takes away some of the data. They also, it's the space or this is also that is calling us and it's very hard to talk about this. This is also, he talks a lot about cleaning so that we can actually be at the zero, at the space or at the energy.

To clear yourself, is that what you said? Yeah. Yeah.

Anyway, on another level, when I wanted to say I felt a movement in the energy, the energy is also helping us, space and energy are one, and to be there. So the word I love you is along with breath and feeling the energy and everything is actually calling us from inside. That's the best I could say.

I can't say more because the moment I say it, it really even doesn't make sense to me.

I know what you mean. I'm like, what am I gonna say when I get out here? I mean, there's nothing to say.

And there really isn't anything to say. The words just point. And any spiritual teaching is pointing you right back to yourself.

God is within. Heaven is within.

Thank you. And so I use it constantly. I'm constantly attacked by a pain body in my heart.

So I just do this, I say I love you. And then cleansing breaths, and I used to let Eckhart, and Eckhart Tove TV helps me a lot, so I just wanted to say.

What was the last part?

Eckhart Tove TV and your, both of you have been listening for quite a while. But there's also, if you say one more thing about it, that there's nothing in that is, it's very gentle, and my noise is much heavier.

[Speaker 3] (7:57:04 - 7:57:05)

Louder.

[Speaker 5] (7:57:05 - 7:57:05)

Louder.

[Speaker 3] (7:57:05 - 7:57:06)

Very loud, yeah.

Yeah. So I don't know how I get back there. I really have no idea.

To that gentle calling.

[Speaker 3] (7:57:18 - 7:57:23)

Can you find the space in you now? The zero?

Yeah, zero.

[Speaker 3] (7:57:27 - 8:03:39)

Then that's it. The rest is noise. And the more that you pay attention to that zero, you call it zero, through that other teacher, that space, then that space will get bigger and bigger.

It happens as you become aware and place some of your attention on that space, even in bits, the noise, the loudness, because one will win out if you pay attention to space, and space is infinite. But it's also very quiet. It has no demands.

It doesn't want anything. But if you pay attention to the form, or if there's some sort of attachment to the form, identification with form, with the noise in your head, then it just becomes louder and louder, and it takes over the space. You've, I don't know whether you've heard it, but maybe you have if you've watched these videos.

I've given the example of a flute, like say a bamboo flute. I love bamboo, so bamboo flute. And even though the flute has a form, the essence of the flute, in order to have the beautiful music that life, consciousness, wants to play through this flute, is the whole, the space, is what creates the music.

Is able to make the sound of the music coming through when life blows into this flute. So if we take every thought, and thoughts come, but if we believe in that thought, identify with that thought, somehow grab onto that thought, and place it into that whole of the flute, so here it arises. In this case, say our body's thoughts just arise, but if we identify with it, we kind of somehow, in a way, store it in us.

Or every emotion that arises, we place into this flute. And imagine these emotions, and these thoughts, or these experiences, or the stories we tell ourselves, whatever, is a bean, a kidney bean, a llama bean, whatever kind of bean, a coffee bean, and we keep filling ourselves with it, because we're identified with it, and believe in it so much, that when life wants to use us, so in other words, we pick up the flute, and we try to blow to make music, beautiful music, nothing will come out.

God cannot use us. We cannot use the flute, because it's full of beans. So it is our work to empty, to allow, because thoughts arise, emotions arise, it's human nature, it's just what's happening, but if we learn to not attach ourselves, and we begin to understand, it's not so much a learning, but an understanding, that you know that you are not your thought, your emotion, or anything, then we allow that to pass through.

So go back to the healing of allowing things, because things come up, and we just allow it to pass through, and it no longer gets stored in us, and then we are open channels. We are the empty space in which life can use us, for that moment, and this moment, and the next moment, and the next moment. So it's a returning home to who you are, and that space, zero, nothing else.

And yet there's everything that arises within that space, and it can challenge you, because there's lots of things that could arise, but where is that space? You keep feeling it inside. And then we begin to see that it's not only inside, but it's everywhere, because it's the totality of things.

It's space, vast, empty space. The awareness is vast, empty, infinite. And some days it's stronger than other days, to be able to tap into that space.

But when we're filled with stuff, and we can't seem to get there, don't even try to get there, because that defeats it. You're trying to get something that's already here. So you just give yourself the space to allow everything to be there, even if you're full of emotions and thoughts, and you'll find that space again.

Or rather, it finds you.

[Speaker 5] (8:03:45 - 8:04:07)

When you said infinite, I got a goosebump. Is that means I'm connecting? I'm connecting, a feeling.

I'm blind, I'm just, yes. You're what? At some level I'm blind, just with some feelings.

[Speaker 3] (8:04:10 - 8:04:12)

You're blind, is that what you said, blind?

[Speaker 5] (8:04:12 - 8:04:28)

Blind in some sense, but with some sensation with which I'm moving on, sorry. I mean, just like a blind man in the street just walks with the stick, somehow makes sense of the road. That's how it feels.

[Speaker 3] (8:04:28 - 8:04:28)

Right now?

[Speaker 5] (8:04:29 - 8:04:31)

All times, but I'm just.

[Speaker 3] (8:04:31 - 8:04:32)

All the time.

[Speaker 5] (8:04:32 - 8:04:37)

Saying it. But there's something happening, but it's so hard to say.

[Speaker 3] (8:04:37 - 8:05:44)

I'm blind, but now I can see. How does that song go? How does, what is that?

What's the words? Grace. Yeah, amazing grace.

Yeah. We are all blind until we can see. And hallelujah, when that day comes.

Moment comes, then it comes and goes. We cannot control it. We think we can, and we'd like to, but we can't.

That's one pointer to it. Another pointer would be, as consciousness as who we are, we can choose for more consciousness. See, it's just pointers.

You're just bumbling inside. You're tingling. Yeah.

[Speaker 5] (8:05:44 - 8:05:46)

Start from the hand, like you.

[Speaker 3] (8:05:46 - 8:05:52)

I know. I know. Stay with it.

Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (8:05:52 - 8:05:53)

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (8:05:56 - 8:05:57)

It's the aliveness.

[Speaker 5] (8:05:58 - 8:06:13)

Yeah, yeah, yeah. At this moment, it feels great, yeah. You're alive.

Aliveness, aliveness, yeah. Yeah.

[Speaker 3] (8:06:20 - 8:06:23)

Can you stay with that aliveness as you walk back?

[Speaker 5] (8:06:23 - 8:06:25)

Yes, I will. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (8:06:35 - 8:09:35)

So, that was just beautiful, to end in aliveness. Or begin. So let's just have a moment of silence.

And really keep on feeling that inner body. That inner body, we can call it our joy body, our giggle body, our peace body. And it shows up as a different sensation every time.

Sometimes it's subtle. Sometimes it's strong. And the real practice begins when you step outside that door into the world.

God is the nothingness is within you, is you. That's the being in you. And the human is the part that gives us grief.

There you go. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (8:09:56 - 8:11:47)

My original question seems quite obsolete. Good. And that, I think, is a wonderful thing to be able to share.

I will share my original question and then hopefully maybe go beyond. The original question had to do with expectations. I asked about if it was reasonable to expect honesty and openness.

To what? To expect honesty and openness in a marriage relationship or in an intimate relationship. Preventing the hurt of finding out things at a later date.

And I was in Malibu with my husband and listened to Eckhart and submitted the question shortly after. And in the period of time between then and now have come to some completely different realizations. And most of all, realizing that I may have preferences and that's where it ends, having preferences.

The expectations have hopefully subsided tremendously. What I'd like to evolve to though is the question about intimate relationships and the challenge of honoring our own personal stillness and each other's need for stillness. And at the same time, meeting those practical needs to negotiate preferences each 24-7, if you could give some insight.

I think it's a challenging experience.

[Speaker 3] (8:11:48 - 8:12:18)

Yeah, life didn't promise marriage is going to be easy. Or relationships, yeah. So that's wonderful.

First, can I ask you about just your own realization in coming to what you found that your whole issue that you were having about honesty and being found out, I think it was, that you called it?

[Speaker 4] (8:12:20 - 8:12:45)

I made a realization maybe eight, 10 weeks ago that I really only have my own honesty and my own openness to focus on. And that by focusing on anything that's going on in my significant other, I'm really expending energy that's taken away from focusing on what I need to be focusing on myself.

[Speaker 3] (8:12:45 - 8:13:16)

Okay, that's good, that's good. And now it almost sounds like as if you're still intertwining it in this next question that you had about the intimacy and the amount of stillness that perhaps you need and what he needs and how to integrate that into your everyday life and into just the common things, even this first question posing this, your expectations about honesty.

[Speaker 4] (8:13:17 - 8:14:04)

Yes, and I think maybe control is an issue, continuously letting go of control and just allowing things to evolve. What does your control look like in the relationship? Well, I think much like the woman that just shared before me, there's probably a deeper fear of if we're not traveling in a similar path, if the path isn't parallel, if it gets too far away from one another, then what?

And I'm kind of chuckling at myself because here we are, the two of us together, and I didn't even initiate being here this time, he did. So what am I questioning, you know? I'm grateful it's all in place and I need to get out of worrying and concerning myself about it and just allow.

[Speaker 3] (8:14:06 - 8:15:07)

So intimacy cannot happen if you have these expectations about what a relationship should look like and what it should be like and how he should be, how I should be, how we should be. There is no space then for intimacy because intimacy, you can say, requires that there is this space. So the space is here and we come together in that space where there is no expectations because isn't that when you find, when there are no expectations on you, can you then be your true self?

Just be, in other words. Expectation even of yourself, let alone the expectation you have of your relationship and your partner. But you cannot be if you have any expectations.

Be still, be present.

[Speaker 4] (8:15:10 - 8:15:14)

Allow preferences to be shared as preferences.

[Speaker 3] (8:15:14 - 8:15:50)

Preferences, we all have preferences. As preferences. But the demand that those preferences must be met or must be somehow manifested, which you can say then cuts off that intimacy.

I have a lot of preferences. I mean, I would like Eckhart to do the dishes more. I'd like to have him help me cook more.

And clean the house more. I mean, I really would. Does it happen?

Not really.

[Speaker 6] (8:15:51 - 8:15:54)

Am I okay with that?

[Speaker 3] (8:15:55 - 8:21:10)

Yeah, I'm okay with that. Does it bug me sometimes? Yes, it bugs me sometimes.

I mean, these are all real things that happen in the emotional level and all the things of, you know, the mind that goes on. Does it have me love him less? No.

Do I not want to be with him because he won't pick up after himself? No. Sometimes, yes.

But on the whole, no. And it's just, it's okay. I mean, it's like putting things in perspective, you know?

What do you want more? Someone that you can actually live and have an intimate, still relationship with, even though there's stuff going on in the mind that might happen and things, everyday life that may happen. You know, it's finding also the understanding.

I have observed that Eckhart is from a, I mean, he's like, you know, 62 years old. So he's from a generation where as a man and as a young boy, he didn't have to do anything. I mean, really.

He didn't have to cook. He didn't have to clean. He just didn't have to do anything.

And then he was a bachelor for most of his life. So to try to get him to do anything now at this age, I mean, I'm so fortunate, lucky that I've got him to do what he's doing right now. So I'm grateful.

But, I've been in other relationships too, whereas, you know, men have done things. So it's not about that. So I always, you know, would have to put myself, when that would come up, I'd always say, okay, I gotta put this in perspective here now.

Am I willing to leave this relationship because he won't help me enough? And then I actually even started looking at how I even, my own wording of that and expectation of that. I realized, I said, wait a second here.

I want someone, I want a partner to help me, like as if that was never his job and that it's my job and I need to help her. And this light bulb went on. I go, whoa, that's not the relationship I want either.

Is that what I have been projecting out? And then thus receiving? I went, wow, no, he's a partner.

He's a full grown up man that I don't need help. But my, you can say, wishes that my partner will take up his share. So when I realized that, I let go of that concept of like thinking that I need help, that I'm somehow in charge of all the household things and I need help with this.

No, I wanted a relationship where I could have someone meet me and when that changed, it also changed. Not that he meets me equally because I've got a different sort of conditioning, you can say, a disposition of I like things neat. I like things the way that I like things and he likes the way that he likes things, which it doesn't matter if things are all over the place.

But he will do things in his own time. He can watch me clean a house. Like when we're away and we're away for six months, it's amazing how dirty a house can get.

You know, those who have this experience, it's like, whoa. And finding a house cleaner on a small island is sometimes impossible. So, and plus we were undergoing renovations and this is just recently.

It took me four days of cleaning. It was only on the third day that he decided he can help. But you know, it was okay because I know I like the, if I want things done the way that I like, I'm responsible.

If I do wanna ask him to start doing something earlier, then I'll ask. But I was actually okay. And it's actually, I did a little sort of test.

I wanted to find out how long it would also take him. But you know, but when he did it, I was so grateful. It was wonderful.

And we, everyone needs their space. Every space we go into, we have to find a place that is big enough that we can find our own corners.

[Speaker 4] (8:21:12 - 8:21:38)

It seems to me that part of this whole, of what you have addressed here is that he doesn't need me to help him on his spiritual path any more than I need him to help me know where my path is. And that can only interrupt intimacy rather than produce it. Yeah.

Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (8:21:39 - 8:21:40)

Yeah, exactly.

[Speaker 4] (8:21:40 - 8:21:55)

Because our spiritual journey is our own. And the more respectful we can be of one another's journeys, the more we open the possibility for greater intimacy with one another.

[Speaker 3] (8:21:55 - 8:22:44)

Exactly. And we all have our own time where we need that space. And it's giving that space the honor to that person who needs that space at that moment and not that say, hey, no, we gotta be intimate now.

And they're going, no, I need space now. And you gotta look then at your own insecurity about if you are going like this to your partner. All that conditioning.

Feed me, I need you. Or we gotta go on this spiritual journey together. Because we are all on a spiritual journey together, but we do it all separately.

It can be an alone journey. And you'll even look at the word alone, it's all one.

[Speaker 4] (8:22:46 - 8:22:53)

And I am a Libra, always looking for balance. Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (8:22:58 - 8:24:09)

As we begin to awaken, it's so, I think it's just so vital. At least it has been in my experience to be able to have and give yourself that space, that individual time alone that's required just to go totally inward. Because when you're always with somebody, including your partner, it's more challenging to just go just completely inward.

So it requires this, maybe a room or you going out if there's your circumstances of your living situation or you're living in a studio apartment or something. Who knows, maybe you go and you close the door and have a long bath or sit on the toilet for a long time. We need this time because the answers come from within and the realization of stillness, of who you are ultimately comes from within.

And only from within can you know this.

[Speaker 2] (8:24:53 - 8:24:58)

Welcome to our live meditation.

[Speaker 1] (8:25:18 - 8:26:46)

For those of you who are joining us for the first time, all that's happening here is we become comfortable with nothing happening so that we can shift our consciousness from doing to being. Doing is not just physical doing, which obviously we are not engaged in right now. Well, the mouth is moving, but that's all.

[Speaker 2] (8:26:49 - 8:27:08)

Or you may be twitching a bit, but basically we are sitting or lying. That's physical doing, so we stop doing on the external.

And more importantly, the mind. So we are here to experience or get a taste of, or perhaps even more than that, go deeply into the state of being, which in itself has no content. It's a bit like having lived in a room full of furniture, stuff for many years, always being worried about polishing it or getting more stuff or getting rid of this stuff and talking about the stuff in your room.

And for the first time, you become aware also of the space of the room, which is the essence without which there wouldn't be a room. And you realize the furniture in the room is secondary to the space in the room. But space you cannot grasp.

You can't say, oh, there it is. You can't even point to it. Where?

You become, you sense it, you become aware of it, you sense, one could almost say the presence of the space. Wherever you are now, you can do it. You can sense the presence of the space.

And to do that, you might notice you can't be thinking. Thinking is to do with the furniture in the room, but thinking is never to do with the space in the room. A different faculty is required, inner faculty, is required to sense or to become aware of the space wherever you are.

That is not thinking. And most humans still don't know that they potentially have that ability or that faculty.

[Speaker 2] (8:30:27 - 8:30:33)

In other words, it's not awakened in most humans yet.

[Speaker 1] (8:30:39 - 8:33:47)

And of course, we are here for some of you to awaken that, and for many others who are already awake to it, to deepen it. So let's go back to the room. When you become aware of the space in the room, you might notice it's a very peaceful thing to be aware of the space.

It suddenly becomes, there isn't suddenly an added dimension to where you are, because before you were concerned with the furniture and whatever filled the room, stuff, and that every bit of stuff has a history. You talk about its history. By the way, may I point out that right now what we're doing, I'm using the room as an analogy for, of course, your mind, but I'm also talking about the room.

So we are on two levels here. So you can take it literally, and you can take it as an analogy for your mind, or both. So you may notice that suddenly the room, which is the old room that you've lived in for many years, suddenly becomes peaceful in the moment that you can sense the space of the room, rather than always focusing on the different bits and pieces in the room, the stuff.

Suddenly you take in the totality, which transcends what's in it, the spaciousness of it, and it becomes, oh, there's a sense of peace and almost a peaceful presence, which, of course, essentially is, you could say, yes, it's in the room, but, of course, it's in you. In our analogy, the furniture in the room, the bits and pieces, the stuff, corresponds, of course, to the content of your mind, the thoughts, most of which are old and repetitive, the furniture.

[Speaker 2] (8:33:54 - 8:33:59)

Whatever is occupying your mind is the stuff, the furniture.

[Speaker 1] (8:34:05 - 8:35:23)

Every item wants your attention. You keep the old stuff alive by continuously giving it your attention. And if you become aware of the space in the room, you withdraw attention from what is in the room, and you become aware of that which could be described as the essence of the room, without which there would be no room.

Without any room, there's no room. There's space, space, and within you, the same. If you don't find the space within you, the spaciousness, which is a presence, the presence that you can sense as if it were an external presence in filling the room is also in you.

[Speaker 2] (8:35:27 - 8:36:38)

Now, this is very deeply peaceful, and in many traditions, that's called the presence of God, that all the mystics, whether Christian or Buddhist or Hindu or Sufis, they all point to that. That's not the ideological God, not the person, but that which underlies all manifestation, the eternal.

[Speaker 1] (8:36:47 - 8:37:54)

So the eternal is both within and without. The moment you notice that presence outside of you, you can be out in nature or you can be in a room. You're no longer focusing on individual things.

You're focusing on the space between things, one could say, and you sense that as a silent presence. You can't say much about it. If you're a poet, perhaps you could.

Some poets have written about it quite beautifully, sometimes words worth the English poet went out into nature and wrote beautiful things, all pointing to that. But the moment you notice it outside of you, it's also within you.

[Speaker 2] (8:38:33 - 8:38:36)

So I call that usually presence.

[Speaker 1] (8:38:44 - 8:42:09)

You can call it the presence of God, you can call it divine presence, or you can forget about those terms. The terms don't really matter. So your entry point then can be, you start with the external.

Become aware of the essence of wherever you are, of that particular place, whether it's in a building or outside. The essence of that place, which goes beyond whatever is filling that place, whatever is there as a form. You become aware that there is also the formless dimension to that place.

Spirit, another word. And the more you are able to sense that in your life, the more spiritual you are. So how spiritual you are doesn't really have anything to do with your thought processes.

So thinking about God for 12 hours a day, or more, or talking about God doesn't make you spiritual. It's a concept. And the test, of course, is always whether you're able to retain that awareness of the presence.

Really, awareness and presence are the same thing. The moment you use language, you separate things into subject, objects, and bits and pieces. The question is, are you able to retain that aware presence, continuing to sense that presence that is, of course, inseparable from the essence of who you are?

[Speaker 2] (8:42:12 - 8:42:31)

Whether you can retain, sustain that when all this stuff in your life, whatever is happening, shouts at you, so to speak.

[Speaker 1] (8:42:34 - 8:42:47)

And every bit of stuff in your life says, I matter absolutely. I demand your complete attention.

[Speaker 2] (8:42:51 - 8:42:55)

If you don't give me attention, your life will collapse.

[Speaker 1] (8:42:59 - 8:43:09)

I need you to worry about me, says the stuff. If you don't, you're irresponsible.

[Speaker 2] (8:43:20 - 8:43:23)

Of course, that's not true.

[Speaker 1] (8:43:31 - 8:51:49)

Your most fundamental responsibility is to find that which is beyond the stuff, to access that dimension in you. That's why you're here. That's what the universe wants through you, to awaken to that dimension, to be it consciously.

First, it seems that it's something outside of you. It's the space in the room or how here in nature. And then you realize, oh, it's within me too.

And it's more essentially me than anything else. That's where the whole feeling of who you are actually originates in that deep sense of being, of presence. And then it gets mixed up with things, with stuff.

And then you sense the beingness through the stuff, still a little bit. And then a possession can give you a little bit of aliveness. You can sense your car, if you just got it.

After a while, it wears off. If you just got it, it can give you, that's a little bit of sense of, deeper sense of identity. But where it really, any sense, any identity sense of who your essential self comes from is from the formless dimension of presence.

And for most people, it can only a little bit filter through all the things in their lives. And it's never very satisfying because it's to a large extent obscured and it's mistaken for the thing. It's like having a lampshade and you're mistaking the light that comes through the lampshade.

You're mistaking the lampshade for the light. And then you attach yourself to the lampshade and not realizing what you love about the lampshade is the light that shines through it. And then you worry about the lampshade.

So really, perhaps it's a little bit radical to say it, but it is true. Whenever anything upsets you in life, in your life, the moment something upsets you or you get despondent or angry or whatever, then you lost awareness of that presence. The presence is obscured and something then in your life is regarded as absolutely important, the lampshade.

And you don't realize how insubstantial that is. And you're not aware of the light in your life. You are the light, said Jesus, the light of the world.

And nothing in life can satisfy you except this. No, you don't have to believe that. I'm not saying believe me.

Nothing is going to satisfy you. Either you know that already because you've tried many times to be satisfied by lampshades or you don't know it yet, which is fine too. You know to experience a little bit more frustration and suffering.

Look for real satisfaction in whatever fills your life, in things, in people, in situations, in positions, in what other people think of you or better opinion of yourself in your mind. Whatever, money, more money will finally. But as you begin to live this, live in continuous connectedness, what we could call continuous connectedness with being, then you can enjoy also the furniture in the room.

And yes, it has a certain importance, but that importance is always just relative. It's not ultimately important. It's relatively important, if that.

And then the famous word that we know is non-attachment, of course implies that you are rooted in something deeper or more real than whatever things you might be attached to. And of course, very often the attachment is attachment to a thought. That's the biggest attachments.

Non-attachment is not really possible unless you are rooted in something more fundamental than stuff that you might be attached to. So I wouldn't even say practice non-attachment.

[Speaker 2] (8:51:50 - 8:52:14)

No, find the essence of who you are and then as a natural consequence, that attachment to things and people and places and situations and success and failure and so on and so on falls away by itself.

[Speaker 1] (8:52:38 - 8:54:09)

So true happiness is deeper than what is conventionally called happiness. It's a sense of deep, alive peace, which can be there even if on the outer level you experience a wave of unhappiness, such as would be the case if somebody close to you dies. Essential part of all this is becoming comfortable with, of course, not thinking.

Just being, just awareness. That's the inner space of awareness right now. Do you need to think?

[Speaker 2] (8:54:11 - 8:54:14)

Do you need to fill this space with thoughts?

[Speaker 1] (8:54:14 - 8:54:31)

No, it's alive without thoughts. You can sense your own aliveness without telling yourself anything. Being it.

[Speaker 2] (8:57:58 - 9:37:47)

Welcome to our live meditation. Meditation is about accessing stillness within you, which is a dimension of consciousness above thinking. Aware stillness.

There's also a stillness below thinking. People become still when they get tired. The most important thing in a person's life is to find that dimension.

Perhaps first it comes in glimpses, sometimes arises naturally, perhaps when you're out in nature or relating to an animal. Or it can be there as the part of your meditation practice while you meditate or right here and now by paying attention to the silent spaces between words. Paying attention, meaning noticing the silent spaces between the words.

That's the meditation. Not noticing just for one second, oh, there's a silent space, and then go off into thinking. But noticing the silent spaces while they are there.

For example, between now and now. And of course, you can't notice the silent spaces and think at the same time. To notice the silent space, you become still inside because only the stillness in you can become aware of it.

So noticing those spaces between words for here is an important part of, or the most important part of our life meditation. And as you notice, you become still inside. And there is the dimension that transcends the person.

So first you access it here, and as I said, perhaps it arises naturally. And if you access it here or it's part of your meditation practice, it's more likely to arise also naturally in other situations in daily life. And when it does arise, you notice it again.

A moment of alert attention. When you look at the sky and you go without having any interpretation or words arising in your mind about the sky, you just go, there's an alertness in which an alert space in which the sense perception happens of the sky. And what is the sky?

Nothing really. It's not an object. You can never touch it.

There isn't even no such thing as a sky. It's only a perception from a particular location. There's the background of space and there's the sunlight that creates the temporary illusion, we could say, that there's a sky.

But because it has no actual form, it's a helpful thing to look at the sky. It's a vast spaciousness. Today, the sky here is totally clear.

And that's, you can look at that spaciousness with inner spaciousness. And if there are clouds, you see that there's clouds and the clear sky also there. And sometimes there's just clouds, but still, there's still a spaciousness there.

And the light is filtering through the clouds. And that could be used as an analogy for your inner state of consciousness. Which can be totally overcast.

Which means, in this analogy, clouds are thoughts. For many people, their state of consciousness is continuously overcast. Overcast.

Which means one thought leads into another and into another and into another and into another. And all their consciousness is absorbed by thinking. So that's how most people still live on the planet.

And then comes a time when you realize, oh, there's an opening, a bit of spaciousness. There's some blue sky coming through in between the clouds. So that means noticing the gap between two thoughts in yourself.

And then occasionally you may find there's mostly clear sky and just a few puffy clouds floating past, which are little thoughts. You don't have to give them too much attention. And gradually you begin to be able to have that stillness, that spaciousness, not just occasionally, or when you are practicing meditation, but have it always, if not in the foreground of your life, that's not always possible.

There are many things that happen in the foreground that you need to give attention to, but in the background. So when you're looking at something, you don't immediately label it in terms of what it is. You don't interpret it, immediately form some fixed opinion or viewpoint.

But there's a moment of non-conceptualization and there's a stillness in the background against which the sense perception happens. And then whatever you look at, you look at, there's a dimension of depth to whatever you're looking at, which cannot be there if you immediately label everything. And sometimes that you don't even need an interpretation.

You can just be there with it, stillness against which the sense perception happens. Or if you need to have an interpretation, then after a moment of stillness, a thought arises concerning that particular situation, event or thing or person that is being perceived. So that's very important.

You can practice it throughout the day, looking at things, listening, and be still at the same time. Alert, an alertness goes with that. You become much more alert to your sense perceptions.

And that's the beginning of not relating to the world around you, to events, situations, to places, to activities that you engaged in, to other people, not to relate to all these things, primarily through the conditioned mind, which is the identification with which is the personality. That's an enormous sense of freedom. Freedom, as they would say, perhaps in Buddhist terms, freedom from the self that otherwise becomes the screen through which you look at everything, distorts everything according to their conditioning, personal, cultural conditioning, which is a kind of prison.

It imprisons you and you don't even know it. It also limits the amount of intelligence available to you to deal with situations and relate to people in a deeper, more intelligent way, ultimately with much more empathy and loving attention and an outflow of goodwill towards others, all of which is not possible when you're relating to other human beings and the world at large through exclusively through the conditioned mind, the personality, that entity. So that really is, to use words that I believe it was Krishnamurti used, that really is, finding that stillness is the awakening of intelligence in you, not just personal intelligence, not just the ability to solve problems or to analyze or compartmentalize or compare, but a deeper and creative intelligence. You are accessing a universal intelligence that is deeper or higher, whatever you want to call it, than the personal.

They're not absolutely distinct. They're not totally separate. The personal intelligence is conditioned intelligence.

It's a trickle. And then there is a vaster intelligence. So through becoming still, you access that.

And then you live in a sane way. If you don't access that in your life, there will be a lot of insanity. You won't even know it because it's normal.

You see that insanity, the way in which people relate to others and so on, how they react to situations. You see that when you watch movies and so on, it's all normal, seemingly normal human behavior. You see it in politics and so on.

But it's ultimately, when you realize that something else is possible, then you also realize that it is actually dysfunctional. Or insane. And there are periods in a person's life, a person who has not accessed the dimension of stillness or depth, the unconditioned consciousness.

There are periods in a person's lives when that insanity manifests particularly strongly. These are periods of big drama or terrible unhappiness, which always seems to come from the outside. This is how an unconscious person perceives it.

Other people are doing it to me. Situations are doing it to me. But it's generated by your reaction to other people and events and whatever else you encounter.

And collectively, there are also periods when the dysfunction of the human mind manifests very strongly. And then there's a period where it subsides a little bit. The first half of the 20th century was a period when the collective dysfunction of the human mind manifested particularly strongly.

If you think things are bad now, if you listen to the news, just look at the first half of the 20th century. Two world wars and many other things. Genocide.

How do you measure success in life? The world has certain criteria. But since the state of consciousness, the unawakened state of consciousness is highly dysfunctional, the criteria that the world has to judge success or failure must be a reflection of that dysfunction.

In the collective consciousness, which manifests in every personal consciousness. True success is determined by the degree to which you have transcended the conditioning of your mind, transcended the personality, doesn't mean there is no personality anymore. Transcended means you've gone beyond.

The personality still operates, but it no longer predominates, no longer has that overriding controlling function. You are no longer in its grip. And surprisingly or not surprisingly, one of the world's great scientists or one of the greatest, Albert Einstein, who was also a deeply spiritual person, said something similar.

He had deep spiritual insights. He said something similar. He didn't use the word success.

He said, value, the true value of a human being is determined by the degree to which he or she has become free of the self. That's what he said. And if somebody had quoted that without telling you who said it, you would probably have guessed it.

Maybe it was the Dalai Lama who said it. Maybe it was the Buddha who said it. No, it was Albert Einstein who said it.

The self, freedom from the self, which implies the self is the conditioned entity consisting of the conditioning of your mind, the personality. To become free is to transcend. It means the arising of the unconditioned consciousness, the stillness, the spaciousness.

Now, some people may object to the first part of Einstein's statement, which seems to imply that not every human being is of the same value because he says the true value of a human being is determined by the degree to which he or she is free of the self. That seems to conflict with the modern notion that we are all equal, that every human being is of the same value. To solve this dilemma, I suggest that you consider the possibility that in essence, every human being is of the same value and the essence of every human being is one with the essence of every other human being and the essence of the universe, that which underlies the universal source.

In essence, every human being is a manifestation of the one source of all life, an emanation of the one source of life. In that sense, there's no greater or lesser value to a human being because in essence, every human is a manifestation of the one. But the degree to which the underlying essence manifests outwardly varies from person to person.

Some are still very unconscious, totally, that means totally identified with the conditioned mind and its dysfunctional beliefs, the whole dysfunctional structure. In others, something else begins to shine through. The essence is less obscured, shines through.

So they display, instead of murderous aggression, they display compassion, empathy, goodwill, but even the person who displays murderous aggression, there's no saying, you just don't know whether that person will be stuck in that dysfunctional, highly dysfunctional state of consciousness, but that person can also suddenly, that would usually happen through intense suffering, self-inflicted, inflicted on others, then it gets reflected back through intense suffering. Even the person who is deeply unconscious can suddenly manifest, there can suddenly be an opening and more of the essence manifests itself because the essence was always there and is always there, but it was totally obscured. So if you wanted a yes or no answer to whether all human beings are of the same value, you cannot have a yes or no answer because they're different, can be addressed at different levels.

At the deepest level, yes. At the level of manifestation, no, or not yet. So when I use the word success, I could have used the word value.

And as you access the stillness, you realize that we call it stillness, of course, it's just a word, but it's more than that. You realize that that is something very precious, very deep, and that is not just something that you access as if it were something other. It's not other.

The stillness is the essence of who you are. It's one with who you are, and that is very precious. You can sense, it's hard to talk about it, but, and that's where true, the true sense of self-worth comes from.

Even self-confidence, which really is a wrong word now. Self-confidence, meaning you trust in you as the person, your personal achievements, your personal knowledge, your personal strengths, me, me, I'm, it's always comparative to others. You have self-confidence because you think of yourself as better than others.

You might have confirmation temporarily that you are better than others. But what we're accessing, finding, realizing here, that sense of self-worth is really, comes from a deeper place that's not the self. So we could substitute self-confidence for no self, no self in quotation marks, hyphenated, one word, no self-confidence.

You can trust that stillness, that deeper intelligence, that primordial intelligence to operate through you. I trust it, for example, when I come here and speak to you without having any idea what I'm going to say. So it's just a beautiful trusting in the deeper intelligence to act and speak through you, and then use your mind to manifest through.

So you could say, yes, I have that confidence, but it's not a confidence in me as a person. That deeper confidence comes when this personal self gets out of the way. And it gets out of the way the moment the mind becomes still.

The moment there's an opening and the self is out of the way. Thank you. I wish you a peaceful rest of the day or for many of you, evening sleep, or even a new day already starting.

And remember to invite moments of stillness into your life. So many opportunities every day, every moment. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (9:38:35 - 9:45:16)

Together, let's try an exercise to help balance and equalize your breathing. It's an equal breathing exercise of inhaling for a count of four, holding the breath for a count of four, exhale on a count of four, hold the breath for a count of four, and then we repeat, inhale, hold, exhale, hold. And then as our breath begins to deepen and we feel comfortable, we'll just increase the count to a count of six.

So that's inhale for a count of six, hold the breath for a count of six, exhale for a count of six, and hold the breath for a count of six. So today, we'll go up to six, but feel free on your own, you can even increase it to a count of eight, to a count of 10, to a count of 12, whatever feels comfortable. But remembering, it's not a forced breathing.

So if you find that it kind of stresses your body out and you get a little contracted, even with the count of six, take it down to a count of four. So with breathing, don't push yourself beyond where it is naturally comfortable. Because the whole point is to bring your body back into balance and calm, not to stress the body.

So begin by sitting in a comfortable chair, your feet flat on the floor, and your spine is erect. So if your chair tends to, and you tend to sort of slouch down in your chair, slide your buttocks forward so that you're seated at the edge of your chair. So spine is erect, crown of your head lifted towards the sky.

You may wish to close your eyes. Your palms are facing down on your lap. And let's just sort of, first of all, we'll do one or two sighs just to let go of any sort of unwanted energy that's been lingering in your body, in your emotional field.

So take a deep inhale and exhale. Let it go with a sigh. Again, inhale and exhale.

One more time, inhale and let it go. And begin, inhale to release. Three, four, hold.

Two, three, four. Exhale, to three, four. Hold, two, three, four.

Inhale, two, three, four. Hold, two, three, four. Exhale, two, three, four, hold, two, three, four.

Keep going, counting on your own. The inhale and the exhale is done through the nose. As you're staying present with your breath, become also aware of your body, relaxing your entire body.

And noticing, perhaps, during this breathing exercise, how the body relaxes with each exhale. Nice, slow, easy breathing. And on your next exhale, we'll step it up to a count of six.

Inhale, two, three, four.

2012 to 2015 Eckhart Tolle TV Part 3

And on your next exhale, we'll step it up to a count of six. Inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Hold, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Hold, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Hold, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Hold, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Continue like this, counting on your own. Remembering that if you find the count of six is strenuous for your body, go back to the count of four. Being aware of how you feel in your body.

Being aware of your breathing. Relaxing into this moment. Into your breath as you inhale, as you hold, and as you exhale.

Noticing at the end of the exhale, during the pause, during the hold, notice the stillness. And again, notice the stillness at the top of the inhale. Don't rush through the exercise, through the breathing.

It's just nice and slow, equal, balanced breathing. You can continue this breathing exercise for as long as you wish, but for this segment, let's do two more rounds, ending with your exhale and returning to regular breathing. Last round.

So it's exhale, then return to your regular breathing. Feeling the calmness in your body, the quietness of your mind, the relaxation of your body. And when you're ready, you can open your eyes and enjoy the harmony within.

Thank you. This breathing technique is a yoga breathing technique called Pranayama. It's an alternate nostril breathing.

So sitting up nice and tall, whether you're sitting on your yoga mat cross-legged or in like a sort of seated prayer position, kneeling on your knees, sitting back on your heels or sitting between your heels. Or you can even, since we're at the computer, be sitting in your chair, making sure that it's a firm yet comfortable chair, preferably not the sofa. And if you're sitting back in your chair, just check in to see whether you're kind of slouching back.

If so, just move, slide forward, and just come to sit at the edge of your chair. Spine is erect. Crown of your head is reaching towards the heavens.

Your chin can be slightly tucked in if you wish. Left hand stays on your lap, palm facing down. And with your right hand, raise your right hand, your thumb and your baby finger sticking out, and the three fingers facing down onto your palm.

We will begin by closing off the right nostril, and then you breathe in through the left nostril. And when you exhale, you close off the left nostril and breathe out through the right nostril. And then again, we breathe in through the right nostril, close off the right, and breathe out to the left, and so on.

We will equalize the breathing, first with a count of four, and then we'll step it up to a count of six. So, actually, before you start, you may wish to clear your nostrils. So, I won't do that in front of the camera.

It may not look so pretty, but I've done it. So, grab some Kleenex and clear your nostrils. And the other point I'd like to make is that if you are at all feeling congested today, we don't want to make your breathing into any strain or strenuous breathing.

It kind of defeats the purpose. So, if you're feeling congested today, you may wish to choose an alternate breathing exercise. And also, if you have any serious illness or are pregnant, you may wish to even consult a physician to see whether it's okay for you to be doing this kind of breathing technique.

So, let's begin. Sitting up nice and tall, crown of your head being lifted towards the heavens. Inhale through the left nostril.

Inhale, 2, 3, 4. Exhale, 2, 3, 4. Inhale, 2, 3, 4.

Exhale, 2, 3, 4. Inhale, 2, 3, 4. Exhale, 2, 3, 4.

Inhale, 2, 3, 4. Exhale, 2, 3, 4. Continue like this on your own.

Last round, exhaling through the left nostril. And then when we inhale, we'll do it on the count of 6. Inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Continue like this on your own. Keep your attention fully on your breath.

Even notice the pauses between the top of the inhale and at the bottom of the exhale. One more cycle of this. Ending with your exhale with the left nostril.

Return to your regular breathing. And if need to, you can take a deep inhale and just exhale with another sigh. Just stay aware internally, noticing any change within your body, your mind, your emotional state, or even your state of consciousness.

This pranayama exercise can be done for 2, 3, 5, 10, 20 minutes. Choose the time that's right for you. Here's a simple breathing technique that can be done at any time.

And it's actually good to do when you're feeling perhaps a little stressed. When you notice that your breathing has become shallow, it just helps you to bring yourself back into your body. I even practice this breathing technique when I'm stopped at a stoplight.

When I'm doing the dishes. It actually can be done at any time. It's simply breathing, inhaling for a count of 4, exhaling for a count of 4.

Now you'll notice, especially if you're under stress emotionally, if the body's feeling stressed, or if you notice that you've been breathing really shallowly, even a count of 4 can be a little strenuous. So you can even start off with a count of 3, but generally a count of 4 is pretty good. And then when the body begins to relax, your mind begins to relax, and the breathing begins to kind of restore itself, up the count to a count of 6.

You can even up it to a count of 8. So it's equal inhales and equal exhales. So sitting up straight, spine erect, in a firm yet comfortable chair, your feet flat on the floor, crowning your head lifted towards the sky.

You may wish to close your eyes, and you don't have to close your eyes, but you may. So it's inhale, 2, 3, 4. Exhale, 2, 3, 4.

Inhale, 2, 3, 4. Exhale, 2, 3, 4. Continue like this, counting on your own.

And you'll notice that at the top of each inhale, there's just this natural slight pause. And then naturally, you exhale. And then again, there's a pause.

And then an in-breath will naturally occur. So you're not only connected to your breath, but stay also conscious of your body. Just noticing where there's any tension and bringing awareness to that area and consciously relaxing your body.

Feeling your breath becoming more equalized, more balanced. On your next inhale, we'll count to 6. So it's inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Inhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. Exhale, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6.

Continue like this on your own, counting to yourself. Noticing the belly rise as you inhale, filling your belly, your side body, your back body, your chest with air. And exhaling all the toxins from your body, all the stress, all the emotions.

If the count of 6 is not comfortable for you and you're feeling a little strained on this count of 6, return to the count of 4. Remembering to keep your chin level or at least slightly tucked in rather than tilted upwards. Upwards restricts your throat.

We want to keep the throat open. Breathing is life and you are life. Restore yourself at any time by simply breathing slowly and deeply.

And when you're ready, on your next exhale, just return to your regular breathing, perhaps noticing that your regular breathing is deeper, is slower than when you started out. Noticing your state of consciousness now, body's calm, mind is calm. Restored the balance physically, emotionally, mentally.

And perhaps you've tapped into a higher state of consciousness, sensing the stillness. When you're ready, you can open your eyes and thank yourself for this breath of life. Namaste.

Welcome. Our segment today is on breathing. Breathing is life.

We survive without food for several weeks and without water for a few days. But without oxygen, we will die within a matter of minutes. We breathe in oxygen.

We breathe in the chi all around us. It sustains us. It revitalizes us.

In our bodies, in our minds. We all know how to breathe. Breathing is automatic, it's spontaneous, and it's natural.

In fact, we breathe even when we're not even aware of it. However, most of our breathing becomes modified or restricted. Usually this happens when we're under stress, when we worry, when we're filled with anxiety, when we're in fear, and sometimes even if we're in this habit of moving quickly, the pattern of the movement and breath follow each other.

If you've become in a habitual mode of being in fear, it's almost like that feeling of, you know, when somebody comes up behind you and you get scared and you go, and that freezes up our whole body, our lungs, and everything contracts, including our breathing. So then the breathing ends up just being very, very shallow, perhaps only breathing from one third of our capacity of our lungs, just up here, instead of that full belly breath of breathing in and breathing out. So proper breathing revitalizes you.

It brings and restores health in your body, in your mind, emotionally, and even can help you to a higher state of consciousness. I will teach you five different breathing techniques. Each one can be used at any particular time, but use the one that feels right for you in this moment.

An overview of the five breathing techniques. The first one is simply sighing. The second is a pranayama breathing technique.

The third is a chagang technique, and it's called abdominal breathing. The fourth is a breathing technique that equalizes, balances you, your system. Lastly, the fifth is a simple breathing technique.

[Speaker 4] (33:44 - 34:11)

I echo. I have met people in my life that have an awareness and an intuition that can only come with presence. That's very attractive, and it invites trust.

So my question is, can presence be used to manipulate or use others?

[Speaker 1] (34:14 - 34:20)

Without going into detail, would you say that you have experienced something like that?

[Speaker 7] (34:21 - 34:21)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (34:27 - 46:40)

Now, presence cannot be used, but presence can arise and then be covered up again, and then the ego returns and claims something. It claims ownership of presence. That's one thing that can happen.

It claims the ownership of the power that is in presence. That's the downfall frequently of spiritual teachers who have periods of egolessness, and the ego has become dormant or stepped aside, and presence arises. But the ego is still lurking in the background, and then it reasserts itself.

And then you know it, whether the spiritual teacher claims some sort of specialness for him or herself. When he says, I'm the most advanced human that ever lived and ever will live on the planet, then you know that probably the ego has crept back in, even though that teacher might have uttered beautiful words only a few weeks ago, inspired words. So that can happen and has happened.

Another, there are certain abilities that some people have that's now the second part of the answer. There are certain abilities that some people have that sometimes look as if they were things that only an awakened human being, an ability that only an awakened human being would have. It sometimes appears like that.

For example, what in India they call siddhis, which are psychic powers, people who are able to, sometimes clairvoyant, or can tell you what the name of your grandmother was and at what age your grandmother died. They can perhaps influence others, infuse their own will into others and make people do certain things that otherwise they would not do. They can have a hypnotic effect on others.

And sometimes it looks to an outside observer as if you were looking at a highly evolved being, an enlightened being, but that is not necessarily the case because there are many humans who have psychic powers which do not necessarily go together with spiritual realization. But if you don't know that, you can easily be led to believe that these things can only come out of spiritual realization. If I levitated here and now and somebody films it, then suddenly large numbers of people all over the world would believe that I am the most highly evolved human being on the planet.

But it could be that I simply have certain psychic powers like an athlete on the physical realm has developed enormous physical abilities that other humans don't have because he or she has trained certain muscles and limbs to move in certain ways. So he has things that are almost superhuman. In the same way, there are some humans who have psychic abilities.

They're like athletes in the psychic realm and doesn't necessarily go together with the absence of ego. In fact, it's quite dangerous if there's a big ego that is hidden. Egos are also good at concealing themselves.

So the ego is hidden and this person is able to bend spoons or to manifest things out of nothing. Well, it seems out of nothing, but maybe the sleeve is not nothing. It manifests somewhere.

I haven't practiced enough. I can't do it. So those things are often, of course, often used, not necessarily often used in the service of the ego.

But presence itself cannot be used by the ego. Ego can only come in once presence has been covered up, receded into the background, and then the ego claims something, perhaps because there was inspiration there. And then with some spiritual teachers, you can see the difference.

Once the presence has been covered up, also the quality of what they say is diminished. It no longer has the inspirational power that it had before. There's also a difference between charisma and presence that is sometimes confused by people.

There are certain humans, some are spiritual teachers, some are other humans that perhaps have certain powers or positions of power, who seem to emanate a very powerful energy field. And that is also, in those of you who don't know the difference, is going also be confused with spiritual attainment or enlightenment or awakening. Some spiritual teachers have both presence and charisma.

Some have only presence. Presence is more fine an energy field of a higher vibrational frequency than charisma. Charisma is a very powerful, it's basically it's chi or shakti that emanates from them.

And I have described chi or shakti, whatever you want to call it, as the bridge between the manifested physical world and the unmanifested formlessness. In between, as form is born out of formlessness, it becomes energy. The energy is the first manifestation is energy.

You can't see it with your senses. And that energy is chi. And then that energy flows into creating form.

So it's a bridge between form. And some humans are in touch with that level. And those humans have charisma.

Sometimes spiritual teachers have, as I just said, have both presence and occasionally charisma. Or psychic powers can often come with charisma also. And then you have people who are in powerful positions in the world.

And because of the energy that flows through them and the attention they're given by other humans, they develop the charisma. They are in touch with that energy source of chi. For example, obviously some of these are not necessarily great good people because that energy can be used for egoic purposes.

Hitler had great charisma, but so did, I'm told, somebody who met Bill Clinton even after he was no longer president. He still, as when he comes into a room apparently, everybody can feel that there is an emanation of energy there. And in the past, kings often had that.

In medieval times, the king had, many kings were reputed to have the ability to heal. And so they called it the royal touch and often sick people were brought into the presence of the king and he would place his hand on them and many of them were healed. And through perhaps the power of the energy added to that, of course, is also their belief that in the presence of the king you are healed.

So it was their own power, of course, very often that healed them. So it's sometimes hard to tell the difference unless you're already firmly established in presence yourself between charisma and presence. And some spiritual teachers, I don't know whether you had contact with what you just mentioned, whether that was a spiritual teacher that you had contact with and then you witnessed what you just described.

Yes. Yeah. Some spiritual teachers, I'm not mentioning any names, of course, whether they're alive or dead, I'm not mentioning any names, but there are some who very clearly had enormous energy outflow and people would get virtually addicted to their energy field.

Whenever they came into the presence of the teacher, they could feel, ah. And with presence, a little bit like that happens also because presence in one human being awakens your own presence. But the teacher needs to point out that what you're experiencing is yourself.

It's not the energy of the teacher. The energy of the teacher awakens your presence. But there's a misperception when humans are addicted to an external figure, to the energy that comes from that figure, they are dependent on him or her for their energy intake.

They suck in their chi or shakti and think they're being enlightened. But a very clear sign that they're not being enlightened is when they go back into ordinary life, they're just as unconscious as everybody else. So there's no real change.

There's only an energy absorption, which really the energy you should find your own source from within rather than depend on an external source. So presence cannot be used. Two things can happen.

Either it's not presence, it's she in the service of the ego, or it was presence, but it became covered up, ego reasserted itself and then made claims and tried to manipulate people for its own purposes. Now, which one it is in your case, I don't know, but perhaps you will be able to see for yourself. The main thing is a person in presence, presence and ego cannot coexist at the same time.

So you can't have the ego can be in the background, but it cannot use, ego cannot use presence when presence is present. I understand.

Yeah. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (46:42 - 47:05)

Thank you. Is there another question that has not dissolved?

[Speaker 6] (47:16 - 47:18)

It only has partly dissolved.

[Speaker 1] (47:19 - 47:20)

Partly dissolved.

Hello, Eckhart. Moin, moin. My question deals with parents.

With practice and presence, I felt love for them after many years, not feeling love and feeling guilty for that. But I still have huge problems to meet them. When I meet them, if they are in the same room, even if I try to be aware of my breath and my inner body, after a while, I have huge pain body attacks.

Is that triggered by something they say?

[Speaker 6] (48:07 - 48:27)

I can't even say that. Sometimes it's the way I manage to go through the meeting quite fine, and my mother leaves the room and I break down. And, yeah, I don't know what it is.

[Speaker 1] (48:29 - 48:32)

German parents can be difficult. Yes.

[Speaker 7] (48:33 - 48:34)

Okay.

[Speaker 1] (48:35 - 57:57)

I know. American parents, too. So on one level, there's already an acceptance of them.

On a mental level, the acceptance of who they are, the acceptance of their limitations, they behave the way they behave. The pain body is still there inside you, of course, and the pain body reacts. It may also be that the mental level, the mental acceptance, is not yet complete either.

To see that they act the way they act, speak the way they speak, not because of who they are, but because of their past conditioning, which is their mental emotional conditioning is speaking through them. They can't help that. If there's not enough presence, everybody is controlled by their mental emotional conditioning.

They can't help it. They are afflicted by that disease, which is identification with unconscious conditioning. I'm not the only one who calls that disease.

Even in the ancient teachings of Zen, they sometimes call it the disease of the mind. And there are some Zen teachers who have said they are here to cure that mental illness. They've said that's what Zen is about.

It's curing that mental illness. So you need to, on the mental level, as you sit with them, you need to know that continuously that what you are observing is not who they are. You're observing a form of mental conditioning.

Underneath that, there is the being. And you may sometimes get a glimpse of it. My mother was very much identified also with her mind, and occasionally I looked into her eyes, and suddenly there was a light shining through when she stopped talking for a little while.

In other words, the mind catching a breath after talking for 10 minutes incessantly. And then for a moment I could see, ah, there's their being, her being was shining through. And I have one or two photos where her being shines through.

And then, of course, it gets obscured again. And then you get the same, get the suspicions, the complaints, the accusations, all the stuff associated with unconscious thinking. So on the mental level, you need to know that, be present enough so that you don't forget that what you're observing is not who they are, but you're observing the past in them, the conditioning.

And then comes the emotions that you feel. Of course, there's your past, the past, the living past in you from your childhood, all the things they did or failed to do because they couldn't help it. There wasn't enough presence to change it.

So that's something for you to find acceptance. As you accept them, you accept what you feel at that moment. Whether you can even label it, we don't know.

Is it sadness? Is it anger? Is it heaviness or a mixture of all of that, a feeling of wanting to run away, a contraction, whatever it is, that's all there.

You don't need to even analyze it. You just need to feel the entire energy field of that, and it doesn't feel pleasant. And it's the past in you.

So there you're observing the past in them, acting out, and you experience the past in you. And so what do you do with two pasts? You have the past out there and the past in here.

Only presence can dissolve the past. So you need to access the power of presence in yourself. And how do you do that?

A quick way in a situation like this is the acceptance of whatever arises inside or outside at this moment. You accept this is what you feel. This is what they do or say.

There's the acceptance of the inner and the outer, because it is already happening. You have to accept or you suffer. In a way, if you don't accept, you suffer more.

If you don't want to feel what you feel, that's more suffering because you're resisting. Acceptance does something that I could describe as, let's say here's the emotional field and it doesn't feel good. And acceptance means just to say, okay, there it is, I can feel it.

I'm verbalizing. Acceptance doesn't even require, after a little while, you don't need words anymore. You can just see what is, be with it.

And at that moment, a little bit of space opens up around that emotion. A little bit of space. That space comes from your acceptance.

The acceptance gives it space. And that's already a tiny bit of freedom. You've given it a little bit of space inside yourself when you say, yes, this is what is.

And that's a beauty. You've given both them space externally to be, and you've given yourself space internally. And then, as you notice that actually, that feels already a little bit better than before because there's space around the emotion.

And then you go into it more deeply and you accept even more. You continue to accept. And that space grows a little bit around it.

And then you encounter the strange phenomenon of an emotion that is not pleasant existing in a spacious field, so to speak, that's around it. And then you realize that who you are is you are that field. And you can allow the emotion to be in that field and you can allow your parents to be there and say what they say and do what they do.

They're repeating the past. Space comes in. So acceptance brings space, and space is the transcendence of conditioning.

Space is the transcendence of the past. The transcendence, transcendence of the personality and the person, and it's freedom, space. That's the practice.

And so the best place to practice is with your parents. There are many other places where you can practice, but the ultimate mastery you will achieve when you can practice with your parents. That's the graduation.

You graduate. It's the PhD in presence. Don't jump into it too much.

If you say, okay, I'm going to spend a week with our parents now, it's too much, too much. Give yourself short time periods at first. Say, I'm going to come for coffee and cake.

That's what they like to do. At least my mother did. I'll come for coffee and cake, and I'll stay for an hour, or you know, if you can.

I don't know how that works practically. And then you practice. You give yourself one hour to practice.

And you know it's only an hour. I have to be present for an hour. And it's your spiritual practice.

So, as you know, I've written the quote in a book. Ram Dass said, if you think you're so enlightened, spend two weeks with your parents. Two weeks.

The ultimate test. So, happy practice. Thank you.

The Fyndhorn Foundation in the north of Scotland is a center of spiritual service in co-creation with nature, which emphasizes education and community. The Fyndhorn Foundation is at the heart of one of the best-known intentional communities in the world. It is a major international center of adult educational, personal, and spiritual transformation.

About 14,000 visitors a year come to the Foundation in one of the many ways that it is possible to visit, live, and work there. Eckhart Tolle gave a weekend retreat in the Universal Hall to a group of over 300 people. This is a record of that event.

Welcome to our weekend retreat at this beautiful, sacred place. Our theme for this weekend is stillness, which is inseparable from who you are in the depth of your being. One could say everybody is still already.

The stillness is already there. It does not need to be found even. It certainly does not need to be created because it's already there.

The only thing is you may not notice it. If there's a lot of mental noise, then you just don't notice it, that it's there. And also you don't notice the dimension within yourself that is far deeper than the movement of thought.

And your whole identity is then bound up with the movement of thought, a mind-created sense of self, a personal history and no more, that is soon coming to an end. Soon, next year or in 40, 50 years' time, it's soon. So who you are and stillness are one and the same.

And if you have not yet gone completely mad in this mad world, that means you have some access to the stillness inside you. You may not remember it afterwards because it's not memorable, since stillness is timeless and the mind cannot memorize it or think, oh, that was interesting, I'll remember that, because stillness is not interesting. Interesting is a mental thing.

Just as our weekend here is not going to be interesting. You may have noticed that already. But interesting is not the ultimate.

It's only the ultimate to the human mind. You can go out here and look at a tree or flower or the sunset, and could you say, this sunset is interesting? Only if you were trying to write a PhD about sunsets.

If you had to analyze it, or the oak tree. The oak tree becomes interesting the moment you start to analyze it mentally. And there is a place for that also in this dimension.

But if you get caught up on that dimension only, where you break things up into little bits and pieces and analyze them, and by the way, most kinds of analysis, you have to kill the thing first before you can analyze it, or in the process of analysis it gets killed. But if you just be with the oak tree, contemplate it, truly look, then what you're looking at goes beyond interesting. It's far deeper than interesting.

Same as the sunset. There's nothing interesting about it, and yet it is awe-inspiring. It is deep.

There's a depth there that defies analysis by the mind. The moment you analyze it, you have reduced it to something lifeless. And most people in our civilization, and this has been going on for a long time, are trapped in that dimension where compulsively they go about their life analyzing, interpreting, and labeling things as soon as they enter their field of consciousness.

They do it to people. They do it to situations that they encounter, immediately have some personal reactive relationship to it. They do it to nature, and they can no longer perceive the sacredness that is there in nature because they approach it only through thinking.

And that is a dreadful present that you then end up in, the present of your own mind. And then you approach your whole life only through that. And your whole life becomes reduced to a conceptual reality in the head, consisting of thoughts that you have about things, viewpoints, opinions, and even so-called knowledge.

Knowledge is thought, a label, and gives the illusion that you know. And all it is, it's a thought that you have put on something. And then it loses its depth and aliveness.

And you begin to relate to reality through the veil of thinking. And you relate to yourself through the veil of thinking because you yourself become a conceptual thought-based entity, an egoic self, a me, with its unfulfilled personal history, its desires and fears and frustrations, and its hopes that it will find ultimate fulfillment of its unfulfilled and unfulfilling sense of self based on a story in the future, which again is a thought form. That's what the future is.

Nobody has ever encountered it except as a thought. And yet most people live unconsciously as if the next moment or the one after that were more important than this moment, the only thing there ever is. This one moment that you could never escape from, have never escaped from, will never escape from, that is inseparable from the life that you are, also inseparable from stillness, because the moment you enter the now with your attention, a stillness arises.

The essence of the present moment, no matter how mad it may appear on the surface, is always stillness. It is also sacredness. The only place where the sacred dimension can be found is now.

You have to be present to this moment. You have to wake up into this moment to realize that life is sacred. When you are lost in thought, sacred is meaningless.

It could become another of the many concepts that you can play with, and you could write a PhD about it without ever having encountered it yourself. So this, the depths of now, is inseparable from your very being, your very life, and it is a sacred one life. And yes, this is why we're here, to deepen our awareness of that dimension.

And the sacred is everywhere. If you become truly present, you would find the sacredness everywhere. It's easier here.

In certain places that are called sacred, there is less of a density in the structures, the physical structures, the forms. There is a transparency almost to the form. Something shines through the forms, and this is why we call those places sacred.

But even here, there are some people who cannot sense that because they are not present enough when they walk in the garden. They are still in their head, thinking about where they are going the day after tomorrow, and the accumulation of problems, which are thought forms that are part of their sense of self. I have important problems to think about.

And occasionally you get a glimpse, three seconds of presence, and you get a glimpse, and immediately there comes the movement of thought again. So some people cannot be present here. Most of you can, and those who cannot, I believe, will quickly deepen and see how easy it is to be present, and how hard it is not to be present.

Normally people tell me the opposite. They say, it's so hard to be present. And this is what the mind believes, but the opposite is true.

Not being present to the now is hard. To live trapped in your mind is hard. That makes living into something that is a struggle and an effort, and you never get there, you never make it, because you live for the future, which is only a thought form.

And this is another aspect of living, trapped in thought, with your whole sense of self trapped in thought, hoping that at some point you will find yourself, complete yourself, or it's all going to work out in the end. And in the way the mind imagines it, it cannot work out, because every form dies, and every structure eventually dissolves again. And the mind only thinks in terms of forms and structures, and it hopes that life will work itself out on that level of structures and forms.

And it's always disappointed, because it cannot. And the miracle is, it's already working out at this very moment. It's already as it should be at this moment.

You have already arrived at the place of sacredness at this moment. It's easier to see it here, to sense that here. More difficult to feel that this moment is sacred when you find yourself at Piccadilly Circus or Times Square.

And you need to be an enlightened being perhaps, which simply means very present, to see the sacredness in the flashing Coca-Cola sign at Piccadilly Circus. And you need to be a Buddha to see the sacredness in a prison camp. And if one says the prison camp also has the dimension of the sacred, if one says that prematurely, this will be misunderstood and really will not make sense unless you know within yourself that that which is beyond form, the one formless life, is indestructible.

And some people who were in prison camps realized it for themselves. So we are here to find that dimension that is deeper than thought within ourselves, that has nothing to do with time. And so people ask sometimes, how do I still my mind?

I want to find the stillness. And then, yes, there are some good meditation methods, and eventually that also has to be left behind, otherwise it comes in between who you are. You put a method there to find yourself.

That is a space between you and yourself. And every method eventually needs to be left behind. You don't need it.

It's the last thing you leave behind. And this particular teaching works without methods. But if you have a method, it's beautiful, and you use it until you don't need it anymore.

Every thought in your mind when you are not aware of it as a thought has a sense of self in it. A sense of I am. You identify with the movement of thought.

And that is the essence of unconscious living. And that is why people continuously live for the future. The thought form of future where they are hoping to complete their insufficient sense of self.

The happy ending of my story. This is not to say you should not pursue certain activities. Learn new things.

Explore new countries. Meet new people. Learn this and that.

Acquire knowledge, expertise here and there. Develop your abilities, physical or mental. And create whatever you are called upon to create in this world.

It is beautiful to create in this world. And on that level, of course, there is always more that you could do. And as you grow older, there are certain things that you can no longer do.

So gradually, on the level of form, your life becomes reduced. There are already many, many things that it is unlikely that I will be able to do. I am not going to win a title at Wimbledon anymore.

It would be a miracle if I managed to do that. Not totally impossible, but I'm not even going to try it. And many other things would say, well, it's just, it's too late.

And this is true. It's, for many things, it's too late. On the level of form, I need to accept, yes, no, I'm not going to be the heavyweight boxing champion.

It's just too late for that, or it never was possible. So on the level of form, yes, depending on where you are in years, there may still be many things that you can add to what you can do and what you know and what you explore. Or it may be that you're reaching the end of the lifespan of this form, so there's little time left, and there isn't that much more that you can add to yourself.

And that's fine, too. Now, the question is, are you looking for yourself when you attempt to add more to who you are? And that is the dilemma of human existence.

There's a compulsive searching for more. Not that there's anything wrong with doing new things. No.

But there is a compulsive striving towards the next moment and the next and the next, hoping to add more to who I think I am. Thought forms. Possessions, attainments, recognition by other people, all thought forms.

My, I have not enough yet. I don't feel secure enough. I only have five houses and three cars.

And I still don't feel secure. And I think the houses are not big enough. That must be the reason.

Or they all, they write about me in the papers, and then, okay, by the way, I don't have five houses. It's just an example. Or to get recognition, they all write about me, and then I read in the papers, finally people have recognized who I am.

They think I'm great. And that gives, temporarily gives you the feeling of I have now added that universal recognition to who I think I am. And many people strive for that.

They think, when are they going to discover me? When are they going to realize that I am special? They may never realize it.

There is a search for specialness in the mind-made sense of self that in some cases is fulfilled, and in most cases is not fulfilled on the level where it's seeking. And so in either case, that sense of specialness, you could say, there are two ways of being unhappy. Not getting what you want, and getting what you want.

Because all the people who have attained universal recognition in whatever field, they are not happy either. They are not at peace with themselves. They do not feel the sense of security and the sense of finally having arrived, that before they had it, they had associated with that idea.

Once people recognize me, then I will have arrived. And then the moment comes, and at first it feels good, and then you see that people's opinion of you are only thought forms, they are images that they create, or if they are very well known, the media creates a fiction that has your name. And then you read about yourself in the paper, and you see, who is this?

They are writing about, there is nothing to do with me at all. And so many people become unhappy, even more unhappy, when they attain recognition. The world tells them, yes, you are special, and yet, I don't feel special.

Or they say, this is an illusion, that's not me, it's an image, a mind-created image. And a few people then go beyond all the mind-created sense of identity, because they have attained what the world tells us is desirable, wealth, property, recognition, attainment, here or there, and yet, it has not provided them with what they were really looking for, myself, a sense of being rooted in life, the fullness of life, as Jesus calls it, the fullness of life. And so there are many famous people who take drugs, and they need to dull the dreadful unhappiness they feel inside, because even the illusion of more in the future, that most people are still living by, doesn't work anymore, because if you already have everything, the illusion that the more, by attaining more in the future, you're going to be happy, can't work anymore for you.

What a dreadful fate. You can't look to the more anymore to feel that you are yourself. And so they feel even more unhappy.

They cannot escape into the next moment anymore. So they need to take some drugs so that for a little while, I feel better. Or a few break through to a deeper level within themselves, and realize that that sense of specialness that operated on the level of better than, or more than, was an illusion.

You can't pursue it, and it will take you nowhere. It can never fulfill itself because it is a thought form, me, the special one, that you wanted to incorporate into the story of me, that is the basis of your identity as long as you are trapped only in thought. Me, the special one.

Some people have the fiction in their head that they are... I don't want to take away anybody's fiction if they still like it. You could have the fiction in your head that in a past lifetime you were Napoleon.

And that can give you a sense of specialness, but it is derived from the movement of thought and images. But that keeps some people going. Nobody might agree with you that you were Napoleon, but at least, temporarily, it keeps you...

But you have to keep thinking about it, and tell the story to others. And others have other stories where other people say, yeah, that's true, that's who you are. But it is based on the movement of thought and the emotions that go with those thoughts.

So you have a whole identity based on a personal history. Very little. And it's not going to last very long.

The soap bubble of my personal history is going to pop soon. And everybody can say, I'm not predicting my imminent death, nobody knows. But everybody's death is ultimately imminent because one year or 50 years, it comes quite soon.

And it'll be now when it comes, not tomorrow. And so to be trapped in that sense of self, a conceptual reality, that is a dreadful fate. It's constant neediness, which even gets translated into the spiritual once you have realized, okay, I'm done with possessions, I know that that's not it.

But be careful here with other thought forms that arise to replace. For example, you might have spent 20 years of your life making money, and then you see, okay, I'm now giving away my BMW, I'm going to buy a bicycle because I'm spiritual. And I will only wear certain spiritual clothes or this or that, it doesn't matter what it is.

I'm on my bicycle, and then I can be on my bicycle and look at the person who is still so unconscious that he's driving his BMW and can think how much superior I am in my spiritual. And of course what you're carrying now is a much heavier thought form than the BMW thought form. So your sense of self has become, can, it could, it's quite possible that the BMW man has less of a sense of self than the man on the bicycle.

It's possible, probably not, but it's possible. So be careful with any, how the mind shifts and then chooses another story to feel, but always to feel, to make itself feel more than in one way or another so that it can, it works through comparison because it's thought, I think of, I have an image of who I am and then I need to compare that to who I think other people are. So I impose images on myself, mental concepts and images and then I impose them on others and then I compare my image with that image.

Hmm, okay, I'm more spiritual than this or he's more spiritual, he's been at it for much longer than me. And then you get how much you know. Knowledge is another one.

You casually mention from your great store of knowledge, you casually mention a few things and the other person is dumbfounded, doesn't know what you're, and it is, it's obvious that you know more than he. And that gives the feeling of ah. And so it works with little things to enhance it's always very precarious sense of self and then it loves being right and it loves others to be wrong because it's the only way you can be right.

It loves being right and feels itself enhanced momentarily through ah, I'm right. So it's always the strengthening of the fiction of self, the fiction of me, me and my story and that people go through life looking for that. That's the purpose of their life is to strengthen the fiction of me.

And so that becomes the motivating force behind their actions, what they do. And it's always, it's an uneasy thing because very often you feel less than somebody else and then you have to kind of work around that. Less special than he.

He knows more but on the other hand I look better. Laughter And then other people, if they cannot achieve the specialness in the way in which the world tells us you ought to be special, they achieve a reverse specialness by feeling unfairly treated by life. By feeling that they are a victim of certain people or situations and in their thought form of being a victim they feel very special.

So you can still win even if you lose. The mind is very clever. And a victim identity can be very strongly lodged in some people's minds and as soon as you meet them and after five minutes they will tell you their story.

You know what happened to them. 25 years ago it happened. And of course, yes, dreadful things did happen 25 years ago and they happen today also in this mad world but building an identity around some form of suffering that happened at some point or repeatedly in this mad world where suffering is inevitable to build a sense of specialness around that then you have put yourself into a dreadful prison with bars all around but at least you think you know who you are. You have a story.

Oh great, at least I have a story. My life treated me more unfairly than most people. I can feel more then.

And so whatever the mind it will find something to give itself an identity a conceptual identity and it is very much afraid of losing the story of abandoning it stepping beyond it and usually the story needs to become unpleasant for people to be pushed out of it. It's because in a way the story is a dream. A dream of who I am.

And if a dream becomes very unpleasant then you will want to wake up. No dream of me is ultimately all that pleasant but some are more unpleasant than others. So see how the self the conceptual self continuously tries to survive not only to survive and protect itself from others and to use others to enhance itself use them in one way or another and that determines the relationship between humans when you haven't stepped beyond that there is wanting to use another human or feeling you need to protect yourself from another human being.

Those are the two things that govern relationships in the egoic state. You either use them or you fear them. You need them and you are afraid of them and sometimes both at the same time.

And of course that also means there is no true relationship. It gets distorted because you don't know who you are. You have only an image in the head.

That tries to make itself stronger because it doesn't feel enough yet. I'm not enough yet. And so for some people the sense of specialness is attained by frequent complaining in the head and out aloud about life and situations and people and what's going on and it really shouldn't be happening.

They should do something about it. It's all very bad indeed. Why doesn't he?

And there is blaming continuously complaining and blaming and that the ego loves because it makes itself right by doing that. When you complain about something or somebody you feel you are right and the person or the situation you complain about is wrong. I'm not saying complain in a practical sense where you say I'd like to exchange this thing that I bought because it's not working.

That's fine. It's practical and you do something about it. But the complaining that is the telling of stories in the head that has no practical purpose whatsoever that constantly is in a conflict relationship with the present moment.

There's always something about it that isn't right and so you complain or something has just happened and you complain or you complain because it hasn't happened yet. So many people feel they cannot be themselves or truly at peace with themselves because of something that happened or something that hasn't happened. Those are the two reasons why you cannot be yourself.

Either something has happened and that's preventing me from being myself truly or something hasn't happened yet and if that doesn't happen I can't be myself. Isn't that it's a strange thing? I need something to happen so that I can be myself.

So we are not all the many ways we are talking about this here so that you can recognize it when it happens in you because it is a universal pattern in every human. It's inherited. It is the collective human mind in its egoic unconscious state that operates in that way.

That keeps you trapped on the surface of your being on the little surface movement the wave movement of life the forms of life all the things that happen and you're continuously you're trapped in that on the level of form just and of course on the level of form which includes even thought forms they are primordial forms when you are identified with every thought that comes into your head and of course there is never an end to it because the next thought comes immediately afterwards it's a string and so it goes the whole day long and you go and occasionally you get the little glimpses that keep you sane so that you can still survive here you are not they keep you from committing suicide or they keep you from going totally insane you have little moments of and they may be short but they keep you alive there is a little bit of joy seeping through from the depths of your being through the layers the heavy layers of mind there is a little bit a little crack appears here and there if it didn't you would be totally lost in here and you certainly wouldn't be sitting here and so occasionally there is moments it may be when there is sudden beauty and it's overwhelming or sudden a moment of danger that wakes you up out of the continuous voice in the head and suddenly there is more intense aliveness beingness presence and then thought comes back or it could be for some people danger in the form of physical illness can come and suddenly that wakes you up and suddenly you realize all the things that you pursued and you thought were important are not important at all so already something collapses on the level of thought all the things that mattered so much and suddenly you develop a physical illness and see it doesn't matter at all and so that can be helpful for some it can be an awakening for some people or it may be some people are kept sane by an animal because whenever it's the only way they can relate to another being that is non-conceptual because when they meet humans they are trapped in the concepts that they have about every human they meet they impose mental concepts and images in the form of what they think about they know exactly what they think about you they are not relating to you they are relating to the thoughts in their head they have about you and most people do it to each other so you have only two thought made entities trying to be in a relationship each one both needing and fearing the other and this is of course why relationships are so problematic these days so some people are kept sane by an animal and that the pets fulfill an incredible function that hasn't been fully acknowledged and recognized in this world they keep humanity sane because there you have when you touch the dog or the cat whatever it is and for a moment you are not some people even there they carry ego but those are the extreme cases you touch the animal and this you can be yourself you don't need to psychologically protect yourself from the animal or want something from you just can be with that and you can something transmits itself because the animal lives more deeply connected with the source of life than most humans less removed or one could say the illusion has not grown to such an extent of being a separate entity a me and the rest of the universe the animal still has the oneness with the totality hasn't lost it totally is deeply rooted in being so the animal does not create a world of problems the animal is one with life and humans have separated themselves from life they have a conceptual image this is me and there is the rest of the world there is a barrier and there is the other the other human being a dreadful concept other and they are needing others and fearing others walking through life and other is a mentally another concept so the egoic self the stronger you are trapped in the egoic sense of self the more you will emphasize the otherness of others and others will all become reduced to walking caricatures because the few labels that you have about them you reduce them and they are basically all caricatures and sometimes when people you listen to people they mention about somebody they met or somebody they know and see how stupid that person is and they have a few judgments and when you listen to that you see this caricature of this strange distorted human being and when you meet them you say this is the person you were talking about yeah and so the animal is not burdened by the continuous stream of thinking it does not have a conceptual identity like the humans so it hasn't separated itself so it can be an access point for some humans into being where they can be with a being without and it is for some humans it's a moment when they actually thought subsides when they pat their dog or you have a purring cat on your chest suddenly you think thought quietens becomes more quiet and you have a space of stillness and you feel the purring of a cat on your chest or simply to watch an animal can be if you can truly watch it can take you out of your mind and you become present because the animal is present and the same with the realm of nature the trees and the flowers and the blades of grass they are all present they are all surrendered to life one with life a beautiful temporary expression of the one life and so for some humans that's their only access point and for some even that doesn't work anymore I knew someone with a very strong ego who had ego battles with her cat if the cat didn't come she had the kitchen window open and the cat one evening didn't appear and she was where's my cat and then she would shut the window and said if she doesn't want to see me I don't want to see her and so the poor cat had to stay outside all night that also happens or there are cases where humans cannot even relate to animals anymore so this is where and so we see millions and millions of humans living in a pseudo reality with a sense of self that is ultimately a fiction that is always insufficient always feeling a sense of lack always needing more always even needing to make enemies so that it can still define itself as me and the other needing some kind of conflict so that it's separate sense of self can remain intact what can I be in conflict with today what can I complain about now so that I can feel a little bit more myself ah there it is and so when millions of humans live like that then this what then the result is what we read as human history a dreadful tale of incredible suffering that humans inflict on each other and other life forms on the planet incredible suffering and so the same you see on television tonight when you switch on the news you will see just how mad the collective consciousness is of humanity in its present evolutionary stage and yet here we are here we are and we recognize that all that is a form of one could say collective mental illness that humanity is suffering from and so one could say well how can God allow a whole species to become mentally ill I heard that question somewhere in somebody's mind and of course you can ask the same question on a personal level how can does God allow me to be ill how dare he she it to allow me to be ill to suffer and of course within the larger as a whole everything has its place and everything is as it should including your personal illness for the moment doesn't mean healing cannot happen but there are many humans here who were brought here who would not be here if they had not suffered some kind of dysfunction in their lives physical illness perhaps or some great loss and so you can already see on your personal level that your suffering your physical suffering whatever it may be to some extent began to dissolve the ego the egoic structures in your mind it started to shake it loose so that something else could come through and you suddenly found yourself becoming interested in the present moment and then you end up here and no matter what your story is and some of you may feel that it was all one big mistake the story of me was all one big mistake you are here now and that's an amazing thing to be to be here now and see that was the story and the outcome of all that big mistake was that now you are stepping out of it and you realise it as yes on the level of form this is how my life unfolded and now let me speak personally for one moment I could easily look upon my whole life let's say until the world told me that I was important a few years ago it happened before that nobody told me I was important until that I could look at my whole life up to that point as one complete disaster nothing actually worked out I tried that for a few years and then I was at university and then I did my PhD and then I gave that up and then I drifted for two years and then I went into that and then I tried that and it didn't things many things ok and then my mother said ok now you are 45 where what have you achieved others have already built up big businesses and so on the level of story it was a big disaster and yet fortunately at some point already I had given up identification with the story that the story was only my identity up to the age of 29 and it was a very unhappy one even there even when I was that was my relatively successful the only worldly success I had was I did well at university up to before I became a graduate student and it made me happy for two weeks and so how isn't it strange that a failed story can produce the flower the flower of consciousness and perhaps the flower of consciousness needs the mud out of which it grows you have the beautiful image of the lotus in Buddhism the symbol of Buddhism the lotus flower it grows it has its roots in the mud and it grows out of that and there is nothing more beautiful in human life than a failed story ah and the good news is every story ultimately fails because the forms because the story is based on the forms it identifies with forms and no forms last for that long no building lasts for that long eventually it crumbles all forms are temporary and they are beautiful the essence that is hiding in each form is the formless one life that is indestructible but even this beautiful form finchon it is not eternal as a form but the eternal shines through the forms here that is why because the forms are transparent and you also are not eternal as this form and yet a transparency is happening in you even as you sit here so that that which is beyond form no matter what we call it stillness presence beingness a deep sense of I am that before got mixed up with the story of me and that the preciousness of being is your true specialness what the egoic self had been looking for on the level of the story I want to be special that very thought obscured the fact that you already could not be more special than you are now but not special in the egoic sense that more than he or more than she special in the sense that there is a beauty and preciousness that is the essence of your being and that is what deep down you can sense even the person who is most completely identified with their story and their conceptual sense of self they feel that there is somewhere there is something precious that is me but they confuse it with the forms thought forms it gets that essence of being which is formless and timeless gets mixed up with form with thought and a story in the head and that is what the Buddha calls the fictitious self the self that the Buddha even 2,600 years ago recognized as an illusion an enormous insight the greatest perhaps the greatest insight of all humanity when he recognized the self is an illusion and by that he means the self that is identified with any form thought form physical form anything and that is the illusion to lose oneself in some form and then the preciousness of being that is the essence that is timeless and formless in every human and in every life form one could say incarnates in form and there is nothing wrong with incarnating in form as long as you know yourself as that which is beyond form but if you lose yourself in the incarnation and ultimately you had to do that too that was part of the totality of how things work to lose oneself is as the Buddha called it suffering then you suffer because you you you don't know who you are anymore you're looking for yourself in some form in some thought form in some physical form that you identify with which is also a thought form me and so everybody is looking for the essence of their being not knowing that the specialness that they look for is already the essence of who they are but they can only find it when they stop looking for themselves in the future through more so the one place it's all like some strange game the one place where you truly can only find yourself in that one place most humans never look which is the present moment they look there for themselves and to feel I want to be more on the level of form you can temporarily be more that's true and then that dissolves again but there is a level within yourself where more does not operate you do not need to be more you are already a full expression of the one life you are already complete on the level of the timeless the essence of your being now the only reason why you needed time was you needed to be ready to hear this truth and recognize it as a truth for that one could say you need time to hear the message that to be who you are you don't need time but the paradox is there are still many humans to whom this would be meaningless and they don't come here they need in other words they need more time they need to continue to look for themselves and they need to continue to be frustrated in their search that is part of the larger design to be the frustration is built into human existence and so that's what the world is for the so called world it is there to frustrate you and to drive you deeper to eventually drive you out of identification with form because as long as you identify with form it is so frustrating and you can never make it you can never arrange the forms and accumulate all the forms that you need you think you need to be yourself or sometimes you can do it for very brief a very brief time span you can suddenly find everything is now working in my life my health is good my relationship is great great money got possessions everybody loves me they all write good things about me it's all working my job my living situation my finances my health my relationships they're all great but before long something there starts to crumble here and there it's either the finances or it's the relationship or it's the living situation it's in the nature of the world of form that nothing stays fixed for very long and so it starts to crumble again here you just it sorted it all out and so that's why humans they experience life as a series of frustrations why can't it work and it doesn't work because they are looking for themselves there they are demanding that the world of form should make them complete and happy I demand that this world should complete who I am should give me my sense of self I just need this and that from there and then that's all this is what I demand and then it's not happening there's something wrong here life isn't working it seems to be working for everybody else but it's not working for me I read in the magazines all these glossy people they it seems to be working for them but only if you look at the glossy pictures if you visited them at home you would see that it's not working for them either so it's built into living here is frustration it's meant to be frustrating this is the larger the whole there is a purpose but people haven't seen it so it's quite a relief to recognize first of all the world cannot make me happy to demand that situations people places or attainments should complete me or make me happy are bound to be frustrated whether I attain or do not attain okay so that looks very negative doesn't it that's and that's why when you don't go deeper when you only see the surface you see oh all is vanity as the old testament prophet said vanity of vanities all is vanity I've seen it all I can't remember the exact words but I'm giving you a free translation I've seen it all I've done it all and it's all completely meaningless that's what he said and that was probably an elderly man who had tried it all and now why did they put this into the bible isn't it very negative to have such a statement that life is completely vain whatever you can achieve is vanity they put that in there because when you see the truth of it you're already becoming free of it the seeing of the inability of the world to make you happy the seeing of the short lived nature of whatever forms you encounter in real life what is it in you that is able to see that and say ah or even laugh what before was a dreadful story and frustration you suddenly step out of your own story and see that your own frustrating story is not your personal dilemma but the human condition and you derived your sense of self from that which is nothing personal whatsoever it's the human condition and that it's the human condition in it's unconscious state it's unenlightened state and that's what gave you your sense of personal selfhood and that you wanted to cling to and now you step out of it by simply seeing it the seeing means something is arising that is not part of that unconsciousness and that is why they put it into the bible because when you see it that which can witness that in you the impermanent nature of all forms the fictitious nature of the mind made story what is it in you that is able to look at that and see ah that is not thought that is the ability to be aware and hold up the mirror of awareness and simply see it there

or let's say better the light of awareness shines on it the light of awareness shines on it and sees what before you were trapped in the frustrating story of my life and there is no life that is not ultimately frustrating it only begins it loses it's frustration when you do not look to the world anymore for your satisfaction or for yourself when you give up demanding that people places situations should make you happy and give you fulfill you you don't demand it anymore then suddenly the ability arises to allow the forms of this moment to be as they are because life at this moment already always is as it is it always the isness you cannot doubt whatever forms appear in the present moment it always is as it is and so most humans are in a conflict relationship with the isness of life they internally run away from it or reject it criticize it complain about it or look somewhere else I don't want to I don't want the isness of this I want that so when you see what the world cannot do for you you no longer you drop your demand because you see it as absurd to demand something of the world that it cannot deliver and then you can simply be with whatever is and is and this moment are always inseparable of course whatever is at this moment is as it is I don't demand that this place even if you come here and you demand that Fenton should make me happy if you came with that demand you would probably already have experienced frustration here because no place is capable of doing that for long or doing it at all and so you come here and say little things oh that shouldn't be here there's a there's a royal air force base right next to the spiritual center it doesn't make sense and so you can complain about that that shouldn't be why did they put that here they should have gone somewhere else and then you can say I came here to find peace and what do I find I find screaming jets this stuff I'm going home and that's only one thing and you'll find many more my roommate snores I can't get a night I can't I have to wait for the bathroom and it's not sunny this is late May and it's not sunny I should never have come to Scotland so if you just little examples of if you expect a place to fulfill you it can't do that in no place even if you went to a South Pacific island there would be something that is not quite right it doesn't fit there whatever it is the sunshine every day it's too much

the mosquitoes

[Speaker 1] (2:14:57 - 2:49:58)

at night they didn't I didn't know about that they didn't mention them in the travel brochures so here again a beautiful opportunity to drop the demand that a particular place should make you happy or give you peace or help you find yourself and simply then bring a yes to whatever form this moment takes instead of demanding that's the form of this moment should be different in order to satisfy me so you bring an inner alignment into your relationship with the present moment let's put it like that the way in which you relate to life which is always now only now an inner alignment comes in with now so you do not internally separate yourself from now which is life life and now are one because that is a source of great frustration and suffering and so whatever form this moment takes there's a jet flying it may be raining and then there's some sun coming through good, bad the mind could call this good could call this bad but it all is as it is at this moment and an enormous freedom comes into your life when you drop the demand that this should be other than it is and then you no longer demand that Fenton should make you happy or give you peace and then every moment or rather the one moment is as it is you go one step at a time to wherever you go and you look around and you stand and you walk and you sit and there are people coming people going things here things there and suddenly as you bring an inner alignment to the now something arises within you that has nothing to do with the form that this moment takes and it arises because you allow the form that this moment takes to be as it is so in allowing the form that this moment takes internally embracing it saying I might as well say yes because it is life because it is the only moment there ever is the now I might as well embrace it say yes that's how it is this does not diminish your ability to change if anything needs changing action arises out of the alignment with what is so you can be aligned with getting something that is not good you can have food that's gone cold or something and then you bring it back to the kitchen and you say this food is cold would you please heat it up again if it's possible nothing wrong with that but it's the action comes out of alignment the same action could arise out of an inner resistance to what is and then there's immediately self comes in a complaining self a self that enhances itself through it's complaints and then walks the same action but with a fundamentally different energy field you then walk with a plate to the kitchen and say what is this don't you know don't you heat your food here what you should be this you should be serving hot you are in this your action is to enhance yourself through it to make the self right to strengthen the fiction of me and then you do that to another human and that other human is going to defend itself and try to react in order to resist the diminishment of their sense of self because that's what the ego tends to do it says you are wrong it tries to diminish the fiction of that other person and then the other will defend itself and come up with even bigger canons and start shouting back at you in order to defend it's diminishment again the diminishment of the fiction what a world so you could live when you live in alignment with what is intelligence arises in your life that is far greater than the accumulated knowledge of the mind or the ability of the mind to analyze or solve IQ problems or crossword puzzles that sort of limit very tiny form of intelligence nothing wrong with it but it's tiny but that's what this world calls intelligence you can memorize and analyze and be quick in giving answers manipulate thoughts and keep as many thoughts as possible in your head and yet there's a far deeper intelligence that our civilization knows nothing of and that and it's that out of which all true creation comes true creativity comes and so that is accessed when you bring a yes no more than that a yes to the present moment that by the way includes the past because there are some people who carry a strong grievance or resentment connected with something that happened in the past somebody did it to you or a situation happened in the past and there's still a strong grievance that they carry and how does that work when I say accepting the present moment accepting the present moment the way it is now includes accepting the past because it is only because you believe that something that happened in the past is interfering somehow with your ability to be alive or to be yourself or to be fully yourself at this moment you're saying okay maybe you lost a limb or something like that somebody cut it off ten years ago and you carry the grievance so how does when you accept this moment as it is you accept this as it is one limb is missing that is as it is that is the form that this moment takes well and you accept that this is how it is then you don't have the reference to the past anymore as having caused that and on the level of form of course that is a disability it prevents you from winning Wimbledon this year you can't do it anymore yes on the level of form perhaps that imposed some limitation on your life but the world is full of limitations that are inherent in form if it's not one set of limitations you will encounter some other set of limitations so there's almost never a present moment that does not have certain limitations even the noise coming occasionally from the Air Force Base next door could be considered a kind of limitation or even if you can't get a good night's sleep because your roommate snores could be considered a relatively minor limitation in your life but there are large limitations and they are also to do with the world of form and that's what the world of form does you can exchange limitations you can of course improve your life on the level of form there's nothing wrong with that as long as you are not looking for yourself in it it's beautiful to play with forms in your life okay I'm going to make money now I'll play with that but not hoping that once you've made enough then you can finally be someone if you're not someone now being you cannot find it through money or through future then you can play with the world of form and the miraculous thing is when you drop your demands towards the world of form that it should make you happy then wherever you find yourself whatever situation you find yourself in whoever you meet wherever you go place situation person is actually quite satisfying because you have touched something within yourself that is deeper than the movement of thought which is form deeper than form the movement of thought is still form so the simple thing of internally bringing a yes to this moment is that all yes but it needs for you to do that requires a certain degree of presence to be able to say this is as it is instead of being taken over by an old reactive pattern governed by the fictitious self that says this doesn't fit into the story of me or how can I fit this into my this isn't completing my story in fact this shouldn't be in my story at all get out of here so many people they're walking stories often when they meet other humans they don't want to be with other humans they say get out of my story you shouldn't be in here I want somebody else in here and again so you step beyond you step out of the movement of thought and the stillness and the peace arises the moment you become friendly with what is that's all become friendly with what is no matter what form this is takes it's going to change anyway quite soon and people who are stuck for years are usually stuck because there is a resistance pattern inside them that keeps them stuck in the same situation and the resistance pattern says I want to get out of this dreadful place that I'm in and every day they go to the office and they say this is and the same energy is there the negativity and the resistance and every time they answer the phone yes and so you get some people traditionally people at government offices carry a lot of frustration I don't know if that's still true probably it's everywhere these days and so you people are continuously and they say why am I stuck in this boring job with all these dreadful people they always want something from me and 25 years later they're still stuck and complaining and then they hear the message it is possible to live differently it is possible to say yes not to not say yes to a story not say yes to okay I might as well accept that I've spent 25 years in this dreadful office and I'm probably going to spend another 10 years in this dreadful office I might as well say yes to that because I read that in a book somewhere no this has nothing to do this has nothing to do with bringing a yes to some kind of story about your life or if you were in prison to say okay I might as well accept that everything has failed in my life and I've been in here for 20 years and I've got to do another 15 years and I might as well accept that I've been a miserable failure nothing saying yes to the present moment only means the present moment not a story it means it takes you out of the story and that is vital in your spiritual life now as a spiritual practice as often as possible to break the continuity between past and future okay I'm coming from there and I'm going there I'm just busy trying to get there and getting this done I'm on my way there don't stop me now and break okay but what about this moment where are you at this moment this moment oh and suddenly you wake up out of that stream of past future that was pulled you from past to future always that is old conditioning same old thing same old thing no matter how much you complain the more you complain the more you're stuck and suddenly you take the present moment out of the story and you and you ah you wake up and suddenly alertness comes for example you might hear the birds singing oh and you realize it's beautiful and you feel yourself breathing and you feel an aliveness in the body every cell is alive the life that you are that which animates the body and you as you feel that aliveness you're also aware that there's a stillness around you and in that stillness there's this incredibly beautiful sound that this little being produces which is a celebration of life every moment you've stepped out of the story into the aliveness of the present moment and yet you can still deal with things you may still be walking wherever you have to go and when you arrive there you're there and confront another human being you can still be present so there's more and more presence rather than time it's reversing whereas before you were dominated by time now you use time still but allow presence in which means break the story as much as often as you can step out of into the aliveness of this moment and then a far greater intelligence comes in and love and joy all the things that otherwise you can only think about but never experience all those things suddenly come in and transform even the story not that the story is ever going to be continuously wonderful in the level of form forms always come and go but because you're not dependent anymore on the forms of your life the circumstances of your life you have access to the life that is beyond form that is you the stillness the aliveness the I am that is deeper than I am this or I am that and then all those all the beauty and aliveness and joy that is there in the moment even if the forms were crumbling it can be there you would be missing the whole thing because you would be drifting continuously adrift in the mind only and the bird you would not even hear it or hear it for a moment and say oh that's pretty and then ok my problems what are my problems whenever you think you have problems a good question is what is the problem now well well I'm trying to see my lawyer about this thing and there's a bank I'm going bankrupt and I'm seeing my lawyer about what is the problem now what is the problem what is the problem there's no problem I'm sitting here breathing beautiful birds sing birdsong stillness space there's an aliveness that I feel inside every cell is alive there isn't really a problem now but there may be one tomorrow and of course when tomorrow comes you have to ask the same question what is the problem now as you sit in front of the lawyer I say sign here to declare your bankruptcy you say ok what is the problem now here's a piece of paper and here's a pen scratching on a piece of paper and then you put it down and you listen to the bird and see the tree and the flower and the aliveness within and say I'm still alive so you don't need the idea I am a bankrupt person to give you your sense of self anymore because your sense of self comes from the life that you are the aliveness of your very being and then yes on the level of form it happens that I had to declare bankruptcy I'm still breathing and the bird is still singing and a million people before me have survived that and this is just one example a more extreme example a friend of mine Byron Katie a spiritual teacher was visiting a woman in hospital who had advanced cancer and she came into her room hospital room and the woman was of course very unhappy and Byron Katie said to her I don't see a problem and the woman got even more unhappy and she said you don't see a problem I'll show you a problem and she took off her blanket and showed her right leg was two or three times the size of her left leg this is a problem and Byron Katie said oh so your problem is that you think your right leg should be the same size as your left leg and in that moment the woman laughed for the first time in a long time she laughed because she dissociated from the thought form she stepped out of thought which judged this form as wrong which judged the present moment as wrong should not be it was she was trapped in the thought form this should not be invested with a sense of self and so the stepping out is vital for you the story has a momentum that will reassert itself again and again because that is the momentum of the mind and I'm not saying that you no longer deal with things in your daily life you deal with them much more effectively when you have access to the deeper dimension where true intelligence resides that can then flow even into the way in which you deal with things on the level of form so even on the level of your story the story will unfold more harmoniously when you no longer demand that it should make you happy or do anything for you then you can truly honour this level of form because the neediness is gone because you are not looking to it anymore to give you a sense of who you are because who you are comes out of the aliveness and depth of this moment and so to step out of the story and into this moment as much as you can it's vital always, ok just a second why is it now especially when you get upset you lose yourself in some thought movement or you can help others if you have an agreement with your partner or friend and when you can see that they are not losing themselves in thought which almost certainly is going to be a world of problems it's not that they are solving problems by thinking they are creating problems by thinking to solve the true solutions always come when you for a moment you step out of thinking and become truly intelligent by becoming still and present and alive and then if thought should come back often a little later you suddenly have a creative insight that before wasn't there it came because that dimension operated in your life and then it comes more and more and then everything changes your relationships change because you don't demand that the other person should do something for me make enhance my sense of self you don't compare yourself to others and try to be more than another to strengthen your sense of self it's fine to allow everyone to be as they are and you don't need to change them to say you should behave differently and then I'll be happy if you behave differently you will make me happy but in the meantime I'm going to be very unhappy and I'm going to show you that I'm unhappy so that you behave differently and then finally make me happy and many relationships work like that the partners show each other they're very unhappy because they want to change in their behavior and of course by their unhappiness they strengthen the same pattern and so especially in this beautiful place here don't pollute the garden of Fintan and be a walking story here that is heavy your steps become heavy and where a walking story steps no grass grows and so humanity has that that is collectively how humanity is on the planet now a great heaviness has descended on the planet and that is the collective human mind with its accumulated enormous amount of negativity and dreadful delusion and that's the heaviness that weighs heavily on nature also and life forms all life forms feel that pain so here step lightly don't carry the burden of personal selfhood around with you which is your past and your problematic future but be light as take one step at a time and be the presence through which you perceive be there with every step and when you perceive the tree the flower you are able to perceive against the background of stillness so you are not creating a barrier of concepts between nature and yourself a oneness a field of oneness arises between nature and yourself and then nature will be extremely helpful it's teaching you to be one with life to be still just go to any tree and see how still it is and the moment you notice how still and alive and surrendered to life the tree is that in you which notices that is the stillness otherwise you wouldn't even see that there's stillness there if you approach it only with thought you would have some kind of personal thing to do with nature oh that tree that would be great in my garden and don't feel guilty if that thought crossed your mind or even more the wanting to pick a flower don't do it here but you know also why I must have that it's mine now even on that level the personal self can come in or it comes in oh that that looks like a tree that my aunt Mary had ten years ago in her garden I wonder if it's still there she was a strange person wasn't she but to be truly present there as a field of aware presence walking and then it may happen that in addition to the beauty that you see around you and give give walk sometimes and be with give some attention to perhaps a tree or flower for a little while just be with it without no wanting nothing just being with it and then you may notice there's the form you may notice in the background the presence that you are the light of consciousness in which this tree appears the presence the stillness that you are as a background to whatever you perceive birdsong trees flowers different noises in nature and so there's the that which appears the form and that which is the space that enables this form to appear which is the space of yourself the space of now the space of consciousness the one consciousness the light of consciousness in which forms forms appear so that is and even here as you sit here you can sense that in the foreground there's this room there's the voice the shapes and colours and yet what is it that makes all this possible to be the being being itself before it becomes something that is the one life the one consciousness that you are underneath the form so you are in two dimensions one could say at the same time the formless and form there's the and this is your practice in nature nature is not challenging it doesn't you can stay present easily with a tree or flower human beings are more challenging and so they pull you quickly into identification again with form with thought reaction because most humans still come from thought and they are thought entities and they want you to contribute to their universe and they say give me more thought confirm to me that my story is important and then you can tell me yours and I'll do the same for you and in bed tonight as you lie there you may find the mind wanting to drag you along with it again and think about okay there's only one more day or whatever it is one more day or three more days or four more days left here and then I have to think about the things that are waiting for me when I get home let me think about my problems now and then you suddenly remember ah the now all there ever is this moment where is it of course you can't see it but sometimes it happens that you wake up your sense perception suddenly wake up

ah

and then you feel the aliveness in the body and you can lie on your bed feeling the aliveness within it permeates the body yes this life it's subtle but it's there and then the need to think lessens and you can just be a field of aware presence and perhaps you can listen to certain noises that you hear from nature and if it's your roommate snoring that's fine too that's what is and be and if you have to remove yourself from that room that's fine or if you throw something at him or her you can do that too your ability to do things is not diminished when you live in surrender all it means I surrender to what is I could try let's see if he wakes up if I throw something at him ok still snoring and you see that things that before would have created frustration and upset and anger and there's so many that happen in a person's life all those things that before would have created that now are simply part of the is-ness of this moment and suddenly you have a space around it ok and that space is the space of presence and so and then you get to know yourself as the spaciousness around things so to speak not the thing you are that which allows the thing to be and then to disappear and then something else to come that's the now that's the deeper meaning of now is the space in which everything happens and so the now and yourself are one and the power of now of course is the power of life of the very being that you are and when I say yourself of course I don't mean the fictitious self of the story that is form based and thought based but the deeper being that you are being itself freedom from the world ultimately and then the world becomes a very pleasant place not frustrating anymore things still come and go gain and loss happen birth and death continuously happen and that's how it is and there is an underlying peace and that peace is inseparable from who you are that's our practice this weekend and that's the way we can live our life which isn't really our life at all which is simply life living us life living through us we don't have a life because then there is me and life not possible we are life the one life in many forms that are born and die continuously the one consciousness the one life and so life can then live freely through you and it can flower and that flowering may take form also as a creation or it may remain simply as an emanation that comes through this form and that emanation one could call love not the egoic love that says I want you you stay here I need you and I want you or it says make me happy sign here on the dotted line but the true love the love that is a recognition of oneness as an emanation that's the flowering I suggest you stay for a little while until you feel ready to move stay with the stillness that is here the sacred field the sacred sacred space until it's time to move thank you the bird is teaching much better than I could I'm sure they got it wrong when they say that Saint Francis was preaching to the birds of course he was listening to the birds they don't need preaching to such a divine sound and such a wonderful exquisite balance between stillness and sound that bird knows about balance there's always quite a long gap and then the next sound comes out of the stillness and it's always fresh and new it's never a repetition of the previous sound with this bird this is why it's so amazing and that would be enough if you had that around as your teacher what else do you need the bird is teaching the balance between form and formless that's the art of living to live in both dimensions sound and stillness form and formless things and nothingness in this teaching the dimension of stillness of the formless is emphasized because the entire civilization is lost in form in things in objects in thoughts the entire civilization is lost in that dimension of things that includes thoughts and that's why there is a particular emphasis in this teaching on that which is missing balance needs to reestablish itself because no civilization can survive without the balance between form and formless now everybody has form already more than enough that's why this teaching isn't based on knowledge or new facts interesting facts new information information because the world is full of that I mean you just any you can push any button of the many devices that you have and you get information and you're drowning in information and ultimately you see it's what is the point of it all if that's just more of that is that going to save the world more information or more things are we going to find the fullness of life through more things and greater and bigger shopping malls again form or are we going to find ourselves through improving our ability to think and analyze and solve problems analytically that were created by excessive thinking in the first place or as Carl Jung put it you cannot solve a problem on the same level of consciousness that created the problem and so what created the problem of our civilization is that humans lost touch with the formless dimension which we could also call spirit which we could call the sacred which we could call if that word were not had not been misused so much we could call God but we won't call it that and Jesus said what does it profit you if you gain the whole world and lose yourself or your soul that's really he could already see the tendency where things were going and form also includes time so we cannot deny that time has or seems to be real on the surface of life because it's everywhere as far as forms are concerned time seems to do something to the forms the life forms and it's strange it gradually grinds the forms down it erodes the forms it does something then you could some people have even looked upon time as some dreadful illness that inflicts everybody and that's one way of looking at it everybody is suffering from a lethal disease the outcome is the end of the form it's just a question of when and so you see it as my father says who is 87 now he says mirrors are not the same quality they used to be so the art is to live in this world where time seems on the one hand to be everywhere and control everything but where on the other hand time is also recognized as ultimately an illusion because if you look more deeply there is nothing there is no time there's only ever this moment and therefore that is the portal into the formless dimension it's the the narrow gate that Jesus talks about that leads to life the narrow gate that leads to life yes it's very narrow it's only this to find it and Jesus says there are not many who find it to find it you need to roll up the scroll of your life from which your story is written past future very unclear you can't quite figure out what's at all above and you roll up people usually live carrying a burden some more than others but every carrying the burden of past me my history and how I'm hoping or fearing it's going on going which way it's going hope fear so you have this okay you're walking with myself that's the self the form based mind based time based self and that has a heaviness to it and the more you carry of time of past and future and think about it and talk about it and refer to as your sense of identity gives you your sense of self things that happened in the past and future hoping to find yourself we talked about it

then you're lost in form because all these are thought forms time and form go together so you need to roll up you know these old scrolls you had to roll them they were before they were books you had scrolls you rolled them you can there's a beautiful story of a vision that the woman who wrote or wrote the course in miracles that came to her as an inner voice before the whole dictation started she had a vision in which she found a scroll in an old box a very ancient scroll and as she started to unfold unroll the scroll she saw symbols on the left and other symbols on the right and she heard a voice saying if you read what's on the left you know the past and if you read what is on the right you'll know the future and she looked to the left and the right and then she rolled it back to the central panel on which was written God is and she said this is all that I'm interested in I don't want anything else that's all I want God is and then the same voice that had explained to her that is past and that is future said congratulations you made it this time so her focal point had become the present moment if her focal point had not become the present moment the spaciousness that was necessary for the wisdom to come through her out of the formless it was then given form by her mind but the spaciousness would not have been there if she had said okay that's interesting let's see I'm going to look at the future and then years later she would still be looking at the oh wow and the past is interesting too and God is the isness of now just that and this is you can use that as an image for your own life as much as possible be interested in this and that is what we called getting out of the stream of the continuity between past and future as often as possible break that make space as if you had a veil and you say this is the veil of my life in which things are written this is a fabric and then you go in there and separate it ah and then you put your head through into another dimension the way you see it in some of these films of magic and that is ah the awakening into now and as we are all we are transitional humans at this evolutionary stage for humanity many humans alive now are transitional beings and they are dysfunctional as their manifestations of the old consciousness they are becoming more and more dysfunctional because the old consciousness that is totally identified with mind form and time that's been running human history for thousands of years is reaching the end of its lifespan it cannot survive much longer and so every human being carries the old also still inside and many humans and certainly those present here and many others are transitional beings in the sense that the old still has a momentum within them as the new is arising i call it new because ultimately it's timeless it's not new it's there's no time at all but it's let's say as i saw the name of one second hand shop was called new to you so no words can any really express ever express the exact truth you have to be allow for the fact that language is never quite right and especially is never quite right when you begin to speak of spiritual truth the formless because every word is form and ultimately can only function by expressing reflecting something in the world of form and then it becomes difficult when the language is used to express something that is beyond form and that's why jesus used parables and he never said this is the kingdom of heaven he said the kingdom of heaven is like or is a little bit like that or like that and he gives you little stories and then the form of the words as long as you don't get entangled in the words and say oh this is how it is if you allow the words to be pointers little signposts then it can work but if you say there's the truth it's not the truth the truth is not in the word and especially in spiritual discourse the truth is that to which the word points so you have to look beyond the words especially here and so we learn to bring a balance into our lives between time and timelessness between the world of things handling that situations things objects and not getting lost in things in the world of things in the world of situations in the world in the world not losing yourself in the world and that world includes not only the external world but also the world that you carry as the mind made world in the head because that one creates that one the human made world the so called external human made world and the inner state of consciousness of course one continuum the inner the outer only reflects the inner and so on the outer level for example we have a civilization that is extraordinarily noisy if somebody came from some past civilization even two hundred years back thousand years back and would arrive here in a city or even in a small town they would say what is going on this deafening noise everywhere and these the machines everywhere that make noise have I arrived in the hell realm and if they don't if they don't have the noises that are produced by machines they have to make noise just to for the sake of noise a lot of there is some good music but a lot of so called music that you hear in restaurants I don't know if it is the same here in North America hard to find a restaurant without loud music you just open the door and put your head in and you go out again and a lot of that is for the sake of making noise it is called music there are some exceptions of course some music can have a divine function too in some rare cases it still has music that comes out of the stillness that when you listen to music that came out of the stillness whoever created it or whoever is playing it or singing it it comes out of that state of consciousness and whatever then it assumes a form and yet the form has is fresh and new it has come out of that and the stillness still clings to it as a fragrance it still emanates that even if it's sound and that's the beauty of all art true art it reflects still that state of consciousness out of it it comes and then you have a lot of pseudo art in this world where clever minds are trying to be even more clever and think let's think of something new what can we do here let's oh maybe we could do that here or that could go there that would look clever and then okay oh no let's do and then you get they call it art but it's not it lacks something it's totally trapped in form there's only manipulating old forms nothing new has come in and nothing that can lead you back to the formless which is the original reason for all art is to it's the sacred to be a portal an access point for the sacred so that when you see it or experience it you experience yourself you find in it you see yourself reflected the formless reflected shining through the form that is why it's what is true art always there is more than what you see or hear it's not just what you see or hear there is more than that and that shines through the form and that is what can happen to you what is happening to you ultimately it's not everybody's purpose to create works of art a few humans do that that is their function partly in this world but much more importantly is for you to become that work of art your whole life and your very being becomes transparent so that the formless can shine through and that happens when you are no longer totally identified with the world of form and that happens when you have access to the realm of stillness within yourself and then something emanates through the form that is not nothing to do with the form it may emanate only as a silent emanation and not assume any form as such and so that is sometimes the case with so called there have been very few in the past holy people who simply in India they've always existed in any generation in India there have always been a few holy men or women who never did anything and that's very rare for the west they say what did they create what did they do and they never did anything they just sat there and the west says what a useless existence come on get a life do a get a job and some even because people when you are trapped in form you miss perceive it completely because all you see there is a useless form sitting and they say they are parasites on society they allow themselves to be fed by other people they bring them their food they should work for a living like myself and that is when the mind that knows nothing but form looks at the form it will totally misperceive it and so that's the beauty that in India they always recognized that because they haven't completely lost touch in fact they may have gone at some point too far in the opposite direction so that they lost interest in form because they went into being more now India is becoming western you read about India you move to other they're all into computers these days and cell phones and that's fine too but the question is where is finding a balance I was totally lost in like most people completely lost in form and then a shift happened and I lost the balance and I became completely lost in the formless we can't really be lost in the formless it's just a way of putting it because the formless is essentially who you are and yet from a normal perspective it looked as if I had lost it because there was somebody who had a promising career and suddenly just sits around on park benches not doing anything anymore just being and tasting continuously the sweetness of being of simply the beauty the sweetness of being alive the joy of simply being and then looking upon the world and seeing it reflected in all life forms reflected the joy of being in the trees and the birds and even the humans running around like mad and knowing that deep down there there's also the very same being and it's beautiful and so from an external perspective the ability to handle forms was gone to manipulate the world of form was gone for a while and then gradually had to reestablish itself so I could do again and of course be at the same time and that is the it is not the destiny of each one of you to move so deeply into being that you no longer capable of handling the world of form around you that happens occasionally but it tends to happen more to those people who those few who experience a dramatic shift from one to the other and then for a while they're gone that's of course the beautiful the beautiful sutra of Buddha gate gate gone gone gone to the farthest shore and yet it seems it is our destiny here while we are still in form to balance form and formulas here and that's why we are here and for most of you the transition to a news and what is the new state of consciousness that's arising it is the state that is balanced the two dimensions the manifested and the unmanifested balanced in a human being and that is such a radical transformation that when a certain number of humans live in that way so they become what before was a work of art you become the work of art you become that which is transparent to the formulas the divine and then that will change the entire world the way what you experience as the man human made world will be changed completely it is not necessary to speculate now what is the world going to look like when enough humans live in the new consciousness that's not important now the important thing is for us to enter that new state and then what that does to your story who knows how that changes the story the way in which your life unfolds in time what you do out here how that affects where you live what you do and so on you cannot predict nor do you need to predict that are you going to become a great artist are you going to win Wimbledon are you and of course bear in mind that great artists and the tennis players they are not enlightened masters they have access to that which is greater than the limited human mind in the small field of their activity and most of them when they go back into normal life away from there where they have mastery they are just as mad as everybody else and sometimes even more mad because sometimes the mind made entity gets in there and looks at what they did and says I did that that was me the greatest illusion and then of course it feels very special the ego then derives its it identifies with whatever came out of the state of no ego and says I did that and then begins to believe what other people are saying about you and that you are the greatest because they all they project their images of specialness onto you and then oh the great pop star whatever and the and the the great pop stars also they have the when they compose their songs or some of them where there is there's even a glimpse of aliveness and freshness yes there's something there and then the the personality the person the person comes back the moment they step back from the act of creation or the performance they step back and there's the old personality and sometimes it's a dreadful burden for some ability that comes from the non-personal realm to be integrated into the person and they just can't

it's totally misperceived just as the world misperceives it and then they believe themselves to be very special and there comes a huge conflict between power that comes out of the formless and the limited person that misinterprets it and claims something out of that and the magic that comes from the formless realm into your life is what when you look at our civilization it seems to be gone completely because the civilization is almost totally not sacred it is profane it is a dreary burdensome structure that humans have created when you look at the mainstream civilization it's and so so many humans no matter what country you go to are they seem to be tired they are weary there's a there's a weariness that they carry and the civilization is grinding them down another day of dreary activity of pointless running around and even those who are still running around they know deep down it's pointless what is the point and you ask the big direct executives in companies where are you going why are you running around like mad and they can't give you an answer except that well we are expanding the organization is expanding we are swallowing up other organizations and that's our reason for being is to to grow to get bigger it's to accumulate more and so it's all this is why we are and it's totally meaningless activity and so there are many reasons why the entire civilization is reaching a point of collapse and one is that the humans who are still sustaining it they can't carry the burden of their self created structures anymore the over complicated world absurd complexity for the sake of complexity that they have created and they cannot carry their own burden of their own creation anymore mind created just a reflection of their state of consciousness in which there is no gap in the stream of one form after another one thought after another the voice in the head that never stops speaking becomes a civilization that is obsessed with form that is obsessed with things and therefore knows nothing of that which you could say is the most important dimension of human existence the sacred the stillness the formless the divine all these have become meaningless in our civilization and yet many humans are beginning to realize what's happening and so there is in many a search for something else and that number of humans is growing every day and that's the beauty of it so each one of us here is part of the transformation of consciousness that's happening on the planet it's not going to happen it is happening if it were not happening you could not even sit here it would be intolerable to sit here and yet there may be something in you that's the old consciousness that doesn't want to be here you may occasionally feel that arises there's something that doesn't even understand what is being said that hears only the sound of the words it can't go to where the words point so you get stuck with the form the sound stuck with the thought and there's presence stillness stillness well you haven't actually explained what you mean by stillness so this is a good example where the word is only the pointer and then you have to jump off the word stillness points to stillness it's not something to be believed in and the stillness of course is already in you it is not something that we need to create here we need to bring about by being doing the right things and then eventually we'll become still follow a certain course of a recipe if you do a b c and d you will finally become still that's very seductive but you have given yourself something to do before you can be still which means before you can find yourself and be yourself that is the problem of every method every spiritual method not that I would outright condemn all methods but the danger with any method is that it gives you it gives you time it says okay you will arrive and find yourself why not find yourself already why create something between yourself and yourself so the stillness that is already at this moment in you fully fully the stillness out of which the thoughts come every thought comes out and then goes back in sense perceptions get you a little closer to it when you perceive and do not label it whatever you perceive you just let it be then there is the perception the form and there is the one could almost say that this is a limited analogy no analogies are that great but you can say there is the canvas on which the perception is painted there is a background of spacious stillness that's yourself that's the consciousness that you are formless not the conditioned consciousness that is the forms in your mind thoughts they are there too but simply being able to sense that which underlies whatever you perceive or think or feel Gurdjieff put it the Russian teacher who lived at the beginning of the 20th century put it like he called it self-remembrance and of course that can be misinterpreted as if you had to think about ok let me remember who I am my name is such and such no he meant to remember not even to remember words are never right to know the knower to know who knows this who in a dream let's say you dream and then you wake up and say it was only a dream it was unreal of course it wasn't totally unreal because something within the forms that arose in the dream must have been there to enable these forms to exist there must have been a consciousness in which this dream unfolded and so in other words there must have been a dreamer of the dream as the consciousness in which it happened and that is the timeless and formless dimension without which forms would not exist and so our normal existence is very much like a dream because just like a dream everything dissolves fairly quickly every situation everything is and even the seemingly solid reality that surrounds us is not really that solid first of all it's there's nothing solid it just appears solid it's just energy fields in motion and they're not going to remain in that form for very long if you could look more deeply you could see everything is already dissolving it's a temporary it comes into form and dissolves the bodies that are sitting here are already dissolving even this table if we look in 200 years it'll still look more or less the same but if we could speed up on camera what happens to this room of a period of 3000 years which is very little on a global scale then you would see that even all seemingly solid objects are crumbling within one minute you would see everything becoming dust and then disappearing and it would be a shocking and liberating thing to watch a film like that that shows you what is actually happening to the seemingly solid world around you and deep down that is a it's a liberating thing when you see how short-lived every form is because what is it in you that sees that the short-lived nature of all forms and you witness that that is the aware presence from the stillness you see that and actually you become more still the more you see how short-lived every form is and you don't run away from that fact just stay with let's see how death how important it is to face death in your life which is everywhere which is what our civilization is trying to hide continuously there is no death don't don't never look at a dead body because that's this just isn't done so there are people who have never seen a dead body and you certainly if it's not a close relative you would not be able to see a dead body because the civilization needs to hide death because it's the most threatening thing to somebody who is totally identified with the world of form death is the most dreadful thing and you must not think about it or talk about it and so whenever you are faced with death there is and even just watching it and when the table dissolves that's death too if you saw it over a period of three thousand years and saw it crumbling within a minute the entire room and everything in it goes or you would see a human being being born somebody showed me a clip apparently it was from an ad from some country it takes one minute a baby is coming out of the womb and shoots out like a cannonball into the sky and screams all the time but as the baby travels up into the sky it already begins to grow and grows and goes higher and higher and finally reaches full maturity and then starts going downhill and is still screaming and the closer and then becoming an old man as he approaches the ground hair is falling out and finally the last scream and he lands in the grave and it says underneath life is short now whether the people who made that film knew that they were making a spiritual film I think I don't know I think they were selling beer or something like that but that is deeply spiritual when you see how quickly everything dissolves and you don't run away from that fact and this that again what I mentioned yesterday the Old Testament prophet who said vanity of vanities all is vanity to see that is liberating because this now if everything were permanent it's the same as saying if the entire world were blue there would be no blue because you couldn't differentiate it the color blue wouldn't exist now if everything were impermanent you wouldn't even know it because you only know it if there's something that's different so I just give you this to consider and not to think about to consider there's something in you that recognizes the impermanent nature of all life forms and that is the formless and the more you realize the impermanence of all forms the more the form you're aware of the formless in yourself but you and the formless are ultimately one so when you say you are aware of the formless we're already making a little mistake that's created by language what we what it really is that you you are more fully yourself you are more aware of yourself not as two but as one you become more self-aware awareness becomes aware of itself and there was a question here written by somebody who probably doesn't like public speaking just this later we may have some more questions in the now sometimes I'm aware of expanding what is this it seems to be awareness itself if I am aware of awareness duality which am I good question I am aware this is what it seems like when we talk about it but that's not how it is it's only when we put it into language we formulate a sentence which has a subject and an object but really when you become aware of awareness which really is the secret to a balanced human life to become aware of awareness and then also the forms but what does that mean who is becoming aware of awareness the language that we use here creates the illusion of duality so it would be much better if we rephrase that and we say the awareness that I am becomes aware of itself no duality the awareness that is the essence of who I am becomes aware of itself and that is a miraculous beautiful incredible thing what traditionally has been called self-realization becoming aware awareness becoming aware of itself as simple stillness but every word reduces it again to something that is far greater and of course there is a sense of expansion because you are no longer trapped as the questioner mentions expanding you are no longer trapped your consciousness is no longer trapped in the form that's the incarnation the incarnation of consciousness into form and the realization of consciousness as the formless and so some spiritual traditions speak of reincarnating many times and you say you reincarnate again and again until you wake up until you realize who you are beyond form and that is true you are born again and again but I want to make it not as something that I want you to believe in but to make it true in your experience and to make it true in your experience all you need to look at is today how you reincarnate today now how does that happen how do I reincarnate today I thought it just happens once in a lifetime you know the sticker that the born again Christians have on their cars says born again Christians and the Buddhists have on their car born again and again and again how do you reincarnate today and how many times do you reincarnate today every time you lose you lose yourself in a thought or an emotion or something that happens out there which also of course you experience as thought and emotion let's say you lose yourself in a situation says this is important you must deal with this ok what's going on here let's deal with and then you lose yourself in the reactive pattern and in the mental interpretation oh this is awful you must do something oh let's do oh oh whatever it is you identify with a form every thought that arises in your mind that grips you completely there's a sense of self in it it's unconscious of course your sense of self means your sense of identity gets mixed up with the form of that thought or the emotion and so you're completely incarnated in the in the form that arises in your life and so humans go through life not knowing not realizing that every day they reincarnate many times they lose themselves continuously in forms they react to the forms and they're totally in the reaction there is not an awareness in the background of ok this is what's going on so there's no space there's only form there's no stillness there's only noise and that means being compulsively reincarnate reincarnating every day many times and even while you sit alone in your room and you start thinking about oh oh oh oh oh oh oh if you were talking out aloud the voice in your head that you identify with everybody would recognize it as insane but then on the other hand I don't know then what if I do that I wonder what happens if I go what oh that would be dreadful if that happens I just hope that the oh no I hadn't thought of that before and you reincarnate continuously into some new thought form and so of course that's why Buddhists talk about coming to the end of reincarnation simply means not losing yourself in form again and again and again and it doesn't mean you reject all forms some spiritual traditions go a little bit far in their attempt to find the formless dimension they say don't even look at anything beautiful because it's not going to be around for very long it's all dissolving already don't even look at the flower certainly don't they tell the monks never look at a beautiful woman you must not look and so they go because you would reincarnate in many ways you lose yourself in the attraction and that's dangerous so a monk mustn't even he can't hand a woman something because it's dangerous he has to he puts it on the table and she picks it up because otherwise there could be some indirect contact now the idea behind it may be a good one that you mustn't lose yourself in form and yet to reject the world of form is perhaps again losing balance again in the other direction say okay all beauty is dust because whatever I look upon is already dissolving the flower that looks beautiful today tomorrow will be gone with it and so in some traditions the entire world of form is rejected completely now occasionally that seems to work mostly it doesn't but here and there some people realize this even within that tradition but that probably doesn't have anything to do with the tradition they would have realized even if they were sitting in an office they were ready so it is always problematic if that which is a natural process of disidentification is forced into an artificially created structure it may work it works if there is a human being there who can who embodies the two dimensions who embodies the awakened state then it can work in many cases there is no human being there is only the tradition and then usually it doesn't get you there so the form not rejecting forms outright I work with to see that in every form something is hiding that is one with the essence of who you are and it is not just something you can think about it is if you anything that you look upon and you are still enough or listen to the bird whatever it may be anything that you can be with in stillness so that you sense yourself as the still space in which that object or that being is perceived then you sense that that essence that you know sense yourself to be is also there in that being and even in inanimate objects even a table has being has presence some people need to take acid for the first time to realize that the table is alive too but this is not what I recommend here all you need to be is present with it and truly be alert and still and then look the moment you call it table you are under the illusion that now you know what it is you don't know at all it is a mystery it remains totally unknown and mysterious just because you put a label on it doesn't mean now you know you just have a thought in your head or a sound comes out of your mouth and you say that's what it is and then you cannot go deeper into it because you get stuck at the label you hit the label and then you are stuck oh that's a table ok what's the next thing you never can go deeper into anything you only hit one label after another ok and therefore it's always a search ok because you only hit the surface of things you always then immediately the mind says ok I've done that I know what that is where is the next thing there is this continuous looking for the next thing because you can never stay with one thing where the depth that is in everything reveals itself to you and that's the restlessness of our civilization that always asks what's next what's next and you already see even in relatively young children these days that continuous need for the new stimulus they can't sit still for a moment they just ok because they are used they are addicted to the next thing some new mental stimulus because they live in a civilization that is totally on the only on the surface of things like completely in depth so now you can bring in depth even into your perceptions of things perception is much closer to the unmanifested or to being than thought thought is far removed it's an abstract you get when you for many people to become present when they realize oh I'm lost I'm lost I'm lost in some problem some world of problems where's the problem now and they wake up and the first thing they notice is sense perceptions around them and they hadn't been aware of that at all because all their attention was in the thoughts and suddenly they look at the floor their hand the table the light

[Speaker 1] (4:01:03 - 4:15:30)

and in the looking there's a stillness in fact there is the strange thing is you cannot even look at anything without stillness because even the person who labels things compulsively which is almost everybody there's always a moment when they first let's just talk for a moment about the visual sense but it includes all sense perceptions there's always a first moment when you first look at something a tree a flower a table anything there is a one second or so in which there is stillness and then the mind interprets it or labels it but if you can catch yourself when you first look at something there is a brief moment of non-labeling otherwise you wouldn't even see it and then it recedes almost one could say the sense perception immediately loses its sharpness and aliveness because after one or two seconds the mental label replaces the aliveness that was there dead and then you look at the next thing or you listen to a bird and there is a moment of pure listening and then after two seconds the mind says something oh that must be a black bird or what's the name of I can't remember gone or whatever the mind says about it so if you can catch yourself whenever something new enters your awareness whether it's auditory or visual tactile smelling tasting even relatively undeveloped senses from contemporary humans there you can be there and be conscious of that first moment when there is no labeling there is the stillness and the aliveness and if you become conscious of that you may find that it becomes longer you don't need to automatically label it and so the stillness that is the background to sense perceptions becomes faster it's always fast but you didn't know it and so that is how another way in which the stillness in you expands so to speak everything is so to speak about stillness the stillness in you expands and then more and more you move about your life not just when you are passive passively perceiving but also bringing it into activity that that state of consciousness so to speak that is stillness flows into often also into what you do so that you notice it's you can actually do things better with if they are done in a state of still presence than if you are thinking what you want to achieve through this movement where you want to get to in the next moment no you're just present with so there's a stillness to what you perceive and there's a stillness that flows into the action and the action may be simple walking across the room opening a window turning on the tap feeling the water listening to the water looking out of the window in the morning you open the curtains and why it's simply a deep seated habit to immediately call this day something and say oh no not another grey day no just let it be and then there's immediately a depth to everything that wasn't there when you didn't you bring in this so called new consciousness into everyday situations and you break the continuity of the story then intelligence comes in more and more also love because the only way love can come into your life is through space not through form love has no form and again in the egoic state love gets entangled in form so you think you need only this form you love not realising that true love is the recognition of the formless in the other which is the recognition of yourself in the other and that is inseparable from looking upon the other in stillness without a form arising and saying this is who she is or what she is and if forms still arise in your mind recognise it's only a thought it's not who that human being is and then what beauty if you can recognise the formless in form and first you can recognise it in natural things very easily much more easily because natural things are less challenging than humans humans are were natural once but now they have become whatever the world of nature you approach first of all and relate through stillness and presence more and more and then gradually you bring it into human relationships easy with humans you meet for the first time let them be and as you listening vital to be able to listen to another human it doesn't mean that the words all your attention is on the words when you listen we are only listening almost as an analogy there is a field of attention of still attention that flows out towards that human being one could say you give him or her space and then that person may be speaking words arise in the space but you are there as the spaciousness that allows words to come you are there as a field of aware presence and then words may come out of your mouth suddenly and that is very different from so called normal human interaction that is all completely mind dominated to be still with another human being while you listen and sense yourself as the awareness while you listen so some of your attention is on the words and some of your attention is now with challenging humans get into your body so that you can be present with your entire energy field every cell of the body is present as you listen then you are because humans can be very challenging they want because they are dominated by mind they want you to contribute to their mental structures the drama whatever it is their pain body may be active everybody here probably knows about pain body which is another way of identifying with form the old emotion that arises slight trigger triggers pain body a pain body episode pain body being the old stored up emotion from the past human suffering human pain that hasn't gone away that is partly personal and partly collective humanity ultimately in a larger sense it's all just human pain it's not ultimately personal at all and that is a little entity energetic entity that lives in you sometimes dormant and sometimes active and sometimes half dormant half asleep with one eye open waiting for an opportunity I'm just for a trigger so that it can come up and the trigger could be your remark your partner makes are you accusing me of being no I didn't say that yes you did and then we start the drama that awakens the partner's pain body and that's supposed to happen they feed each other totally you totally reincarnate into old pain you live it it lives through you not knowing that you are going through another reincarnation and you may be a Buddhist and having thoughts in your head that you want to arrive at the end of the cycle of reincarnations and that some abstract edifice in your mind and you don't know that while you are fighting with your wife you are reincarnating at this very moment I must get back to my meditation I don't meditate an hour a day I'll have to reincarnate again and again and again while you're doing it now oh so this is one of the most frequent ways in which people reincarnate is to into the old emotion that wants to feed on the experience of more pain and it pretends to be you you identify with it it occupies your entire space and you feed on the other person's reaction and you love it not when I say you I mean the pain body at that moment there's a mistaking you the pain body for who you are that's reincarnation and then finally it subsides and then the next episode will be in a week's time just like the soap operas or it will feed on your mind if you have no partner it will feed on your thinking how dreadful my life is what he did to me she did to me they did to me the world politicians people whatever the mind can think of that's a negative thought the pain body loves it that is the the pain body is the addiction to negativity that humans carry and it's a little entity an energy form and all that is required is for you to see to recognize it then you don't reincarnate into it anymore and even if you were reincarnated it is possible in the middle of negative thinking or in the middle of a drama with your spouse to suddenly know what's happening that means some of your consciousness has has stepped out of the form and is there as pure awareness before it was totally trapped in the form and then when you suddenly see what's happening that means what's happened there some consciousness has stepped out of the incarnation and is there as pure consciousness watching and there you are the angry entities screaming oh look at that and then it can't it can't go on for that much longer because when there's when there's awareness there presence which is simply the still watcher then it it can't very well renew itself much longer because it needs your unawareness it needs your complete identification with it to really renew itself so then it quickly subsides it goes hmm

okay

well that was good at least I woke up in the middle of it sometimes you wake up afterwards there it was too late but it's not really too late because at least I'm awake now next time maybe I can catch it a little earlier and then next time it comes oh there it is and you can sometimes see how a little event can be used as an excuse by the pain body just a tiny thing going wrong somebody slams the door on your face and there's a reaction far greater than the relatively insignificant event and that's because the pain body was waiting for something so shining the light of attention of consciousness on it is all that's needed then you don't reincarnate completely into it every time and renew the old cycle it's always the same always the same if you're not present in thirty years time you'll still have the same episodes with your wife or husband or maybe a new wife and a new husband but it'll be the same and the strange thing is you look for somebody saying you get to divorce finally I can't live with this pain body anymore I mean the one that I live with you still have your own and so you get divorced and say okay now my next husband or wife I'm going to choose somebody who doesn't have a pain body who's conscious and then you meet somebody who looks conscious they've done spiritual work for twenty five years and then you start living together and within about four weeks you will encounter an aspect to that pain body that wasn't supposed to be there so that's the challenge of the pain body whether you are in a relationship or not it'll be there relationships are good opportunity because that's the favorite playground of pain body renewal but if the pain body doesn't have the relationship it'll just use your mind that works too so watch for that because there's a momentum there that's very strong because it's been there's such a huge amount of human pain collective human pain on this planet built up over many many thousands of years and really all that your pain body is or it looks personal it's really human pain although something in your so called personal life may have added to it but really it is basically impersonal just as the movement of thought is basically impersonal the emotions are human emotions the thoughts are all thoughts that are being thought by the collective human mind and people think that's me but it is impersonal it's just when you identify it it gives the illusion that of being personal of being a person there you are being thought by the collective mind and so well where is the personal then the strange thing is that stillness isn't personal either presence stillness is not personal and yet it is essentially the beingness that you are but it's not personal personal means a little thing that there's me and the others so ultimately there's nothing personal neither the unconsciousness that identifies with forms nor when the the consciousness arises is not personal either and yet the essence of who you are the I am that is nothing to do with person but it gets mixed up with the personal the forms that the person identifies with that make up the person as you know person is the word comes from latin it means persona the mask that you wear and that is are the roles that you play when you interact with other humans as long as you identified with mind and emotion you play the roles that are personal you play the the script in your mind the conditioning of your mind again and again and again born again and again and again until you've had enough and then you're fed up with the suffering that that entails and the readiness comes to step out of that and that's the end of reincarnation before we have a few questions there may not be any questions left that would be good too can you listen to the sound of the bell at the same time as you're aware of the awareness that is listening in other words aware of yourself as the presence in which the sound happens and then all that's left is spaciousness presence form and formless so even while you listen to the form which is the sound follow the sound as it slowly dies down into formlessness that is death too when the sound slowly dies down when I ring this bell again after the Royal Air Force has all passed follow the sound until it disappears that means the sound dies death means a form is dissolving dissolves and then what's left is formless consciousness you can do the same with your breath that's an old meditation method the simplest one one of the simplest doesn't really give you time to observe your breath the Buddha recommended that is perhaps the most direct meditation method because it doesn't give you time unless the meditator comes in as a conceptual identity and says I must get better at observing my breath when you observe how your breath moves out the end of the out-breath is also a little death and there's a moment of stillness any ending is helpful in that way because any ending is the ending of any form and it's always some kind of death when you accept it fully it's an opening into the formless even the ending of our little retreat can be like that because that too is a form and you could say oh what a pity this form is dissolving and you want to hang on to the form a recipe for unhappiness not realizing that the very reason why this gathering is meaningful is that it takes you beyond form so the more you welcome all the endings in your life goodbye form is going the more the formless is there in your life the egoic entity works the opposite way it hates it wants to think oh no I want to keep this but it's going going gone everything if you're old enough that you can see the death of this physical form approaching that can be very beautiful too to feel to accept that but not as a thought oh I'm going to die soon no let it push you into being present just that if any questions arise please ask one person there I think the microphone will travel to you

you use a lot of

humor in your a lot of laughter in your presentation and there appears to be a lot of laughter in you

[Speaker 4] (4:29:00 - 4:29:14)

I have this sense that once the humorous thing is said and the laughter begins that that too is a porthole into presence can you speak about that the the humor arises spontaneously when you look at really whenever this humor arises we are looking at the world of form and see that the normal existence which is identification with form is a form of madness and when you see it in your own life the seeing is free in that moment of freedom from that old conditioned form there is a spontaneous relaxation and that produces the laughter so it's enormously liberating the more you laugh at the world of form not in a malicious way but in a free way to see the forms do not they pretend all the forms pretend that they are deadly serious the world wants to be taken really every situation says I'm so serious and if you have no inauspiciousness then indeed every situation is dreadfully serious and so the absolute seriousness of the world of form disappears when you are rooted in the formless and that means laughter arises more frequently even in relatively unlikely situations and it does not mean that you have no empathy or compassion it's sometimes when I used to see people individually they would come to me and usually they begin by telling their story at that time I just let them tell their story and sometimes while they were telling and sometimes it was a very unhappy story very unhappy and sometimes while I was listening there was a smile on my face and it just I don't know how it got there and sometimes the people who were telling suddenly stopped and said what are you smiling about are you laughing at me no and then I found it hard to explain there was a time when I didn't have really many words to explain so I found it hard to explain why the smile was there not smiling at anything they said smiling because I recognized both within myself and within them underneath the story I recognized the dimension in which that story is relatively meaningless I recognized that underneath the story you are absolutely fine I recognized the dimension in you where you are just was never touched by the unhappy story who you are and because I recognized that the smile came and so but quite a few times people got angry because they thought I was smiling at their story or at them it was it wasn't taken all that seriously anymore just as my own story lost its seriousness it continued in some way playing itself out but it wasn't serious business anymore it doesn't mean you don't honor the world of form it doesn't mean that you have become callous towards things no not at all there is you still here as this form identity you still carry a form also so you can empathize with the suffering that arises in anyone who is totally identified with form and yet that is one aspect of compassion that you know full well what it means to be trapped in form is is suffering and I've been through it I know what I know the suffering so there's the empathy on the level of form of suffering but there's also the recognition of that which is already beyond suffering in me in you it's one and there come the two aspects of compassion on the one hand we share being trapped in this form seemingly on the other hand we also share the timeless and formless dimension of existence where we are already free and you bring the two together and that's true compassion because true compassion doesn't just mean you weep when the other person weeps you weep also you may weep but underneath the weeping there's joy the joy that knows of the formless that knows that you are in your essence indestructible not as an abstract idea but as a feeling realization so to speak so humor is a wonderful thing and I I'm sure that Jesus and other teachers all had a lot of humor too all the teachers did and just the the disciples later on said oh we mustn't put that joke in that doesn't that that doesn't look serious enough beware of any spiritual teacher who is deadly serious because even the Zen the Zen masters who look dreadfully serious they only look like that there's an enormous amount of humor inside them that's hidden in all the Zen stories and the way they deal with people so they just look like that but if you look into their eyes or if you see a drawing done by a great artist of a Zen master you see underneath their perhaps frightening demeanor there is a softness also and there's a gentle smile hidden somewhere there and then of course you have the beautiful image traditionally all Buddha images have a slight smile this is the

Buddha smile a very slight hint of a smile that comes with knowing yourself knowing the essence of being and then you have the images influenced by Taoism in China of the fat Buddha they are wonderful there's this man with a huge belly toothless in many cases or just one tooth left and his belly is huge and he's continuously laughing and many people have that at home in China and nowadays in the West also and it's wonderful to see whenever you think you have a problem just look at him and he's laughing not at you he's laughing not because he despises the world or is callous towards human suffering he's laughing because he's rooted within in the formless and so it's a wonderful image you can also practice a laughing meditation that's I haven't done that yet and that frees up a lot of rigid structures inside but here the laughing happens spontaneously and it's wonderful okay one there and then we go there okay oh thank you can a fool realize his enlightenment thank you can a form realize

a fool

[Speaker 1] (4:37:38 - 4:49:38)

a fool silly person oh thank you wonderful question there are some wonderful images fool is a very ancient mythological figure the tarot card of the fool and so on now by fool let's say we mean someone whose mental capacities are undeveloped I would say somebody who is not trapped in the usual structures of compulsive thinking not because he or she has transcended compulsive thinking but has not arrived at compulsive thinking and in that sense that human being is already enlightened because he has not it's not the enlightenment that we are addressing here but that state of not yet being trapped in thought has many similarities with the enlightened state one could say he doesn't need enlightenment because in his own way he already is enlightened in modern contemporary mythology which is films there is a beautiful example of that in the figure of Forrest Gump the film somebody whose mental capacities are undeveloped but who lives in many ways just like an enlightened person would live first of all he doesn't have an ego everything that comes everything he needs naturally comes to him his life unfolds naturally he doesn't struggle for anything everything comes at the right moment and he achieves he even does great things but never says I did that because the I hasn't arisen yet he has to go to Vietnam and even there wherever he goes he is a force for good even when he has to go to the war in Vietnam he saves many people he is a great hero and he doesn't look at himself as a great hero because he doesn't have a mental image of myself having done that he just explains that's what happened I did that and so on and so in many ways he is already enlightened and you can say he doesn't need enlightenment because he is already there for us we can't go back there he doesn't really need to go through thinking he is fine it seems to be the destiny of some humans to be connected and there may be a few remaining civilizations remnants of ancient civilizations where humans live in oneness with nature and oneness with each other and they don't need the Buddha they already just as an animal there are some dogs or cats that I sometimes meet in some cases they have suffered a lot or they are very old and they have reached the enlightenment of the dog or cat being the old cat who cannot be bothered anymore with catching birds because the cat knows it's pointless anyway they're too old and so they go around and they're just completely there and the old dog there are beings who seem to have completely fulfilled the purpose of their existence in that form and have found the connectedness with the formless within they have the form has fulfilled its purpose and the connectedness is there this is not it is not our destiny to to return we are all we have been or are or most of us halfway stuck in the human the human mind so there's no way of going back we cannot become fools again and yet when you go beyond thinking from the point of view of mind it often appears that you no longer know anything so in that way we also become fools from the point of view of conceptual thought and there are many similarities with the way that an enlightened person lives who has transcended thought which is no longer trapped in thinking to somebody who has not yet gone through the evolutionary stage of being trapped in thinking didn't have to for some reason consciousness flowered there through that form and that's beautiful for us it's transcending thought and then becoming a fool again yes one could say and yet we don't become forest gum there is a knowing that comes when you have transcended thought there is an awareness that wasn't there before in the natural state it's a regaining of the natural state but the regaining of the natural state that also all ancient civilizations speak of the myth of the golden age that exists in India in almost every civilization you have the myth that there was a time when humans lived in peace and happily the world was a kind of paradise you have the same myth expressed in the beginning of the bible so there must be an ancient truth there there is a natural state that humans lost those humans who didn't lose it don't need it they are fine but it is the destiny the evolutionary destiny of consciousness is for humans to lose it and then to regain it and that's where we are and so in some ways you will look to humans who are still trapped in the same and you will find that they are still in the same state and you will are still trapped the same state so you don't need to seek a specialist in form anymore so what a freedom that comes to us now of not needing to be special anymore to get some sense of who you are to become ordinary you have that beautifully expressed in the Taoist sages the whole Tao Te Ching the Chinese book of wisdom is all an expression of ordinariness to be ordinary not to project yourself and wanting needing to be someone but happy to be no one and that looks quite foolish from the outside and people may look upon you as nobody and that's wonderful the only regret is not really regret I have about the power of now that became so well known and with it the being that gave it birth no more just is the projection of specialness whereas there was such beauty in being totally ordinary and nobody doubted that I was ordinary well a few people said you must go and see him he is so ordinary just to be to be with the just to live with the present moment see what you nothing could be more ordinary than just to live aligned with whatever is here now that's all you ever have to do it's pretty ordinary just this the famous Zen saying chopping wood carrying water it's expressed in that it's a very profound Zen saying this is meant to encapsulate the whole of Zen existence chopping wood carrying water two of the most ordinary activities at that time when people did that in our cases will be something else most people well don't chop wood well perhaps some people still do it's beautiful to be just just that whatever you happen to be doing at this moment there's no more than this moment chopping wood ah carrying water just that peace aliveness no interference of mind that says how many more weeks or years do I have to chop this wood if I don't do something now I'll still be stuck in ten years time chopping wood the illusion of time is back here but only on the external level not in here on the external level the clock keeps ticking or whatever modern clocks do this is not the end there is no end but this is not the end even on the level of form after our little break I will meet with you again here in about 30 so called minutes and we will sit together just in silence for a little while unless something else happens thank you music

It is our great great honor at Unity FM here at Unity to welcome our special guest today Ekhart Tolle.

[Speaker 1] (4:51:35 - 4:51:36)

Thank you. Welcome.

[Speaker 3] (4:51:36 - 4:52:35)

Applause Well, one of our co-founders, Myrtle Fillmore, this has been her vision and Charles's vision that and to have you here is such an honor. One of the things that she wrote, there's a letter that she wrote, is the oldest handwritten letter that Myrtle has been found by Myrtle Fillmore and in it, this is from 1891, and I brought this quote because it speaks so much to what you talk about in both of your books. She says, My dear, you ask why you do not enter into the understanding you so desire.

I will tell you, you are already in it, but you think you have some great thing to do to get there. The kingdom of God is within you. All you need to do is be still and know.

[Speaker 1] (4:52:36 - 4:52:38)

Yes, that's right.

[Speaker 3] (4:52:38 - 4:52:41)

So that would be, what would you like to add to that?

Well, the human mind has been conditioned over thousands of years to seek fulfillment elsewhere in space and time, and especially in time, so the human mind has been conditioned to look to the future or the next moment. Future sounds a little abstract. If we say the next moment, then we can actually feel what that means.

It always looks to the next moment, or most of the time, for fulfillment, completion. And in this way, the human mind, the conditioning of the human mind denies life because the only place where life takes place, the only place where life happens is in the present moment now, and outside the now there is no life. And even past and future don't actually exist outside human thought forms.

Now this may sound a little bit difficult at first to believe because past and future seem so real, but all you have to, this is not a philosophical exercise, it's easier than that, all you have to ask yourself is whether you've ever experienced past or future. And then if you look closely, you realize all you ever experienced was now. And when it happened, it was now because it's only in the space of now where anything can happen.

And when the future comes, it can only come as the now. So past and future are thought forms. They may be necessary on a practical level here.

We can make appointments and get together here at this particular time. But when it goes beyond practical, then they actually represent a great limitation when they take over our lives. Then time, past and future I call time, time then takes over our consciousness.

And so this is the time-bound state of consciousness that most people are possessed by. And it is an essential aspect of the egoic consciousness. The ego lives in and through time, ego being the false mind-made sense of self.

And so it comes as a surprise to people when they realize, well, it's actually true. My life is always now. And it's never not now.

And never will be not now. It never has been. And that is not just an idea that you add to your mind, the fact that life is always now.

This is almost like a little powerful pointer. It's always now. And really, that almost stops your mind.

If you really get that, to experience the truth of that statement, you have to step beyond the mind. Because by continuing to think analytically, is it actually true that there's only the now? Let me think.

It's a pointer that takes you, when you truly experience the reality of that, actually takes you into the now. And then there's an opening inside, there's a space that opens up inside, and you say, this is it? And what is this?

You can't quite at first define what this is. But all you know for the time being is this is life. Life itself is experienced now.

And so, for most people, now is what happens in the now. And that's why people believe that there are many different moments. Every hour consists of many different moments.

Every day consists of many moments. But if you look more closely, of course, there are not many moments. There's only ever this moment.

And the reason why people believe there are many moments is because they confuse the now with what happens in the now. What happens, of course, changes continuously. The now itself, however, is something that is, the moment we define it through words, of course, we limit it.

And yet, knowing that words are not quite it, or words can only point to it, we can continue to talk for a little bit about the now. So, the now then is the space in which everything happens, or the light in which everything appears. And the light in which things appear and disappear, they come.

This is how everything continues to change in life. The impermanence of that the Buddha speaks of. Everything continuously changes.

It comes into the light of now. But the essence of every experience is the light of consciousness, which is the space of now. So the secret of now is that it is the formless foundation of all manifested life.

It is the unmanifested, formless dimension in which the manifested appears. And in essence, you are that light. And knowing that yourself as that is not done through thinking.

It is not a thought that you add to your mind and say, OK, I'm light. OK, now I know it. You can only know yourself as the light if thought stops, even if only for this moment.

And you sense that underneath all the things that happen, sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions, feelings, there remains the substratum, which is the space of consciousness itself, which we could also call the stillness. Every word only shows you a tiny aspect of it. It's not it.

It's stillness, and it's vaster than stillness. It's consciousness, but even that limits it because it's only a word. So finding that space in yourself, and this is what the quote is about, you can only find that space in yourself now because essentially it is the now.

So who you are at the deepest level is inseparable from the now. And so that's the deepest meaning of now. And it's a realization.

Just one glimpse is enough to change your life. It doesn't mean that the time-bound consciousness won't take you over again. It will probably happen.

But you've had the glimpse, that is the initiation of the awakening process. And anybody who can see the truth of this must already have had the glimpse. Or in the moment of words like these being spoken, some people at that moment have the glimpse and wake up.

And so you realize the essence of yourself has nothing to do with the form of yourself, the body, whatever thoughts go through your mind, whatever emotions you have. That's fine. That's a level of form.

I call it the human part. But we are human beings. Human is form.

Being is formless. Most humans know only the human part and identify totally with the human part, which is the physical form, the thought forms, the emotional forms. You identify with external forms, possessions, achievements, this, that, and that becomes...

But really, external forms are also thought forms. They get translated into mental images. So you're really always identified with mental images, even your my car.

You're not really identified with my car, but with the mental image of my car. So that is the world of form. That's the human.

And if that's all you know, then you're lost in the world because this world is the world of form. And most people still live like that. Lost in the world, which implies lost in their minds.

That's where the world starts. And the world being the world of form. And underneath it all is a timeless dimension, the spiritual dimension, the sacred dimension.

And that's the essence of who you are. And that is the deepest meaning of now.

[Speaker 3] (5:02:22 - 5:02:26)

And we access that through the stillness? Through the silence?

Yes. You could say the stillness, the silence, is it. But you cannot, of course, ever objectify it.

You can't say, there it is. That's why Jesus said, the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived. Because if it's a sign, you say, oh, there it is, the kingdom of heaven, there it's coming.

It doesn't. First, of course, it cannot come because it's already here. And it can't be there because it's the essence of here.

It's here.

Well, to experience that, do we have to, when I think of going into silence, I think of this quiet, meditative state. Is it possible to experience that as we are doing in our life?

[Speaker 1] (5:03:17 - 5:07:47)

Yes. And this is the part of the art of living in this world, of living, of conscious living in this world, so that you are able to balance in your life the two dimensions, form and formlessness, world and spirit. So that you provide, you are a bridge, so to speak.

You, as this human being, are the bridge between the being and the human, the world, form and formlessness. And across this bridge flows something into this world from the other, from the timeless, sacred dimension that is not to be found, it is not to be found somewhere in space or time. God, you could say, God is not found in space or time.

God is not hiding somewhere in outer space. We know that by now. Even conventional Christianity is beginning to realize that God is not out there somewhere, although, well, anyway, let's not.

So we are here bridging the two worlds, and through you, as you live consciously, the dimension of the sacred or the divine or the timeless flows through you, through your words, if you are conscious and present, through your actions, not necessarily big significant actions, every action is significant, even lifting a cup, consciousness can flow into that, presence can flow into that, into power when you interact with other humans, and you are not preparing mentally what you are going to say, you are not judging them in any way, you are the space for them.

That means, at that moment, something through you as this form, something from the formless, the sacred dimension of God flows into this world of form. And in a strange way, it gradually transforms the world of form. The world of form loses its density and heaviness.

And what I'm describing is actually the deepest meaning of love, because when this flows into what you say, do, into your interactions, that space is essentially what love is, not the egoic understanding of love, which says, I need you, don't you ever dare leave me. But the love that recognizes that whatever you see out there in the world of form is a manifestation or an appearance in disguise, disguised as that particular temporary form of who you are in your essence, on the formless. So there's always a self-recognition when that dimension is open and flows through you into this world.

When I say you, at this moment I mean the form of you, which is ultimately not who you are, it's just an appearance. And that's our mission then, is to bring that dimension of consciousness into this world. And that is what the universe wants.

And if we bring this dimension of consciousness into what we do and say, especially into interactions, we are fulfilling not only our purpose as humans, we are fulfilling the purpose of the universe, because the universe is moving continuously towards the greater and greater expression of consciousness. And gradually, we don't want to go too much into this, but my feeling is that gradually matter is becoming, through this, matter gradually becomes spirit and loses its density.

Well, would you like to lead us into that stillness? I know we would all be very honored to experience that. And it is our tradition in Unity to begin with prayer and stillness and meditation.

Well, we can, but the strange thing also happens when these words are spoken, you can actually experience in the background, you're hearing the words, you understand the words without needing to analyze them, and in the background of your perceptions, there is already the space. So even as we speak, in order to find the space, it is not necessary, it can be helpful from time to time to go into stillness, wonderful thing to do, but it is not confined to moments of stillness. The question is whether you are able to be aware in the background of your life, and that means of course now, whether you can be aware of this thing that cannot be defined, we could call it, can you be aware of the consciousness that you are, not the awareness of something, the awareness of awareness.

Can you sense the presence that you are? Yes, and again, it's not as Jesus said, you can't say, oh yeah, I've got it now, or you can't say, okay, I have achieved presence, and then claim, because you can only have it now. You can't say, now I have it, I'm an achiever of presence, or even if you say, I'm enlightened, it's dangerous to say that, because you're forming another form identity, you give yourself another form identity and imply that I'm going to be present forever, but there's only now, so the only question is, are you able to sense this background to all experience right now, and still be able to deal with things, perceive things, even take action, so that there's always a stillness in the background, even while you talk to people. What do we need to do now?

One can lose oneself so easily when you begin to use your mind, touch, start, words flow, they come out of you, they come out of the other person, and there's an enormous momentum behind the human mind, thousands of years of unconsciousness, and so the human mind is used to drawing your entire consciousness, and using it, making thoughts, more and more thoughts, so for many people still, all their consciousness is thought, they are not aware that underneath thought there is the vastness of unconditioned consciousness, out of which thoughts are not separate from consciousness, they are a form that consciousness takes, and then the question is whether consciousness identifies completely with a form, and loses itself consciousness, or whether the forms can arise, and you are still conscious of the background, of the space of awareness, and as you say, it can be helpful at first to find it in moments of, when you say, okay, I'm going to be still now, still, and perhaps many of you, perhaps already practicing that, this is an advanced spiritual group, so I'll tell you what it is, to be able to simply say, there's nothing to think about now, so why should I think, there's no need to think, to voluntarily say, I will surrender right now, I'll surrender thought, relinquish thought, and what's left?

Now, two things are possible now, you can either fall below thought, or you rise above thought, that is an alertness, relaxed alertness, still alertness, you rise above thought, and you can then, this could be a spiritual practice, you can practice perceiving things through stillness, without naming, without labeling, whether you use auditory perception, or visual perception, or tactile, it doesn't matter, the predominant sense for most people is the visual, so you look around, you see everything, you even somehow know what it is you're looking, but you're not defining it, and limiting it by calling it something, that means the mystery of life is still there, you have not reduced the mystery, and the incredible beauty of this, by calling it something, and then believing if you attach a name to it, you know what it is, there's always, this is a great illusion, if you call it, I don't know what that plant is, but if I knew it, if you call it something, and then most people believe, now they know what it is, nothing has happened, you've just attached a sound to it. And it's not even a real ficus. So, but even inanimate objects, even inanimate objects are intensely alive, everything is mysterious, and the mysteries there surrounding you, the universe, and the delusion is that by naming it, that suddenly you know what it is.

So here the spiritual practice is to refrain from naming and labeling mentally. And that's the beauty, you practice at first in easy environments, out in nature is helpful, easier than being in a city, because in a city everything is man-made and can stimulate thought, especially you see writing everywhere, advertising, and that stimulates thought. It's very hard to look at something written and then not, let that become a thought.

You'd have to turn it around, upside down, and then perhaps it works. But even then the mind will try to figure out what to say. So out in nature, anything natural, just looking, listening, and this is being there fully, no matter where it is, you're absolutely present then.

You're above thought, in the state of alert presence. And everything becomes alive. You suddenly realize that when you were immersed in thinking and always labeling everything mentally, the universe was no longer alive to you.

You couldn't sense the aliveness of the universe anymore. And unfortunately millions still live like that. They inhabit a universe that has become deadened by mental abstractions, continuous thinking, because every thought is some form of abstraction.

It's not it. And so the practice then is to bring that alert presence into perceptions and look around. You might even do it in your room, too, when you sit in your bedroom or living room.

Sit there for a while and just look around. Just to practice, can I perceive without this compulsion to label everything? And that's a beautiful thing to do.

Your perceptions become innocent. This is why Jesus said, unless you become like little children, you cannot enter the kingdom of God. He means that those are little children whose minds have not yet started to conceptualize everything and judge everything.

And yet it's not quite the same as a little child because you have already transcended thought. The little child is still at a pre-thought level, and you have gone through it. So there's an added depth or dimension to that state, but it has certain similarities with the state of the innocent perception of a child.

And imagine if you can bring that into human interactions so that whatever, whoever you meet, any human being you meet, you don't label them. You just are there as the space for that perception of that. And so another way of putting this is that you are here as the aware space rather than as a person.

So the aware space, the being part of the human, becomes more important than the human. The human is still honored to the level of form. Yes, you have a name, you have a personal history, but you no longer derive your identity from your personal history, which after all is only a story you tell yourself in your head.

And certain emotions still go with that story. That's your personal history. Your personal history consists of thought and your photo albums.

And your photo albums are not going to survive for that long either. So two generations later they end up in some antique store and then somebody looks at them and all they see is some old, some human form. Who's that?

[Speaker 3] (5:18:35 - 5:19:17)

I wonder who that was. We're talking today with Eckhart Tolle, and more information is online at www.eckharttolle.com. We thank you for being with us for this very special edition of The Leading Edge.

So Eckhart, what would the role then be of having the multitudes gather in prayer or having multiple people gather in the silence?

There's an energy field that arises when a group of people, even just two, come together and enter the state of presence. And that affects not only does it strengthen the presence in each member of the group, it helps, it's not presence, it's not your possession by the way, it's not, one might sometimes say your presence or my presence, that's only a way of speaking. Ultimately there isn't your presence or my presence, there's only presence.

You could say it's the divine presence or the presence of God in this world. And it can be very helpful to come together in a group with the purpose of being present, so you're present together. The difficulty often arises when the period of stillness comes to an end and the group starts to speak again.

The moment you start to speak, then the challenge is not to lose that sense of stillness or presence even while you start to think and speak again. And that can be quite a challenge because the momentum of the mind can be so overpowering, especially when you start discussing something. So after sitting together in presence, somebody says, OK, now let's discuss the meaning of presence.

Well, I think it, no, no, you're wrong. And before you know it, two minutes later, you're completely in some mind stream, identified with some mind stream. Off you go and suddenly you're fighting with somebody who is identified with a slightly different mind stream.

And so the presence is gone. Oh, where has it gone? It's become obscured.

You were not alert enough to remain. The alertness was lost. Alertness is consciousness without thought.

Presence ultimately is just bare, pure consciousness.

So this morning we were all gathered here in the Silent Unity Chapel and Rev. Dorothy Pearson led us into the silence in a very powerful way. And I had this experience, and I'm wondering if you've ever had this experience, where in the silence there is such a feeling of being connected and feeling the presence of source that for me I get very emotional.

Yes, it touches all levels. You can feel it physically even. You can feel it on the emotional level.

It reverberates on all levels.

So is that an emotional release? What is that emotion that we feel?

[Speaker 1] (5:22:21 - 5:22:52)

Well, it's like it's almost, I would say, it's an expression of love. That's how I experience that. When love arises, because this is how love arises, sometimes it touches the emotion and you cry.

It doesn't mean you're sad. There's great joy in that. So the joy can be so overpowering that it touches the emotional level also.

And it's very beautiful.

We have many questions that people through our online community, the UnityFM online community, and those that are here with us, many, many questions people have for you. This one is from Shirley Bowman, and she's a member of our online community. She says that in your book you say that there is nothing you can do to prepare yourself for attaining enlightenment, and we've talked about that.

So what about prayer and meditation and what Unity calls the silence? Are those processes that is the intention for those to lead us to enlightenment?

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (5:23:25 - 5:23:26)

How does that connect?

[Speaker 1] (5:23:26 - 5:23:59)

Yes. In fact, what I say in the book is that there's nothing you can do to bring about awakening. Awakening is the first separation of consciousness from thinking.

And so somebody who is able to go into stillness and practice stillness has already gone through that. So that person has already begun to awaken. But if we're doing it in order to...

That means you haven't found the stillness yet. You're trying to find the stillness, but you can't find it.

More silence, more silence.

Yes, it would be very frustrating, because you would continue to come here and then... I just can't get there. And then you would have to, after a while, you would stay home and you can't do it anymore.

And then you have to wait for grace. In some form, the grace will then come, perhaps not by you going to a group. It might come in a different form.

Maybe you suddenly slip, you're walking on a wet road, and suddenly you fall and whatever, you break your arm or you don't, and suddenly your mind stops. The shock is so great that for a few seconds you're there in presence. Oh, that's it.

That would be the beginning of the awakening. And then you'll be able to come to a group and you've had a glimpse.

Can we do it without suffering?

[Speaker 1] (5:25:01 - 5:25:02)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (5:25:02 - 5:25:07)

Can we do it without the dark night of the soul? For those of us happy people, can we get there eventually?

[Speaker 1] (5:25:07 - 5:26:12)

Yes. Most people here, probably to a greater or lesser extent, have already gone through that phase of suffering. And for many of us, it's only because of the suffering that we've gone through we are here now.

If we hadn't had it, we would still be completely identified with the egoic self, the little me, and pursuing its little aims and ambitions and problem-making and so on. So most of us have gone through that stage, and the more you're able to invite presence into your life, the less you need suffering to force you into presence, or to break the egoic shell. Because for some people the density of the ego is just enormous, and they need some kind of shock.

I don't know what you're talking about there.

[Speaker 5] (5:26:12 - 5:26:14)

Maybe a few.

[Speaker 1] (5:26:15 - 5:26:36)

There was a spiritual teacher in India who called people with, I don't know if some of you know Indian terminology, you can actually suffix G to a name as a form of respect. So if somebody is called Krishna, you can call them Krishna G, which is a form of respect. So he called people with big egos, Ego Gs.

[Speaker 3] (5:26:39 - 5:26:42)

I just had to respect. Respect the ego.

[Speaker 1] (5:26:43 - 5:26:44)

Accept the ego.

[Speaker 3] (5:26:44 - 5:27:48)

Accept the ego. Here on Unity Campus, of course, the grounds are spectacular, and I was walking yesterday, of course, greeting a new earth, and there is a garden not far from where we're staying here. It's the Lowell Fillmore Garden, and there is a plaque and a poem is on it that is written by Lowell.

And as I read it, I thought, this is a new earth. So I brought it to share just to hear your comments on this. He writes, When for a purpose I had prayed and prayed and prayed Until my words seemed worn and bare with arduous use And all my fervor and persistence brought no hope I paused to give my weary brain a rest And ceased my anxious cry In that still moment, after self had tried and failed There came a glorious vision of God's power And, lo, my prayer was answered in that hour.

Very good. That's right here on campus.

[Speaker 7] (5:27:49 - 5:27:49)

Wonderful.

[Speaker 3] (5:27:49 - 5:27:50)

Like, that's a new earth.

[Speaker 7] (5:27:51 - 5:27:51)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (5:27:51 - 5:27:57)

Is that what you're trying... Because we've all had those fervent prayers. We pray and pray and pray and pray.

[Speaker 1] (5:27:57 - 5:27:57)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (5:27:57 - 5:28:00)

And that doesn't lead us to where we want to go. Yes. Why?

[Speaker 1] (5:28:01 - 5:30:19)

Well, for many people, prayer is still part of the old conditioning of your consciousness, which basically means you're looking to some future for fulfillment. Please let this happen. Then I'll be happy.

Please give me that. Then I'll be happy. Please don't let that happen.

And then I'll be happy. So the old mind structure, which believes it needs the future for fulfillment, is still operating even when people think they're being spiritual. And so they don't realize that the very same structure that worldly people are possessed by, they say, I can only get that bigger house or better job if only people could recognize that I'm the greatest, then I'll be happy.

Or if I see my picture in People magazine, then I'll be happy. And it's the same mind structure, or the same mind structure even with spiritual people. Whereas this prayer is where the old conditioning still operates.

It could also operate in people who are seeking enlightenment. Now that seems something more advanced than asking in prayer to be given something so that you can be happy, not realizing that the only place where you can be fulfilled and happy is now. You just have to go deeper into it.

Let's see. So if you are spiritual, then you might think, okay, you hear of enlightenment or liberation, whatever it's called, salvation. And okay, I need to attain that.

I need to become enlightened. You read books about it and so on. And you can become very knowledgeable.

And what is actually stopping you from realizing enlightenment or awakening, whatever, is the belief that it's going to come at some future moment. It's only when future is surrendered that it opens up. So it's only when you let go of that old mind structure that says, I need time.

[Speaker 3] (5:30:20 - 5:30:31)

So, for example, let's say someone is scheduled for surgery. So they might want to go into a prayerful state about a future upcoming surgery. What would be the best way?

[Speaker 1] (5:30:32 - 5:39:28)

The most powerful way is to absolutely not leave this moment, to refuse to budge from just now, so that time virtually collapses. And then there's such intensity behind that state, and that can be there also if you believe that the body may go soon, may dissolve soon, not much time left. So there's no point in looking for something in time.

If you know that the body might go in two weeks' time, two months' time, then there's no point in looking towards time for some fulfillment. So then it can happen that even unspiritual people who've spent their whole lives in worldly pursuits are suddenly driven, otherwise they become extremely miserable and unhappy, the depths of depression, of course. But even then it can happen that even unspiritual people are driven out of time into the now.

And suddenly the sacred, the spiritual dimension opens up in them, and they go, and you know they can sense the transformation. Light shines through the decaying form. And it's an amazing thing.

I've met a few people who, as they were going towards the dissolution of the body, entered that state of absolute intense presence, which is not a forced state, it's not a state of, I need to be present. It's a very relaxed intensity. And that's also where the spiritual master lives, so to speak, has his or her home, which is in the present moment, always aligned with now.

No matter what appears in the now, you say yes to the appearance of the now. If the appearance of now is a difficult person, an ego-G, then that's what is now. You don't say you should behave differently.

No. Of course, action is always possible. You can remove yourself from the ego-G and look the other way or leave the room.

But if you can't, you're stuck in an elevator with the ego-G, then you have to say, there you are. You are this now. The form that this now takes.

So the primordial spiritual practice is, whether you do it shortly before death, hopefully you do it sooner. Hence the ancient dictum, die before you die. This is the collapse of time.

Time then only has a practical purpose but is no longer important in your life. You're not looking for time to find yourself. You can only find yourself now because you are the presence.

And so there's an uncompromising yes to whatever form this moment takes. And even if it seems difficult, and even if it seems limiting, because the world of form is always limiting in one way or another. You cannot find the limitless in the world of form.

Even if you achieve everything that you wanted to achieve, wealth, great fame, everybody loves me, everybody admires me, then you will find, even there you will find your new life situation would have new limitations. You cannot find the limitless. Oprah can't go for walks in the street or go shopping.

She can't go out by herself. She would get mobbed. So that's a big limitation.

What great joy there is in just walking around, looking around. Can't do it anymore. Big limitation.

So if she had thought that fame would make her happy, she would now become unhappy again. So whatever you achieve in the world of form, sooner or later you will hit upon... It doesn't mean you cannot do things to go beyond certain limitations in your life.

Scarcity, well, there may be a period in your life when you do things to go beyond scarcity. Or healing your body, there may be things you can do to heal your body. These are all wonderful things.

But no matter what you do on the level of form, you will always hit upon some limitation. So when you encounter the limitation, it appears in the now. You say, OK, this is what is.

You don't judge it. You don't run away from it. And sometimes for some people the limitation is drastic.

The body may become incapacitated. It might not heal. Some people may experience healing, but not everybody experiences healing.

Or some limitation where everything that you've worked on for 25 years, 30 years of your life, collapses around you. You pick up your phone and say, How are my shares? The stockbroker says, It's all gone.

The stock market has collapsed. And your house has collapsed. Your wife has left you.

Now, this is what is. And if you bring an acceptance to the limitations that arise in the now, the very limitations become an opening into the space. Because the surrender and the acceptance of something that is seen as inevitable, in the form of this present moment, is always inevitable, because everything is as it is.

At this moment, it is as it is. You can't argue with that. You can take action.

Yes. But right now, is means is. It's already is.

And not to recognize the is-ness and become one with the is-ness means to be out of alignment with life. So if you recognize, all you have to accept is the is-ness of this moment. It doesn't mean you can't take action.

But right now, this is what is. And then action arises out of a state of acceptance. And enormous empowerment flows into it, not out of a state of negativity.

But the important thing is, when you accept the form, no matter what limitation it seems to be, completely, the so-called limitation becomes an opening into the inner space. Because through the acceptance of the outer limitation, the inner space of the formless opens up. This is how sometimes people who have suffered enormously were driven into awakening and enlightenment through their suffering.

They were driven to a point where they just couldn't struggle, couldn't have any more resistance to the suffering, because they realized at some point, the suffering arises not because of what's going on, but my resistance to what's going on. And so, surrender happens. With surrender, the inner space opens up.

The stillness underneath all that. And then, the very limitation becomes an open door. I believe that's the meaning of the crucified Jesus on the cross, because the meaning of the cross is that it's an expression of the most extreme limitation a human being can encounter, the most extreme suffering.

Totally helpless. So the cross is a torture instrument, but for some reason, the cross is also a symbol for the divine. And at first, this might seem very strange, especially if you come from outer space, and you're not used to it, you see it for the first time.

How is it that the humans have made the torture instrument into a symbol for the divine? And that is because behind the suffering that is totally accepted, not my will, but thy will be done, not the will of the little me, there's an acceptance. And through the acceptance, the very thing that was the torture instrument becomes the divine.

It opens up. And that's the transmutation of suffering.

[Speaker 3] (5:39:29 - 5:39:50)

We've had many of our questions relate to prayer, and this one in particular connects to what you're talking about, because it's asking, this is from our audience today, what is prayer to those who are attempting to live in the now? And who are we praying to, and is it a monologue? If we're living in the now, what is prayer?

Prayer, of course, is many different things according to where you are at in your consciousness. And as long as a person is still not, has not yet realized his or her oneness with the divine, then you're at a stage where the divine is approached on the level of duality. And for those people, prayer can be helpful up to a point until they need to let go of it.

So if you still see God as outside of you somewhere, then you're addressing God or asking for something. But increasingly, as you realize your essential oneness with the source, then your prayer would change and perhaps would become more simple. And so perhaps would just be little pointers that you use sometimes to remind yourself of the oneness.

Some lessons in A Course in Miracles, for example, have nice pointers like, let me remember who I am. Let me be still. These can be little pointers that take you into the reality of the realization of oneness.

[Speaker 3] (5:41:23 - 5:41:26)

In Unity, we talk about affirmative prayer.

[Speaker 1] (5:41:26 - 5:41:27)

Affirmative prayer, that's right.

[Speaker 3] (5:41:27 - 5:41:28)

The knowing. The knowing.

[Speaker 1] (5:41:28 - 5:41:47)

Yes, yes. And that can be helpful. So personally, I don't use the dualistic prayer.

But occasionally, affirmations come into my head as just spontaneous thoughts, and that's beautiful.

[Speaker 3] (5:41:48 - 5:42:06)

Well, David, from our online community, says that you suggest that we are not our thoughts. The Fillmore's have been quoted as saying that every thought is a prayer. He says, well, both statements resonate with me since I struggle with reconciling them.

Are we separate from even our intentional, positive, prayerful thoughts?

Now, thought, of course, for most people in the old consciousness, thought is a manifestation of the old conditioning of your mind. It comes from the past, and all the thought structures are repetitive, to a large extent negative. They feed the ego, which needs, of course, the negativity, which needs to have problems, which needs to have enemies.

So the continuous thought activity that most people are immersed in, involuntary and compulsive, they don't even know they're immersed in thought activity because they're so identified with thought activity that is who they are, or think they are. So for those people, thought is totally repetitive, and it tends to recreate also experiences because thought is creative, so you are identified with certain conditioned thinking, so no matter what you do, you create a similar reality because you're still totally identified with the same thought structures. So people, for example, they think, okay, I need to get out of this relationship, and then they have another relationship and get married to another person, and finally, after a little while, you see you've recreated the same thing.

And some people get married three, four, five times, and they recreate always the same thing. Some people even recreate very abusive partners sometimes, and they think, okay, finally, marriage number three, I finally found this person is not abusive, and after a few months, he or she turns out to be abusive. The same thoughts that you are immersed in tend to create the same reality, and so the awakening is the realization that there is conditioned thinking, the voice in the head, continuously going through your mind, interpreting your experiences according to your past.

So whatever you experience, there's a filter of your thinking, and you don't really experience the world, only in a very remote and indirect way, you really only then ever experience your thinking, the structure of your thoughts. You only ever really experience the past in you. It's a dreadful state to be in.

[Speaker 3] (5:44:43 - 5:44:45)

For most of us, yes.

[Speaker 1] (5:44:46 - 5:45:08)

And it's called normal, normal human consciousness. And this is why for many humans, unless they begin to awaken spiritually, no real change ever happens. And even if you win in the lottery, it's not real change.

It just means you have the same drama and the same unhappiness in a luxury environment.

[Speaker 3] (5:45:09 - 5:45:14)

Laughter Until we can recreate that old reality.

[Speaker 1] (5:45:14 - 5:45:19)

Yes, until you lose the luxury environment because your old thoughts are to do with scarcity.

[Speaker 3] (5:45:19 - 5:45:35)

And that is one of the fundamental, one of our basic unity teachings is that our thoughts do create, that thoughts held in mind produce after their kind. And so part of the spiritual discipline that we talk about is how do we become conscious in guiding our thoughts.

[Speaker 1] (5:45:35 - 5:49:29)

And this of course is why so little change happens in the world so far because the old thoughts are recreating the old reality. If you look at human history, 20th century history, dreadful. And the warfare that goes on.

But some change is coming in, it's true. So this is the fundamental shift that begins to happen when you're aware that there is old conditioned thinking that is continuously coloring your experiences, that is continuously interpreting your relationships, misinterpreting your relationships, imposing your own past on your present relationships. And so it's recreating the same madness again and again.

So whatever you, all your interpretations are erroneous because they are colored by the past in you. And this is why the Course in Miracles, for example, starts with little exercises which, for example, tells you to look around the room and say, I see only the past in this mug. I see only the past in this table.

I see only the past in this carpet. It might seem strange at first, but it's attempting to make you aware that this is what operates in you so that you can become free. And then it has another lesson which says, nothing I see in this room means anything.

This is one of the very early lessons in the Course. Nothing I see in this room means anything. Why is that a lesson?

Because it's attempting to remove the meaning that you impose on the world through your old conditioning. So this is all the old thought that recreates the old reality. And then, at some point, awakening begins to happen.

You begin to be aware of your thoughts. It means you're not free yet, but a little bit of freedom has come in. And then you can sometimes, you can already become aware of the most obvious, repetitive, negative, life-denying thoughts that have been going around in your head for years and years and years.

And suddenly, once you bring the awareness to it, the thoughts lose their intensity. And at some point you can choose to, you can recognize this as an old thought and say, oh, there's another old thought, and you can let go of it. You can replace it with another thought, or you can simply be present, even better.

Just bring presence, where before there was a thought that said, oh, he's a jerk, I know this kind of person, I've met so many of them. So immediately you relate to this person through this judgment. And he may not be.

On a deeper level, he isn't. But even on a surface level he may not be. He may just be your interpretation.

And then you recognize the thought, and then you can say, well, I honor the divinity in this human being, and that improves your relationships. And it goes even deeper if you can be simply present. And not, no judgment at all, just be the aware presence and listen to this person, or look at this person, and bring that into the relationship.

Then you become free of karma. Karma is all the old conditioning you carry around inside you that you are unconscious of, with which the past is recreated again and again. And karma can only dissolve through the arising of presence.

That's the miracle of human transformation.

[Speaker 3] (5:49:30 - 5:50:58)

We're talking with Eckhart Tolle, the best-selling author of A New Earth Awakening to Your Life's Purpose, online at www.eckharttolle.com. We thank you for joining us for this special edition of The Leading Edge. I'm Mindy Odlin, and we'll be back with more in just a moment.

Welcome back to The Leading Edge. I am Mindy Odlin, and this is a very special presentation of The Leading Edge. Our guest today, best-selling author Eckhart Tolle.

We've been talking about prayer, about presence, and I know many people from our audience today. We are here at the Silent Unity Chapel at Unity Village. They've been asking questions.

We have many people from our Unity FM online community asking questions. And this is one that just really jumped out to me because it's one that I want to know the answer to, too. This is from our audience today.

It says that they were listening to an interview with Barbara Walters on NPR this morning, and she says that she always asks people, What's the biggest misconception that people have about you? I would love to know. I get to be Barbara Walters here for a moment.

What is the biggest misconception that people have about you?

[Speaker 1] (5:50:59 - 5:57:04)

Well, there are probably different kinds depending where people are coming from. But I believe one is that they see me as special or enlightened. So there's a form identity that's created and projected that is almost the opposite of the reality because the reality of who you are is by relinquishing any kind of conceptual identity and any sense that you as this form is special, that you are more special than somebody else.

Enlightenment, that somebody is enlightened, is itself a contradiction. Enlightenment means that the sense of self, of I, the erroneous, the false mind-made I, has become transparent or given way to the light of consciousness that shines through. The light of consciousness is nobody's achievement or possession.

So even to say, I have achieved enlightenment is a big error. It means you haven't? Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

Nobody achieves enlightenment. It's only when the self that claims enlightenment gets out of the way or becomes at least transparent enough so that it doesn't cause problems anymore, then that which is beyond the form shines through, and that is the power. It's not my power.

The misconception is that this is my power. And, of course, it's happened sometimes even to people who have touched that and have that power flow through them. At some point, their mind came back and identified with it, and they've got another conceptual identity as me as very special.

And then the power becomes obscured again. It's like the clouds are coming back and obscure the sun. And the clouds are, of course, the stream of thinking, and then you have a new conceptual identity.

And it's more likely to happen to spiritual teachers who are surrounded only by disciples or followers, and so they project certain things onto the teachers and continuously bombarded with projections. You are the greatest. And then after a few years, some remnant of egoic consciousness gets triggered, and he begins to believe, he or she, that this is true.

So it's continuously going back into being nobody in particular. For example, being a spiritual teacher is not an identity as I see it, people believe this is my identity, but it's only an identity, it's only a function while the so-called teaching happens. Even the teaching doesn't come from this form, it's a process.

If there was nobody here, I would have nothing to say. The words come out because there's a space here that pulls out the words. I don't come here with some cumulative knowledge and this is what I'm going to say.

Nobody here, nothing, it is a complete, just a space, I don't know anything. And then when I go away from here, the function is relinquished. The important thing is then not to carry the conceptual identity of me being a spiritual teacher, because then I would still be a spiritual teacher when I'm walking around the supermarket, and I would feel special.

So always coming back to, I am just the, I am the space for this. I am, so it's no thing, no body in particular. That's the main, so the misconception is the projection of specialness.

That's how it is. And so when people, sometimes people when they come to talk, they feel an enormous arising inside of aliveness and presence and they might think it comes from here, but it can only come from within them. Perhaps something that's here can pull it out, but it must be in you if you can sense it.

Whatever you feel is there and the other person must also be in you. For example, stillness. In order to be aware, for example, that there's silence in this room, for a moment you have to be silent inside.

It's only the silence that can be aware of the silence, or the stillness which can be aware of the silence outside. If you have no stillness, you don't even know that there's silence because there's mental noise. So the strange thing is the specialness as opposed to others who are not special.

That's the delusion. I do feel special, but I know that everybody is equally special. So there's a sense of this life that I am is precious and it's everybody's identity.

[Speaker 3] (5:57:06 - 5:58:28)

You mentioned yourself, the role of spiritual teacher, and I noticed in today's Daily Word, the Daily Word has this uncanny ability to provide the perfect word on a perfect day. So here we are with Eckhart Tolle, the author of A New Earth, Awakening to Your Life's Purpose, and the Daily Word today is purpose. It says, I love what I do and I do it with purpose.

As I reflect upon my talents and interests, which is what you were talking about, that you are a spiritual teacher, that is a role you play, the activities that bring me joy and fulfillment, I realize that these are the things that give shape to my purpose in life, and each one is a gift from God meant to be developed and shared. Each new day I welcome the opportunity to put my spiritual gifts into practice, to grow them and expand the blessing that they are. I confidently share my talents with the people around me with commitment and enthusiasm.

When I love what I do and I do it with purpose, I am a blessing to the world. I am a unique and divine expression of spirit. My life is filled with purpose and meaning as I develop and share my spiritual gifts with others.

So could you talk about what is a spiritual gift? Because it does seem like there are those of us who are spiritual teachers, there are those of us who are healers, there are those of us who nurture in different ways. How does that tie into what you were saying?

[Speaker 1] (5:58:30 - 5:59:03)

As I say in the book, I see there's your inner purpose and your outer purpose. Outer purpose varies from person to person. It's to do with your activity, your outer function in this world.

Inner purpose is primary. It's the foundation for a satisfying and fruitful outer purpose. So inner purpose is the same for everybody.

Inner purpose, and of course the subtitle to the book is Awakening to Your Inner Purpose.

[Speaker 3] (5:59:04 - 5:59:07)

Awakening to Your Life's Purpose. You read this, right?

[Speaker 1] (5:59:08 - 5:59:14)

Laughter The subtitle actually was the idea of the editor.

[Speaker 3] (5:59:14 - 5:59:14)

Really?

[Speaker 1] (5:59:16 - 5:59:38)

Laughter He called and said I've had a great idea and said Awakening to Your Life's Purpose. That's it. That's good.

So Awakening to Your Life's Purpose already contains the answer because your life's purpose, your inner purpose, your primordial primary purpose is awakening.

[Speaker 3] (5:59:38 - 5:59:46)

Yes. One of the things that Reverend Paul Hasselbeck always says at the end of his program is to go out and be the best Christ you can be.

[Speaker 1] (5:59:46 - 5:59:46)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (5:59:47 - 5:59:49)

Our primary purpose. Yes.

[Speaker 1] (5:59:49 - 6:04:27)

The primary purpose is to be here as the awakened consciousness, present, conscious, and let that energy off, which is spiritual energy, which is a very fine vibration. Ultimately all energy is one, but the spiritual is the finest vibration. To let that flow into this world through whatever you do.

And what you do is secondary. Primary is always how you do what you do. So it doesn't necessarily mean that you need to find something great, some great enterprise, creating some great structure in this world.

Some people will do that. But the primary thing is what energy flows into every little thing you do. And even if you're engaged in some great enterprise, even if your name is Oprah, for example, every great thing consists of a hundred little steps that you take every moment.

Even for Oprah, at some point she steps onto the stage. One step, two, three, walks to a chair, sits in a chair, looks at the person, a question comes. Spontaneously a lot of questions.

Enormous ability she has to tune into the other person, and then the right question comes, funny comments come spontaneously, all these things that developed in her over 30 years of practice. And so that's one example. Many people look for some significant life purpose, but the first question is, have you made every little action that you take significant?

There's no point in looking for some great, abstract, significant thing. What's the great purpose of my life? And you neglect to pay attention to what is at hand, whatever you are doing now in search for something significant and believing that this moment is not significant.

You're just looking for the significant thing. And then, of course, you're not going to find it because you're neglecting the very foundation for all significance, which is this moment. So are you getting this moment right?

Is this whatever you're doing at this moment done with presence, with attention? Are you honoring this moment? And if you're honoring this moment, even if you don't know exactly where you want to go, if you honor this moment and see this moment as primary, then it's much more likely that if you are, if it is your destiny to create something out there in this world, it will come much more quickly.

Even if you're doing something at this moment that you perhaps wouldn't want to do for the rest of your life. Maybe you've got a job that doesn't pay well and is repetitive. And yet, this is what is now.

You can be, if you're in a negative state there, at this moment doing that, it's much less likely that you will be finding your true life purpose. So always come to make the present moment your friend. That's the foundation.

If you're friendly with the present moment, then you're friendly with life. Then life comes and will offer you whatever is most appropriate for you, which may have all kinds of things, working with people, working with plants, working with animals, working with structures, working with art, working with writing, whatever it is, in whatever form. And you may use perhaps already what you are doing, but as you bring presence into it, it becomes empowered and deeper.

Let's say you're a hairdresser and you are quite good, but then suddenly you realize how important the present moment is and you pay attention to every moment, the person who is there, the hair, the doing, the words come, which means what you do will become not only very good, that you're a very good hairdresser, it means another dimension will come into what you do when people come to you.

[Speaker 3] (6:04:27 - 6:04:29)

Do you ever get tired of being so aware?

[Speaker 1] (6:04:30 - 6:04:31)

Ha ha ha!

[Speaker 3] (6:04:33 - 6:04:40)

I mean, when I think about every step, you know, being present with every step, with every snip of the scissors, it sounds like it could be kind of exhausting.

There's not perhaps an equal intensity all throughout your day. It's when you're engaged. You just zone out.

Well, of course, one gets tired sometimes, and there's a point at which although you endeavor to live above thought, always a moment comes late at night, or sometimes for me in the afternoon when it's time to take a nap. A moment comes around 5 o'clock. Uh-oh!

[Speaker 7] (6:05:14 - 6:05:14)

Ha ha ha!

[Speaker 1] (6:05:18 - 6:05:47)

When my level of consciousness falls below thought. Ha ha ha! And there's a little nap, and then wake up again.

Oh, and then it's fine. And then I go about things. So sometimes, at the moment, I don't have television, so that doesn't work.

Sometimes we watch films. We rent DVDs.

Well, that was the next question. Someone said, you are such an enlightened soul. I'm very grateful for your awareness, your wisdom, and your willingness to share your insights with the world.

Just out of curiosity, what do you do for fun? Ha ha ha! Do you have any hobbies?

Ha ha ha! Well, it doesn't sound very interesting. I like walking out in nature every day.

I go for a walk in the forest every day when I'm at home with a dog. That's fun. My hobby for a long time was photography.

And at the moment, I'm trying to switch from... I'm always late with technology. At the moment, I'm trying to switch from the old-fashioned film photography, which I know very well, to digital, which I don't know anything about.

But I have a little digital camera now. I'm trying to take photos and master that.

Capturing moments?

What?

You're capturing moments.

[Speaker 1] (6:06:54 - 6:07:49)

Yes. What I capture most, what I do with the camera when I use it, I walk around nature with the camera, and I look. There's no thought involved.

And I look at some whatever. There's little, relatively insignificant things usually, leaves, trees, flowers, blades of grass, stones, whatever, or clouds. And at some point, there's something that particularly conveys the sense of divine presence that's there, the sacredness of nature.

And then I walk around a bit more, looking. And then there's something else. So it's not so much to capture something from the past.

It's to capture the sacredness. I'm not a master photographer. It's just a joyful thing to do, that's all.

[Speaker 3] (6:07:49 - 6:07:56)

Do you email us some pictures? We'll put them up on the website. One with a digital camera, I'll help you.

There are a few pictures in the little booklet that comes with a DVD of my Fintan retreat.

Oh, very nice.

[Speaker 1] (6:08:06 - 6:08:08)

And that has some photos that I took of nature.

Lovely, lovely. Well, speaking of pictures, one thing that many of our listeners are talking about, and there's many books coming out on the topic of treasure maps, the idea of taking pictures of things that we want to manifest and putting them up in front of us. This question is from one of our listeners on our online community.

He says, My husband and I happen to be starting a treasure map. When we first started reading your book, I found it really difficult to continue the treasure map, sort of announcing to the universe all the things that I hope to see manifest in my life, and at the same time, stay in the present moment. Do you think the idea of treasure mapping is inconsistent with being in the now moment?

I don't think it is, because the only time when you can practice it is in the now. But the question is whether you have found the foundation for all power in the present moment, or whether you are still looking to the future for some kind of self-fulfillment, for the future to finally give you the sense that you have arrived, that you are somebody, that you are being recognized, that finally you can feel, at some point when you have the house and the car, that finally you can feel abundant when that comes, because right now you are not feeling abundant.

Why are you not feeling abundant? Because you are denying the now. So, you have to first find the foundation for abundance.

Abundance has very little to do with the number of things in your life. Abundance is the state of being. Abundance arises out of life itself, the being of life, which life is being, the I am.

Being and I am is the same thing, it just sounds like different words, because I am is the first person singular of the infinitive to be, for those who have missed grammar at school. The infinitive is to be, the first person singular is I am, so it's the same word. So, when we talk about being, how do you experience being?

You can only experience being as the I am. And the I am is the foundation for all abundance, it's the realization of the fullness of being in yourself, which has nothing to do with the number of objects in your life. So, you find the fullness of being, Jesus pointed to it when he said, I want you to have life and I want you to have the fullness of life.

In some Bibles it's translated as abundant life. I want you to have abundant life, he said. Now, if you look deeply, you will see very soon that he is not talking about many possessions, he is talking about the sense of the fullness of being in yourself.

Not shopping malls, not that he wasn't prophesying the arrival of shopping malls. But finding that present moment, that deeply satisfying sense of beingness that comes when you enter the present moment fully and become friendly with now, go deeply into now. That's the vertical dimension of life, the now, which to most people doesn't exist.

They only know the horizontal, past, future, things, where am I, where can I find myself, I need to attain this. And then they might say, I want to make a treasure map, and then finally I can attain that. And so often, of course, people are not successful quite often with their treasure maps because there is the erroneous belief that they need to achieve something that's over there in the future, that they need to get that in order to feel the fulfillment and the fulfilled sense of self.

And even if they do get what they want, it will still not lead them to the fulfillment. Even if they do get the house and the car, they may sometimes do, even if they do get it, but they haven't found the fullness of life that can only be found in the now. Then for a little while they are elated, I made it, I made it.

And then they sit there in the big house and say, okay, what now, where do I go from here? Okay, I need to invite lots of people so that they can reaffirm to me that I'm somebody, that my house is bigger than theirs. And so you do that for a while, and then that doesn't work either.

And so you come to an emptiness when it often has happened with people who have achieved materially what they wanted to achieve, and yet they still feel empty. And sometimes it's at that point, either they become even more miserable or they begin taking drugs just to don't feel the pain anymore of the unfulfilled life, and you can't fool yourself anymore when you have achieved materially almost everything, and you're still unhappy, where can you go from there? You can't fool yourself that even more houses would make you finally happy.

Well, some try even that. So the foundation is the present moment and the fullness of life now, and so when you feel the fullness and then you look at a treasure map, you are now, the approach is very different, you are playing. There's a playfulness in the world of form.

You are playing because you are in this world of form, and part of being in this world of form is to interact with the forms of life. And why not try this out, see if I can manifest, not to find some fulfillment, but as a joyful, playful game with form. And then you look at your treasure map and you feel, whatever it is you are looking at, the house, you feel totally fulfilled already in that moment.

Obtaining the house couldn't possibly lead you to greater fulfillment. This happened to me, I drew spontaneously a picture, a circle on a sheet of paper before I ever wrote a book, and that said, book, it came to me one day spontaneously with colors, I drew the circle, book, and then I wrote, this was not so much me wanting to write a book, as something in me expressing what it wanted, the consciousness, and I wrote, translating into many languages, changing the lives of hundreds of thousands of people.

Millions. Millions, I didn't know that. And so it all came to pass, I had completely forgotten about this sheet of paper, and a few years ago I unpacked things that had been forwarded from England, a trunk, and I looked through it and I saw this old paper, and there was the power of now, and I looked in amazement, it had all come to pass, but I didn't want, this was so much a reality, this sheet of paper, that I already felt the fullness and the power of the power of now, I felt it already there, I didn't feel any greater or better when the book was out.

It was the same, the same feeling. So if you can feel the power, the unmanifested power, and then you can look at certain forms and play with forms, what flows into the manifestation is the unmanifested power, that expresses itself in many ways. One of the ways in which the unmanifested power, the one power, the one life, can express itself and wants to express itself, because this is a universe that creates form continuously, on so many levels, billions of life forms, so on that level, the universe wants to experience form, so you are part of that, you can take part in that game, the universe, this is the game of creating forms, and enjoying forms, and so you can do that if the foundation is the present moment, and then you are not dependent on your creation, and you realize, of course, whatever you create, at some point it will leave you again, or you leave it, and that's fine, so you are not dependent on the outer form to give you a sense of fulfillment, only then can you be successful at truly manifesting.

So that's the finding the power first within yourself. In this world there are two movements, one is the outgoing movement of the universe, which is the creation of form, greater and greater differentiation, the universe, they say, they may be right on some level, not on the deepest level, it started from a zero point of oneness, the astronomers say there was a big bang, and the zero point, and nobody can say what was there before then, before then they say there was nothing, very strange, so out of the nothingness came the thingness of the world, the multitude of things, what the ancient Chinese texts call the ten thousand things, they didn't realize at that time it's billions of things, and so there is the outward movement of the universe, the creation of form, and the wanting to experience the form, but there is another movement in the universe, which is the return to the source, the two movements are there, the forms go out, but there is also, and every human being has the two movements inside him or her, one is the outward movement into creation, and one is the return movement home to the source, to the oneness, which in essence is the spiritual dimension, the spiritual dimension is the return movement of the universe, and the universe also wants that, it wants to know itself in its essence, it not only wants to create forms and lose itself in the forms, that's part of the game, it also wants to find itself after having lost itself, it wants to find itself and know itself deeply for the first time, and this actually is happening through the human form, and probably through other forms in the universe, which has the same movement, because as above, so below, so you are an expression of this universal cosmic two-fold movement, the outer and the return home, the outgoing and the return home, and you are in between these two, so don't lose yourself in the outgoing, that's a great danger, and this has happened to a large part of humanity, they lost themselves in the outgoing cycle, but ultimately even that the universe wanted, because nothing happens that the universe doesn't want, so you lose yourself in the outgoing, until finally the outgoing becomes so problematic and so differentiated, and then the return starts, back to the source, and then you can actually live balancing the two, connected to the source, and this I believe is the new earth, the new reality that's being created in this dimension, and humans can create that, which is create form without losing their connectedness with the essence of being, with God, and then that could lead to a kind of dimension that would be absolute bliss, also temporary, nothing last, but this would be a beautiful dimension, when on the planet humans live, who create things, but don't lose their connectedness with being, so then you could say that it's conscious creation, rather than unconscious creation.

[Speaker 1] (6:22:34 - 9:29:51)

This is question, I would see if I can keep the answers a little shorter than usual. But who knows? I can't guarantee it.

This is a question from somebody living in Saudi Arabia. "'Peace, Mr. Eckhart, I live in Saudi Arabia. "'I'm afraid if I stay in Saudi Arabia, "'I might lose this little light.

"'Should I emigrate to another culture? "'I feel responsible for my parents.' "'It is true that some places are more conducive "'to living consciously than others. "'There are energy fields, "'there are places where the energy field is more helpful, "'and there are places where the energy field "'seems to be more of a hindrance than a help.

"'So if you are able to move to an energy field "'that is more conducive, then do it. "'If there are strong reasons why you cannot, "'or you decide there are factors in your life, "'like in this case, this person's parents may need him, "'who knows, I don't know how old the questioner is. "'It is also true that anywhere, wherever you are, "'you can be present.

"'And if you are in a place "'that would not normally be considered conducive "'to being present, it is sometimes precisely there "'that you are forced to go deeper, "'as it is precisely, very often, "'in life circumstances that would usually be considered "'unfavorable or not suitable for spiritual advancement. "'It's precisely there that the motivation "'for awakening becomes particularly strong.'" I have, a while ago, when I was, I believe I gave a talk on Sufism, maybe one or two years ago, and I may have read from a little book of Sufi stories, the story about the young man, a wandering Sufi, although nobody recognized him as a Sufi, somewhere in the Middle East or North Africa. He looked a bit lost, so he was walking through a city, and this one of the most powerful men in the city looked at him and came and said, "'You must be an escaped slave.

"'You don't seem to know where you're going, "'so you come and work for me. "'You're now my slave. "'Have you been looking for your master?' And the young man said, "'Yes, I've been looking for my master for a long time.'" And so this powerful man said, "'Okay, you can work in my mansion or palace, and the young man said, "'Okay.'" And for several years, I don't know how many, 10 years or whatever, he worked as a servant and slave for this powerful man. And then after a number of years, this man, perhaps he became a little bit more conscious. He became a little bit guilty about having made this man into his servant or slave. So he said, "'Okay, you can go now.

"'I'll give you your freedom.'" And the young man said, "'Oh, thank you.'" And he wandered on to his next destination. And he eventually became, unfortunately, I don't remember his name. He became, this young man became one of the great Sufi masters and became the teacher of many other Sufi masters.

So what is the significance of that story? The significance of that story is that you can use any life circumstance for awakening. And of course, we are speaking here not of overcoming, but of transcending.

So it seems that almost this young man consciously entered that to see, to discover within himself the transcendent dimension where outer circumstances become virtually irrelevant. So being a slave, that drove him deeper. And perhaps he knew that when he agreed and said, perhaps he knew already that he needed that limitation on his life in order to embrace more deeply the transcendent dimension.

So it was, one could say, in spite of his conditions, he was able to go deeper. And probably when he went to the deepest place of realization, it was then that the master said to him, the man said to him, you are free to go now. So the entire, that entire period in his life became really his spiritual practice.

And he must have known that he needed that limitation on his life in order to go deeper into the vertical dimension. If he had wandered on totally freely, perhaps it would not have happened. So, or perhaps life probably eventually would have given him some other limitation.

Life tends to do that. And so whatever limitation there is in your life then has that function of taking the focus into the vertical dimension. So more and more, he, this young man, disidentified from the external form of his position and so on.

There was a disidentification from all the forms of his life. And he went deeper and deeper into the formless and realizing himself as awareness, as consciousness. And my interpretation of the story is that at the moment of his deepest realization, the man said, you're now free to go.

And then as the story goes, he wandered on to Mecca and then started teaching. So his spiritual training was being a slave. A lovely story.

So this might be helpful. So the, if you can change the circumstances, usually I would say, don't, this is an extreme. The story is an extreme form of the spiritual awakening.

Usually I would not recommend that you seek out limitations in your life because there's enough with life. So whatever life gives you, use that. Spiritual history is full of people who were seeking for, well, all these penance and deprivation, self deprivation.

And of course there is a reason why to Western eyes, it sometimes looks very strange. There are people who deprive themselves of every comfort, who sleep on the rough surface in cold weather and who meditate in the middle of the winter in cold rooms for hours on end, or more extreme forms that you find sometimes in India, people who stand on one leg for years or whatever. And the Western, I say, why are they doing that?

There is a reason for that. And that is to bring about a dissident, complete disidentification from form and from whatever pain arises. So it's an attempt.

I don't know whether they know this or whether they just inherited as an almost a tradition, an attempt to reclaim, to take all identification out so that consciousness can be experienced in its pure non-form. This is for us, it's unlikely that for any of you standing on one leg for several years is the path, but it's to be, I respect all forms of spiritual practice, but in many cases, even that can become ego. And there are many holy men walking around India too who are making a living being a holy man.

It's a living and you get quite a bit of respect. There are others that are genuine. So you have to be able to tell the difference.

Is this a holy, is this an ego, ego G, holy man? Or is this a true holy man or woman? So in India, being a spiritual holy person can be a living.

In the West, it would be difficult, but who knows? So use with the limitations that life gives you. You don't have to seek out further suffering.

It's enough what you get. Life gives you what you need. That's all you need to know.

So whatever comes to you is for you to work with, to practice with, to either overcome or transcend or both overcome at the same time with detachment. Transcendence happens. I haven't been invited yet to Saudi Arabia, but if it should happen, then I may go.

And it's a very traditional country, I understand. Welcome. We are live in the present moment.

Usually when we do our live teaching or live meditation, I'm on the North American West Coast and it's one o'clock PM. But today I'm in Amsterdam and it's 10 o'clock PM. And for the first time, I'm using a webcam, which is quite close to my face.

So I feel really close to you. The room we are sitting in here is quite still apart from the occasional car passing by, not very often. And you may also hear the ticking of a clock, which is actually a very old Dutch standing clock.

And it may also chime. The main thing for our meditation tonight is becoming still or rather noticing that the stillness is already in you, waiting to be discovered. So our session today probably is going to be a kind of transmission of stillness.

For the transmission to be received, it requires you to have access to a little bit of stillness inside you. And that little bit of stillness can receive the transmission, recognize itself in the transmission and then know itself more fully. If you can hear the ticking of the clock, that's of course, that signifies time.

And underneath and in between the ticking of the clock is the stillness, which signifies the timeless. Timeless consciousness. That timeless consciousness is the essence of who you are.

So as we sit here together, if it works for you, it means that the person is receding and presence is arising. And there's a shift suddenly in identity. Your sense of self is no longer derived from the silly person.

Every person is more or less silly with its judgments and all the mind stuff and the expectations and the shoulds and the shouldn'ts and the complaints and the regrets and the constant focus on future or past. Its resentments and grievances and anxieties and problems. God.

And there is another dimension of consciousness in you that's far deeper than the person. The person is a surface movement of that consciousness, fleeting, insubstantial, the ripples on the surface. And as the presence arises in you, you feel suddenly your connectedness with enormous power.

Energy, intelligence, and you're rooted in that. It is who you are ultimately, and that's always there. And that is where fear ends.

Fear can only exist on the surface where the person lives. And the natural condition of the surface entity is fear, often disguised as other things. And the absence of fear really means that for the first time you can actually feel the deep trust.

Absence of fear means trust. So you can feel a deep trust in life. You are connected with, you are one with something vast.

And through you, it emanates into this world, and either directly without your mind, like here now, this is an emanation of presence, but also it can flow into your mind and use your mind and inspire your thoughts and words and actions. Presence is felt or sensed with your entire body. Every cell of the body is alive with that presence.

Can you be in that state of alert presence continuously? Well, probably not, but it can be there in the background of your life, even while you are active, doing things, speaking, thinking, and yet you sense that spacious stillness in the background, in between two thoughts, and perhaps even while you're thinking. Then thinking happens in the foreground and that spacious, aware presence is in the background.

This, for example, is happening here now when I speak. The mind is being used and that's the foreground and there is in the background, this wonderful, vast, spacious stillness. Even though you may be able to enter the presence here, you may still find in certain situations, you lose it completely.

That's okay. Afterwards, you realize you'd lost it. While you lose the presence, you don't know you're losing the presence.

It just happens. A reaction takes over. The habitual mind pattern takes over.

The habitual mental, emotional reaction and some people have very deeply entrenched patterns in their mental, emotional field. Those patterns are an aspect of what the East calls karma and some people carry quite a heavy burden of karma. Usually, karma is interpreted as the things that happen to you in your life, the situation you're born into, parents, things that happen to you, the country, the energy field in which you grow up, all the relationships and so on and so on.

That is an aspect of karma, but more fundamentally, karma is not what happens to you, but more fundamentally, karma is how you react to what happens to you, how you deal with situations and people and challenges. You can magnify the difficulties and the challenges through reactivity, so you have heavy karma, or you may have so-called good karma, in which case the conditioning of your mind is relatively okay, it will have its limitations. There may be some presence already, but the only thing that really transmutes karma is the arising of presence and it will transmute even deeply entrenched karmic patterns, reactions that you don't seem to be able to get rid of.

It happened again and again, but it may take time. For the timeless to burn up, karma may take a little bit of time, not as much time as it took for karma, for those patterns to form thousands and thousands of years. And there's no reason why those dysfunctional patterns that make your life difficult cannot be transmuted or burned up through presence in this lifetime.

But you have to want presence, you have to choose presence. You have to want to be free. You have to want peace within yourself and not think something is more important out there than the inner peace within me.

And so the Course in Miracles says, I quote now, I want the peace of God. To say these words means nothing, but to mean these words means everything. Nobody can mean these words and not be healed, end of quote.

And those of you who have deeply entrenched heavy karmic patterns will be forced to go deeper into presence. Presence needs to be more acute to burn up those patterns. So you're forced to go deeper into greater alertness.

Otherwise the patterns will not become transmuted. Some harmless patterns may always remain. Every human has a certain form, there may be certain habit patterns that do not cause any problems, and they may well survive in the light of presence.

Destructive patterns, destructive of yourself and others, problem making patterns, deeply negative patterns cannot survive in the light of presence. But you need to choose presence as much as possible. And I'm saying this to you because there is enough presence in you to be able to choose presence.

Without any presence, you cannot choose it. So ultimately it is presence that chooses presence. And it helps to be a little bit fed up with you, the person, same old stuff again and again, same old conflicts and problems, same thoughts, same complaints, same grievances, same anxieties, just small changes on the surface, but basically the same.

And so you may be fed up with the kind of life that those patterns produce, and that's a good thing. Some people at that point may consider suicide. I don't advise it.

There's something much better than that. And that is called, and I hope you are not shocked when I say it, or run away and switch on the television. That which is so much better than suicide, which I do not recommend because the unconscious patterns survive and they will seek a new body and then you'll end up with the same problems.

So that which is much better than suicide and which may shock you, but I'm telling this to you because you are all advanced. You're all well on the way to wake, full awakening. That which is much better than the person is self-annihilation of the person.

It's a kind of suicide, but a good one, which simply means you'd rather be present than the person. You'd rather be the presence than the person. And it means you're no longer addicted to thinking, which keeps the person continuously going.

But as much as possible, you choose not to think right now. The present moment. You can never be fully aligned with the present moment if you're imposing thought on it, and you cannot be truly aligned with life if you are imposing continuously your conditioned interpretations on.

So you choose, many of you are already able to do that as much as possible when thinking is not required. When you do your work, it may be required. Depends what kind of work you do.

In certain professions, very little thinking is required. You won't be good at it if you think. If you're a dancer, you can't be thinking while you dance.

Quite a few other professions, jobs, activities can be performed better in presence than when you're thinking. Other things may require thinking. If you're an accountant, you have to think.

Many other jobs may require thinking. That's fine. Using the mind for practical purposes.

But as much as possible, find the space. Don't be engaged in a continuous stream of thinking the whole day long. Find the spaces.

Choose. Why chime so many times when it's only half past 10? I don't know.

That's a mystery. So choose not to think. That's the self annihilation of the person.

You do it in the present moment. You just are alert and you face the present moment wherever it's there, whatever is there in alert presence. Why do you need to think?

If there is something to think, you will think beautifully. That, so that's why I said it may be good if you feel fed up with you, the person, because then you're ready to enter, embark on the process of self annihilation where the person is ready to go. There's so much presence that the person recedes and the patterns that make up the person become weaker and weaker, especially their deeply unconscious patterns that have been holding the ego in place for a long, long time.

The incarnation, your incarnation and mine and everybody's incarnation is relatively short in this lifetime. In addition, the planet is rapidly approaching a critical point. So the time is now and you need an almost, not quite, but almost aggressive determination to be present and that's not really aggression.

There's a sharpness to it. There is a power to it that cuts through all the BS that makes up the person. And I sometimes call that the sword of presence that cuts through time.

So if not now, when? When are you going to be ready? And then another being, one could almost say, emerges out of the dissolving person.

That's one way of putting it. And that's the true meaning of rebirth, which Jesus used that term. Rebirth is not some emotional high followed by a low, but something much more profound.

And as presence emerges where there was a person for a while, the aspect of the person always remain as long as you're in this incarnation. But the presence becomes stronger than the person. Who you are becomes predominantly the presence and just in the background, there's still the person.

And sometimes the person is in the foreground again, because we call this the awakening process. So a being, one could almost say, emerges, but the chicken cannot come out of the shell, the egg, until it cracks open. And that is the self-annihilation of the person.

And I'm saying self-annihilation for some people, it happens naturally, life does it to them. It annihilates their fictitious sense of identity by creating enormous amount of loss or suffering. And it can happen through that, in the absence of any spiritual teaching, no spiritual teaching, just suffering, suffering, suffering.

And suddenly it can happen that way also, can eliminate all the unconscious pattern that pretend to be somebody. But you don't have to wait for that. It's actually much more pleasant to choose and easier.

And you may find the strange thing is, even as the being, this new being or the being, it's being itself shines through more and more. It's quite possible that some people that have known you for a long time, may not notice anything. They may, but it's also quite possible that they may not notice anything.

Family members, friends, you feel a different, a completely different being, and yet they don't seem to notice anything. And that is because many people, who are unconscious, people who are unconscious, they don't see you, they see the image they have of you in their minds. And if they've had an image of you for many, many years, they may not be able to see beyond the mental image they have of you.

So they won't know, that's fine. Wonderful, one of the many ways in which you'll feel liberated as presence arises, you do not need other people's recognition or acknowledgement. You do not even need other people to notice you.

In fact, it feels quite good not to be noticed. And you've realized you're more powerful as the valley than the mountain. There's greater depths to you as the valley.

So the ego situation arises, so the ego says, he completely ignored me. I was there in the room and he completely ignored me. How dare he completely ignore me?

And presence loves it. Don't need to be acknowledged. Because you're already sufficient unto yourself, at least you're in touch with life itself.

You don't need the substitutes anymore. But the wonderful thing is when you don't need the substitute anymore, you get them. Tend to recognition, people liking you.

Thank you. Welcome to our meditation. People all over the planet at the same time, now opening up to the spaciousness inside, inner space, that which is prior to thoughts, prior to emotions, prior to sense perceptions.

Always there, can be called stillness, presence, inner space. You just have to pay attention to it. And that attention already is it.

Attention to awareness or awareness of awareness. In other words, you become conscious right now of the fact that you are conscious. You can actually sense consciousness that you are beyond the person.

Completely non-conceptual, nothing to do with thinking. It's that which transcends the person and that which transcends the world. Without awareness of that, the world and the person are troublesome.

And without awareness of that, the world will inspire fear because it's not all that stable, continuous flux, especially at this time, even if we are not affected directly by upheavals that are happening or have recently happened in different parts of the world, Japan, earthquake, tsunami, nuclear reactors, North Africa, upheavals, Middle East. Even if we are not directly affected, we can get a heightened sense, just knowing that this is going on, we can get a heightened sense of the fact that the world is not all that safe. Some people would say it's not safe anymore.

It never was safe, of course. It never is safe. It cannot be and is not meant to be safe.

It's the world of form continuously changing. So whether it's your personal life, if you're clinging for security, there's nothing wrong with arranging your life so that externally you have a certain degree of security to the extent to which it is possible. But if you're looking to, beyond the practical, if you're looking to the world of form, whether it is the structures around you, whether it's in your personal life, through relationship or through your job or through your life insurance, whether you look to that for a sense of inner peace, what is sometimes called peace of mind, or whether you look to the collective structures of your economy, social structures, whether you look to that for a sense of security, it cannot provide you with that for too long. So it's finding something within where a true sense of safety arises that has nothing to do with the externals of your life, personal or collective.

Then if some kind of disaster comes, and of course, inevitably, some kind of disaster will come because this body is going to die, that's a big disaster, sooner or later. And of course, other disasters may happen or may not happen or small, small ways in which things around you dissolve, doesn't have to be a big disaster. It's often those collective disasters that can bring about a leap in awareness in many people who are personally affected by that.

If that is your destiny, that's fine. It may not be your destiny to be affected by some collective disaster. I am sitting here in California at the moment, probably on a fault line.

So there is no absolute security that this chair that I'm sitting on and the floor the chair's on is still going to be here in 20 minutes time before we finish. It probably will be, we can't be sure. Or even that this body will still be alive in 20 minutes time, probably, we can't be sure.

Now it's for many people, it's the challenge of major or minor disasters in their lives that can push them into awakening. Without disaster, and I'm using this term now in a very wide sense, meaning any kind of dissolution of form around you, without that, consciousness would not even evolve. So although on one level, it is true to say that disaster, it is tragic.

Yes, it's terrible. Yes, true. On another level, that also is part of, is a part of a much larger context.

And that larger context is the evolution of consciousness here. Consciousness, of course, is the formless essence within you, not a personal possession. So somehow the fluctuation of forms is part of the way in which consciousness evolves here in this dimension and comes into this dimension more fully.

The dimension of time, the timeless coming into the dimension of time. There's a paradox here, but that's how it is. The timeless within you coming into your personal life of time, that which is beyond the person, shining through the person.

And that is security. Because you can then sense beyond any conceptual explanations or beliefs, you can sense that which is timeless in you, which means eternal, which means indestructible beyond death. It's not that consciousness, don't believe mainstream culture, which tells you that consciousness is an epiphenomenon or a by-product of brain activity.

The brain is born out of consciousness, not the other way around. There's a modicum of consciousness, even in this chair or wherever you look, even inanimate, all around you. All the forms around you are consciousness having taken on a temporary form.

Life, another word for it. So there's life and there are forms of life. You move in that between the two, that's the balancing act, the dance of life between who you are in your essence, which you can sense at this very moment.

If this has any meaning to you, you can sense at this very moment that which is beyond the person in you, which is just the light of consciousness. And you're also aware of, you're still a person in the form. But the security, sense of security can never come from the forms.

That's always an illusory security if it's there. And illusory security is always threatened by an underlying fear. True security, true peace of mind, to use that expression, although it's not the mind, we do not need for disaster to happen in our lives to find that.

And perhaps if we find that without a disaster, or because we've already had our disasters and it has taken us there, perhaps we don't need to experience further external disaster. But if we do, it'll just be a deepening. It will result in a deepening.

Please know that the words that are being spoken here are only moving on the surface. Underneath the words, which you hear, which become concepts in your mind, underneath that is that to which the words point, that which is beyond concepts, beyond words, the underlying, deeper sense of beingness, which is consciousness itself. So as you sit here, as we sit here, as I sit here, I can sense that.

It's a little silly to quantify it, but I could say as I speak here, and this can also be true for you as you listen, 80% of my consciousness, or maybe 90% is just an aware presence. And the remaining 20 or 10% is the mind formulating thoughts, which become words. But the mind that is formulating thoughts is inspired by that which is beyond thoughts.

It's just giving expression, always very limited, to that which cannot be spoken, but can be sensed in here and now. Some traditions may call it the higher self or whatever. It doesn't, as long as higher doesn't mean that you, that concept could mislead you into thinking that it's floating up there.

I'm looking for my higher self. So you're already looking somewhere else. Maybe inner, if your inner self would be a better, deeper self, essential self, or don't call it a self at all as the Buddhists do, the no self, the empty space, or call it the fullness.

The main thing is not to get attached to any concept, but just use it as a pointer. What's important is not the concept as an explanation, but that to which it points. That's why we're here.

So it's important when you listen to the news to be in touch with that space within. And then you can, if you feel compelled to take action, inspired to take action on the outer level to help one way or another, that's fine. But be rooted in the formless.

Every human being is a temporary manifestation in form of the one formless consciousness, which is evolving. And death and destruction is tragic on one level, which cannot be denied, and is part of something greater that can be sensed, not made into some explanation, but it needs to be known directly within you where death and destruction is no longer terrible. So as you sit here, it's an opportunity to be in spacious awareness.

And that is, of course, an enormous shift in consciousness from the normal state of compulsive thinking to spacious awareness right now, in which it seems that you don't know anything anymore. But in which you are connected to the source of all knowing. For any creative person, and everybody is meant to be creative, to fulfill his or her function, it's essential to enter the state of not knowing.

And then let action come out of that. Let words come out of that if they want to. Or just contemplation of the beauty of this world, which is also creative, if you can look around and see the aliveness and depths and beauty of everything.

Because you're no longer burdening the world with your mental concepts, which become the heavy person. And billions of heavy persons are strangling the planet. The act of just creative perception of everything around you.

A sense of wonder and aliveness. Even that's enough. Because what is that?

It is the universe becoming aware of itself. What it, it's saying, wow. You're not separate from the totality of the universe.

Whatever happens in you is part of the totality of the universe. And if you become conscious of the beauty of everything around you, the aliveness, the sacredness, then the universe is becoming conscious of its own creations. The consciousness that you are manifested the plants behind me, in front of me, everything.

The consciousness that you are. So you, you created all that. You are creating it at this moment by perceiving it.

So a conscious person cannot not be creative. And this is conscious, consciousness becoming conscious because it's been a dreamlike state of creating the world dream. Of course, the world dream continues, but in the middle of the world dream, the dreamer is becoming conscious.

And then the dream is no longer threatening. And even the nature of the dream changes. Not that anything is permanent, even in a more pleasant dream, but that's fine.

The demands that things should be permanent isn't there anymore. Freedom from what kept you imprisoned, the conditioned, mind made, sense of self, which we call the person or personality, freedom from that is just the most incredible liberation. And for the rest of your life, you still function as a person, but always at the back, there's the spacious awareness, even while in the foreground, you function as a person or personality.

If that's, that is a shift. And so the rest of your life here is living consciously in that way. Never becoming absorbed by the foreground of your life, which is so seductive, the pull of every thought, the pull of every emotion, every reaction, very seductive.

But your challenge is not to be completely pulled into these arising forms all the time. Yes, you interact with them, you deal with them, but always having a sense of spaciousness there, even as you discuss things, respond to people, deal with situations, listen, speak. The vital question for any person who is in the process of awakening at any moment is, at this moment, is there space in me?

Can I still sense that spaciousness in the background, so to speak? Or am I totally being absorbed by the foreground? That is the dreadful condition.

It's still normal. So nobody knows it's dreadful because it's, everybody's doing it. And then the rest of your life, your so-called life, is an adventure where you experiment with that, you continuously, and you will lose yourself many times in the foreground.

And suddenly you come back. The important thing is coming back. The important thing is not how many, the losing yourself is not important, but are you coming back?

Every time you come back, aware again of the spacious background, there's a growth in consciousness. More consciousness has come into this world through this form. And as a byproduct of that, relatively insignificant, your life becomes more pleasant.

Flows with greater ease. A deeper intelligence takes over. And of course, love.

You approach things, situations, with awareness of the spacious background, as you deal with the foreground, is loving. Very different from what the ego would call love. Welcome to our live meditation, or whatever you want to call it.

Becoming comfortable with just being, but remaining alert. Become aware that there are moments when you're not thinking. And then thought happens again.

And then there's another moment of just spacious presence. Which could arise spontaneously, or you could invite it into your life. Consciously bring more spacious presence into your life.

In daily life, with a simple thing like, for example, occasionally looking up in the sky Well, I don't see the sky here, because there are trees out there, but mostly, usually there's some sky somewhere. Look up at the sky. And for a moment, be aware of whatever is there, whether it's clouds, or clear sky, or completely overcast.

Just be aware of the totality of the sky, which is a vast spaciousness, without calling it anything in your mind. Just looking at the sky during the day. It's amazing that people go throughout, many people go throughout the day without ever really being aware of the sky above.

Because they're so concerned with what's happening down here below. So they're never aware of that spaciousness that surrounds them. So just looking at the sky, brings about a moment of spaciousness, and an interruption in the flow, or the stream of thinking, identification with which constitutes the person, the personal selfhood, sense of self.

So sometimes that arises spontaneously in the mind. In your daily life, a moment of space, a gap between thoughts. And when you don't know, you're not really aware of it, then you only sense it as a moment that feels good, a moment where you feel some joy, or a heightened sense of aliveness, or some inner peace, or even just a contentment with what is.

And usually that means, there's been a gap has arisen in the stream of thinking. You may not know that, and may only interpret it as, as I said, peace, joy, aliveness, happiness, generic term that covers all of those. And when you become conscious of it, when it arises spontaneously, then it can deepen, and you can be in it for longer.

You can be in the timeless dimension for longer. Slight paradox, I'm talking about it from the dimension of form, where there's time, looking at the times, and then the paradoxical statement arises, you can be in the timeless for longer. I've told the story before, some of you may know it, when I lived in London, and traveled on the underground, or the tube, or the subway, every day, there were a couple of stations where there was a more than usually wide gap between the train and the platform.

So when the train arrived at the platform, the doors opened, and the recorded announcement would say, mind the gap, and repeat again and again, mind the gap, mind the gap. Well, and of course, some tourists who didn't know English well enough, there was something more, gap, what's gap, where's the gap? And then they would fall into the gap.

But that could be a spiritual pointer. Be aware of the gap, the inner gap, be aware of what is a gap? A gap is a space between two things.

I don't think that's a dictionary definition of it, but I would define it as the space between two things. There's one thing there, and there's one thing there, in the middle, there's nothing, there's the gap, no thing. So finding the gap inside you between two thoughts, either being aware of it as it arises spontaneously in your life, when you're looking at beauty, or something new and unusual before you interpret it, there's a moment of just spacious perception, and there's the gap.

Look at the sky. Okay? So let's say you're working on your computer, and then the phone rings, you answer, and the text messages come in, and then you become aware of, okay, the moment of spaciousness, and then you look at the sky, completely different state of consciousness immediately arises.

And give yourself half a minute, or one minute to look at the sky. Half a minute is fine. It's not that long.

It brings about a gap when the stream of thinking subsides. And this, the most important thing you can do, if you even want to call it doing, because it frees you from being here only as the person, and you become aware that there is another dimension to who you are, which is the, traditionally called the spiritual dimension. The spiritual dimension is not elsewhere.

It's a dimension within you, where who you are as a person is transcended. And if you don't find that transcendence in your daily life, then there is no spiritual dimension in your daily life. Even if you talk about it, quote spiritual books, there's still no spiritual dimension in your daily life, unless there's the gap.

And it becomes as familiar to be the space as it is to be the person. In fact, more familiar, more satisfying. You really feel that there you are yourself.

In that space. Of course, there are other ways in which you can invite that gap, that space into your life apart from looking at the sky. Anything natural you look at can be helpful and bring about the gap, the tree.

But you have to look innocently with innocent perception, not judging it, comparing it, or referring to your knowledge or memory about it or associations, mental associations, none of that. Just looking like a child who hasn't learned the names yet. So you can either look at one thing and sense the spaciousness behind the perception, the peace, or you can look at the totality of whatever surrounds you.

Whether it's the room or you look out of the window, or if you're outside, just take in the totality of your surroundings, no matter where you are. You could be in a mansion or in a prison cell. It works in the same way.

And then you become aware of, yes, there's all these perceptions, but there's also a sense of spaciousness behind them. Peace. And when you access that dimension, whether you live in a mansion or a prison cell, still, of course, makes a difference in your life, but it's no longer of absolute importance, that's how I put it.

It is of relative importance. Before you have access to that dimension, whatever happens in your life is of absolute importance. It absorbs you completely.

It determines your happiness or unhappiness. Would I rather be in the mansion than in a prison cell? Yes, of course I would.

That doesn't have to be a mansion. It could be a lovely cabin in the woods. But if I had to be in a prison cell, I could still be the space for it and look around and surrender to whatever is there.

So just looking around you is another way of, if you don't name it, of being the space rather than being the person. Then after a while, the person comes back and you start thinking again about your past and your future and your problems and what you have to deal with and people around you. But imagine living all your life with nothing but that, thinking about things you have to deal with and people around you, the situation and liking it and disliking it, and reacting to it and your inner state, depending on whatever happens to be happening around you whether the person close to you is nice or not nice.

Terrible. At the mercy of whatever happens, a little thing falls and you go, you're upset. And never really happy anywhere.

There's always something missing. And then figuring out in your mind how you can become happy. Never getting there.

Because you haven't found who you are beyond the person. Having moments of insight while you meditate in formal meditation, where suddenly perhaps you have a glimpse of, just being the presence, being the space. That's wonderful.

But it needs to translate into everyday life. Otherwise you can only be free when you sit cross-legged on the floor and have your eyes closed and your hands in a particular position and then you go, oh, and then you open your eyes again and it's time to get up. And immediately you're flooded with mental stuff, stream of things.

So you're just meditating. What do I have to do now? So therefore I say it is more important if you have formal meditation, it can be a wonderful help.

Even more important it is to have spacious moments throughout the day so that you become liberated from your attachment to the person, your complete identification with the person. And then the depths within you is there. You suddenly feel, sense that you are deeper than you thought and ever could think.

Because in that spacious presence where you are the unconditioned consciousness that is not confined to this body, that is where you are connected with the one universal consciousness and it merges with the one universal consciousness. So when you look at a statue of the Buddha, this is not the statue of a person that once lived. Nobody knows what the Buddha looked like.

The statue of the Buddha represents a state of consciousness and it is the state of consciousness of being the presence, transcending the person. And that's why the good statues of the Buddha have a hint of a smile because that is where true peace is found, alive peace. And so the Buddha goes like freedom from the person.

And therefore, of course, enlightenment, so-called enlightenment would mean, means to be throughout in your daily life in continuous connection with that dimension, the transcendent dimension. So the person never takes over completely. It still operates.

Therefore, enlightenment is, of course, not a personal achievement. It's there when the person makes room for something deeper. With some people it comes when the person gets battered by life so much that it crumbles the personal sense of self, suffers so much that finally it crumbles and suddenly there's that sense of deep peace and people don't know where that comes from.

Don't wait for that. It doesn't have to be that way. But if it is, then that's fine too.

So noticing when that spacious presence arises spontaneously in your life, perhaps when you look at a baby, it could be there, when you, there's a dog and you look at the dog and you feel the essence of the dog, the life essence, the being of the dog. Perhaps you feel it more easily than the being of another person because the person has a lot of mental stuff in the way. And for a moment, there's a sense of joy or aliveness.

It arises spontaneously. And then in addition, you're invited. I'd mentioned looking at the sky.

I mentioned looking at nature, either one particular thing or looking at the totality of whatever surrounds you, even if it's not nature, even if it's just the room, just look around. And so you, the person in that moment, are not there. You're not, the person is no longer operating when you really look around you because you don't remember at that moment your past or your problems or your name or your date of birth or your ex-wife or ex-husband.

And you don't remember to think about the future. You're not interested in the next moment, what might come tomorrow. At that moment of pure perception, none of this operates.

So that's why I say the person isn't there in that moment. And you are, you become the perceiving consciousness and you are aware of yourself as the perceiving consciousness. If that doesn't, if you can't bring that into your life daily, then there's no spiritual dimension in your life.

Even if you've read a thousand spiritual books, even if you've attended many retreats and workshops, even if you have lived in a monastery for 30 years. Another way of inviting presence, of course, is a conscious breath, as I've often said, and it's well known that that is a good way of meditating, breath awareness. It doesn't have to be, however, a long meditation.

It can be a moment of one conscious breath in and out. Conscious means you're aware as you breathe in. You feel the air flowing into your body and you're there with your attention.

And there's no effort involved. You're not doing anything. You're just observing what's happening.

So the breath awareness is not a doing. If it's a doing, then it's not really working. So there's just, and during that gap or space, you are not a person.

You are the presence. So that's another way of inviting that dimension into your life. And you may notice that gradually, your absorption in the stream of thinking becomes less complete as you bring more spaces, moments of spaciousness into your life.

That also affects the way in which your mind operates. So thought still can draw you in, but after a while you notice it doesn't draw you in 100%. And that's the next step is that you find even while you're thinking, there's still an awareness of yourself as the space in which these thoughts happen.

So you're not totally identified with the thinking anymore. And that's the beginning of the end of ego because ego is complete identification with thoughts and the emotions that go with the thoughts. They come to come together.

And then after a while, there's a continuous realization of the depths within you, even while you speak and think and listen. And you might just notice that thoughts are not that overpowering or important anymore. You become less interested in the stories and then he did this.

And you know what he said to me then? And then I said, how dare he? What was he thinking when he did that?

I wonder why he did that. And then comes the interpretation. Oh, he did that because, who knows?

It doesn't have to be that complicated. You can look into another person's eyes or right now, you can look into my eyes and just be the presence that's looking, just as I am the presence behind the looking, feeling, sensing yourself as the presence, not the person. So that means there is more than a connection between us.

There's a sense of non-separation because there's no more interference of thoughts, judgments, et cetera, et cetera. And the same presence is only one consciousness manifesting through and as different forms. And then comes the realization that when you look at me or into my eyes as the presence, you know that I am the presence just as you are and as such, we are one.

And that's why you love me. You love me as yourself. You recognize the oneness.

Any true love is always that. No separation, no sense of separation. So the person cannot love.

You cannot be a person, only a person in the absence of the transcendent dimension, which is obscured, the same as the other person. And then there are two persons thinking they love each other, but you can't. And of course it always goes wrong.

It never was love. It was a need for the other. And you can know that it wasn't love because if for whatever reason, the other suddenly leaves you or says, I love somebody else, suddenly, immediately you'll hate them.

And then the mind comes with the stories. He betrayed me. Of course, it's all true from the point of view of the ego, yes.

But if you're trapped in that thought, you're trapped in some prison cell, perhaps for the next 20 years, the prison of your mind. So let's just be here as the presence, look around, look back at me being the presence. Thank you.

Thank you. This is our evening meditation, which means more silence than words, hopefully, because you never know what comes out of this mouth. I don't.

And hopefully your stomach is not too full of good Italian food so that you can stay awake during the meditation. And if you notice somebody next to you drifting off and falling below thought, instead of rising above thought, maybe you can, or somebody in front of you, tap them on the shoulder gently. You don't need to hit them like the Zen masters.

If you feel at any point you want to close your eyes, it's fine. There's a common belief that when you meditate, your eyes need to be closed, but they don't need to be closed. It's wonderful to realize you can meditate with your eyes open.

Of course, what do I mean by meditate? Quite simply, being in thoughtless awareness. That's meditation.

And as I speak, and as you listen, you can be in thoughtless awareness, just a presence. Why not? You don't have to be always a heavy person carrying the baggage of past and a mind full of stuff.

There is another way of being in this world, and that's to be the presence. And this is all meditation. And even as I speak, you can be the presence because there's nothing to think about.

What I'm saying is so simple that you cannot figure it out by thinking about it because there's nothing to figure out. You can't work, what is he saying? What he's saying, exactly what he's saying.

You can't say, oh, I'm trying to understand what he's saying. There's nothing to understand. Stepping out of thinking does not involve further understanding through thinking.

That may be a little insulting, particularly to those of you who are highly educated and identify excessively with the content of your mind, that thinking is not the highest faculty in a human being. And that is a revolutionary statement that not many people in the mainstream culture would agree with, because all they know themselves is as thinking entities. But once you discover that thinking is not the highest, because you've touched something, a dimension in yourself that's beyond thinking, that is an evolutionary leap.

Even if you fall back into thinking, for a moment you have leapt like the first fish trying to leap out of the sea because they say life has developed in the sea and trying to crawl on land. It's you stopping thinking. And then it gets too difficult and then the fish gets back into the sea.

But that analogy, of course, we need to forget now because it's not going to take us several million years as it took to the fishes before they could start walking on land. If that whole story is true, who knows? It doesn't matter.

So as you might have noticed, what I'm talking about is very simple because I'm simply guiding you into presence, that's all. But more important than the words is what's behind and in between the words. And we could call that spaciousness or we could call that stillness.

Stillness doesn't matter what you call it, but you become more aware of the spaciousness than the words and the spaciousness is within you. It's there the moment the stream of thinking subsides. And there's only the presence left.

If your mind still tends to interfere and take you out of presence, allow the body, your body, to participate in the meditation so that you become present with every cell of the body. Every cell of the body becomes present. Now, somebody might say, okay, please explain what you mean by that.

No, I won't. It's too simple for that. Just sense the aliveness in your body.

Anywhere where you can feel it first is fine, the hands or the legs or the feet. And then the entire energy field that pervades the body becomes part of presence. And at first it seems that you, the consciousness, are observing the inner body feeling but if you go into it more deeply, you realize that there's no longer a subject, object relationship between you, the presence, and the feeling of the inner body.

You, the presence, and the feeling of the inner body merge and the totality of that becomes the state of presence. So it's no longer an observer and the observed. There's a merging of the observer and the observed.

So it means the entire being becomes aware. And that's a lovely state. Peaceful.

And then it's fairly easy not to drift off into thinking tomorrow's breakfast or next week's problems. Or last year's disappointments. And many other things that thinking is concerned with.

My problematic life. Somebody, perhaps it was Carl Jung, I'm not sure, said you cannot solve the problems of this world on the same level of consciousness that created the problems. So you can't solve your personal problems, which everybody has, unless you rise to a different state of consciousness, which is why we are here.

And when you solve your personal problems, that a sufficient number of humans do that, then that will affect the world problems. And that's how truly you can change the world, or to put it more accurately, how that change can happen. Through you.

It's not you, the doer, who is going to change the world, but it can happen through you. In the meantime, there's nothing wrong. In fact, it's wonderful to alleviate suffering where you see it in this world, where you feel called upon to help in your immediate environment or elsewhere.

That's a wonderful thing to do. But the causal level of the world's problems lies in the collective consciousness or unconsciousness of the world. And that is the only place, the consciousness, where deep and permanent change can happen so that eventually you don't need to help other humans anymore.

They don't need your help anymore. You can just commune joyfully with them. So you deal, of course, with the effects of unconsciousness in this world.

There's a lot of suffering, physical and psychological. And your focal point, even as you help others, your focal point needs to be this shift in consciousness. So the entire body is meditating, so to speak, is present as you sit here.

And you can now perhaps easily verify the effectiveness of a meditation question that was one of the favorite meditations of Ramana Maharshi, the Indian sage. And that was the simple question, who am I? He said, just ask yourself that question and go deeply into it and then see what happens.

Who am I? And a little hint, I don't know if he gave that hint. The answer is not in words.

The answer is, let's see if it comes to you. Who am I? And you need to be, of course, alert and still after the question has been asked so that you can find out, who am I?

I'll give you another hint. You can't think about it. Then you get confused.

And then you will say, either you'll say, of course, I'm so and so, of course, then you're certain, but you're well below the answer. Or you say, I don't know, I'm so confused now. You're confusing me.

That's because you're trying to find an answer through thinking. Who am I? What remains is just an alertness, an alert space.

That's consciousness, let's call it your consciousness, but it's not yours. That's your consciousness minus the content, minus forms. Who am I?

And if you had, if somebody were forcing you to give an answer in words, the truthful answer would be, I don't know. Because it is not through any word or concept that you can know who you are. So on the level of words or concepts, you have to say, I don't know.

And yet there is undoubtedly a presence there that has no name and has no content and has no past and no future and no problems. Totally intangible, formless. This was what Jesus referred to as the kingdom of heaven.

Heaven, the vastness of sky. Heaven and sky in some words are the same word in some languages. He had to find some kind of word to describe the spaciousness of that inner state.

So he called it the kingdom in modern terminology, the dimension or the realm of vastness or spaciousness. But it's not the outer spaciousness, it's the inner. But of course, all words refer to outer things.

The kingdom of heaven is within you. And that's why, as it has no content and no form, the Buddha called it emptiness. So that is there, you don't need to sit in meditation to be that, to sense that.

In the background, in daily life, you practice thoughtlessness. Thoughtless in English has negative connotations, but it shouldn't have. It implies it's unawareness and you don't know what you're doing.

But there's a positive here when we use thoughtlessness, it has a very positive meaning. You've risen above thought. The way it's used in normal culture is you've fallen below thought and you don't know what you're doing.

This spaciousness, this inner spaciousness can be there at any time in your daily life. You bring in until it becomes permanent in the background of your being so that no matter what you do and even while you're thinking, there's still something you sense that's deeper than thinking so you're no longer lost in thinking. In other words, you are not the slave of the mind anymore.

You're not possessed by that entity anymore. And then it functions beautifully. Being here should help you to grow in, as I sometimes call it, presence power so that this presence arises more through you, in you.

So in your daily life, you can suddenly enter the state of spaciousness. Spacious awareness in between two actions, for example. Walking from here to there, picking something up, looking out of the window, five seconds of alert, spacious awareness as you're looking at the clouds instead of looking out of the window and having some kind of commentary about what you're looking at.

Not another rainy day. You don't need that. And even more beautiful sunshine, you can go beyond that too and just spacious awareness.

Five minutes, five seconds looking out of the window. Getting dressed while you put on your shoes. Just be alert, the alert presence instead of projecting yourself mentally to some future moment.

And as I said before, whenever you're waiting for something, a wonderful opportunity for entering that, go into the body. That can very easily take you there or pay attention to sense perceptions and feel as you pay attention to sense perceptions, feel the presence without which there would be no sense perceptions. You can do that now.

So there's what you see and what you hear. These are the two predominant sense perceptions here. There's what you see and what you hear.

That makes up what I call it, as you might know, the surface of the present moment. All the sense perceptions are the surface of the present moment. Changes all the time.

And then there's the depths of the present moment that does not change. The now that is forever here, totally timeless. That is your presence, that space.

So you are what arises and more fundamentally, you are the space in which it arises. Ultimately, they're not separate, but we don't know to go into that now. You are the space for whatever arises in that space of consciousness.

So content, I call it, there's content. The content of your consciousness is sense perceptions, seeing, hearing, smelling, touching. Feeling.

The content of your consciousness is thoughts. The content of your consciousness is emotions. Those are basically, your life consists of, put these into a pot, sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions, stir.

Add a little bit of cayenne pepper. That's the drama. And whatever else, other spices that you want to add.

But basically, that is your life. The life which changes, your life is different from your life and your life and your life. They're all different lives and different worlds, but basically, the basic ingredients of your life and whatever your life situation is, are sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions.

Is there anything else on the surface? No. Now, all of that is content.

All of that is form. Now, for most people, that's all they know about their lives. They only know their life and themselves as a mixture, and every mixture is somehow different, of sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions.

And that's all there is, as far as they know. What they don't realize is, without the light of awareness, in which sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions appear, they wouldn't even, they couldn't exist. That is the space for them, and that is the consciousness itself.

And that, once you realize that dimension within yourself, the content of your life is of secondary importance. Before, it mattered so much what happened, or didn't happen, or failed to happen, or success, or failure, and it was, and you were so miserable when things went wrong, and you're elated when you fall in love. Of course, it doesn't last.

It doesn't last. When you only know content, you get more and more frustrated with life. And then you realize there is a deeper dimension, and that deeper dimension is who I am, essentially.

That is the true I, not the I that identifies with content, forms that arise. So that is truly the secret of life for humans, and others, I suppose, wherever they are, on this planet, and elsewhere in the galaxy, and other galaxies, because it cannot be that much different in other places in this galaxy, or other galaxies. There will be form and space, both externally, you can look around, and you can always see stuff.

In a room, you see the furniture. If you're outside, you see trees, and so on. Or if you look up into space at night, you see stars, most of which are suns, distant suns.

And what else do you see? Well, you don't see it, but there's vast spaciousness there. And even in this room, you might not pay attention to it, but this room could not exist if, in addition to the furniture in this room, and the physical bodies in this room, and all the other things in this room, and the ceiling, floor, and the walls of this room, if there were not space.

The space is the essence of this room. You can't say the room, if you describe the room, usually people would write down, give children a school exercise, describe this room, ceiling, walls, floor, what's in this room. Is that all there is?

Yes. Forgotten anything? No.

Except the most important thing, forgotten. It's the space. There's already a beautiful few short verses about this in the ancient Chinese Tao Te Ching, where it says, if you have a vessel or bowl, that which makes it useful is the space within it.

It's not the vessel. It's the space that's the essence of it. Those are lines.

So, in the same way, your life, or life anywhere in this galaxy, or the most distant galaxy, I can guarantee you that, even if they don't have physical bodies, there will be some forms, and there will be space in which these forms exist. So, no matter where you look, out there, here, the room, outside, it always applies. There is form, content, and space.

And space seems to be infinite. If you look into outer space, if you try to comprehend, nobody has reached the end of space. Nobody can say, does it end anywhere?

That was a problem for me when I was eight or nine years old. I tried to imagine the end of space. You go on, and you go on, and then suddenly, but what's beyond that?

And if there is something beyond, it is not the end. And I asked my father, and he tried also to envision, and he couldn't do it either. And this is why it's called infinity.

Infinity, and another lovely word, that's one with it, really, eternity. Infinity and eternity. They're really one.

I think that Einstein would agree with that. Time and space, space-time continuum. And infinity and eternity are your own essence.

Because what you discover within is the very foundation for the universe. That spaciousness is the space out of which everything came before the big bang. Just timeless, eternal, eternity and infinity, no form.

Scientists, they stop there. Sometimes they try to figure out the big bang, but nobody tries to go before the big bang because you can't. There was no before because there was no time.

Can't understand that. You go mad if you try to understand it. But you can know this experientially within yourself as inner space, just presence.

And as we saw the other day, we talked about the medieval form of spirituality like St. Francis attempting, not seeking, pleasant forms. St. Francis never sought out, he appreciated when they came, flowers and so on, but not seeking them out. In fact, being very happy with unpleasant forms, almost seeking out unpleasant forms.

And seeking out, like in the story that we heard, the man who went to the city square, sat there in the middle and got mocked and things thrown at him every day. And he went back every day in an attempt, I would call it, he wouldn't have called it that because he used different terminology, in an attempt at self annihilation, the annihilation of the ego. If you go back to the same square where you're mocked and people throw things at you and pull your hair and laugh at you and you go back every day, it is an attempt at inviting the death of the ego, the ego being identification with form, with content.

And if you make it so unpleasant, the content in your life, the idea behind it is that it forces you into transcendence. It forces you into going beyond content. And suddenly you find that deep peace inside and you don't know where it comes from.

And externally, there's the unpleasant conditions, but you have disidentified from them, thereby the ego has died. And then whatever terminology used to explain what happens to you then depends on your culture. As this man might have said, the monk, I don't know what he would have said, I became one with God or the sacredness or infinity, eternal peace.

And traditionally, one spiritual path in Christianity is closely related to that. And that is identification with the suffering of Jesus on the cross. So any suffering that you undergo, in your mind, you undergo it together with, you're repeating the archetype of the suffering of Jesus.

And that is how the image of the man on the cross can lead, if you identify with it, can, there's no guarantee it could mislead you too. There are lots of ways in which it can go wrong. It can lead to self-annihilation of the ego and then to an awakening into the formless.

And you're then in whatever terminology you use, you're one with the one, you're one with God. You are self-realized, enlightened, whatever you want to use, or you're simply at peace. So that can work too.

Most Christians have no idea these days that that can be a spiritual path. But for them, they practice a more superficial form of Christianity, mostly fairly superficial. A few Christians may go deep, but many practice it.

They don't see the depths in their own tradition. And because so many people don't see it anymore, Christianity is now at a dangerous point where nothing is forever, even everything evolves. So Christianity will either deepen or change or disappear.

And even the Pope knows that. He said, pointed to the fact that it was a critical time for the Christian religion. If you are a practicing Christian, this can still be a viable path to reaching that egoless state of oneness with whatever you want to call it.

If you're a Buddhist, that can still be a viable path or whatever it is, or you may not follow any tradition. And this is for the first time, as far as I know in the history of humanity, that spirituality arises without belonging to any particular, any one tradition without rejecting any of the older traditions. So self-annihilation, basically that's the basis of St. Francis, also practiced by many yogis and sadhus in India who practice extreme austerities and seek out unpleasantness. You don't have to do that. That's why you're here. But if you were not here, there are many other ways.

You could go to India and sit in a cave for 20 years, being stung by mosquitoes, but not minding anymore. And all kinds of bugs come and creep on you. And a few people will come and feed you.

It won't be gourmet food, but that's okay. You don't want gourmet food anymore. You want the worst, so that you can disidentify from form, so that life forces you deeper so that you go beyond all form.

That's the idea behind it. Sometimes it works and sometimes it doesn't. And if it doesn't work, then you just become more and more lifeless.

Have another go next time. But the most rapid way to self-annihilation and easier, more pleasant, but you need to be up to it. Your consciousness needs to have reached a certain level where this becomes a viable path for you.

And that is simply the cessation of compulsive thinking. To end compulsive thinking, so that you can enter by choice, I would say, and choose when you want to think and you don't want to think. And this is why, as I've quoted before, the wonderful words of the sage Nisargadatta Maharaj, who defined meditation, when they asked him, what is meditation?

And in his unique way of speaking, he said, meditation, it's the radical refusal to harbor thoughts. That's how he spoke. I saw some old videos.

The radical refusal to harbor thoughts. And that stopped some people's minds. I used to quote years ago in talks I haven't in a long time, the Zen master who, when asked to explain the true meaning of Zen, which even the monks who had been in the monastery for 10, 15, and 20 years didn't understand, please explain the true meaning of Zen.

And wherever he went and he was asked that question, he would never give a verbal answer. He would only raise his finger and look at you. And so the questioner would go, did you hear what I said?

But a few questioners got it. And that's called Satori. Satori is a moment of a flash of enlightenment.

It might not last, but it's a flash. Great teaching. Zen originally came into being because Buddhism had already become burdened with conceptualization and intellectualism.

And then Zen represented a renewal, a complete doing away with all scriptures, everything, just a direct pointing to the heart of humans or whatever the scriptures later said about it. Direct pointing, no more reference to old ancient scriptures. And you even have stories like the Buddha statues, the Buddha rupas, not to venerate them excessively.

In fact, if the Zen master got cold in the winter, he would be quite capable of throwing the wooden Buddha statue into the fire to keep. So Zen was a very radical thing. And then over the centuries, it became assumed more form.

Some of the power was lost, except in a few masters here and there. Then in itself, all became already also burdened to some extent. But originally Zen is a wonderful, wonderful teaching.

Basically, as you know, don't think. That's Zen. I just saved you 20 years in the monastery.

Let's just go within for a moment and close our eyes. I will use the bell as a signal to bring you back here and then we'll finish our meditation. You can go into the body if you like.

[Speaker 5] (9:34:24 - 9:34:28)

In honor of Maya. Of Maya. Your Maya.

[Speaker 7] (9:34:28 - 9:34:29)

Yeah.

[Speaker 5] (9:34:29 - 9:34:48)

My question is that killing and eating other sentient beings, animals, seems on some level just fundamentally wrong to me. But yet I can't find any spiritual justification for being a vegetarian. So I just wondered if you would speak to that.

If you would speak to that issue of eating meat or not.

[Speaker 2] (9:34:48 - 9:34:51)

Okay. Are you a vegetarian?

[Speaker 5] (9:34:51 - 9:34:59)

I'm not. I have been on a couple different occasions in my life, but it's real difficult living with a meat-loving husband.

[Speaker 2] (9:35:03 - 9:35:10)

And in what ways do you, you said it seems fundamentally wrong. What ways do you see it as fundamentally wrong?

[Speaker 5] (9:35:11 - 9:35:43)

Well, that's where my conflict comes in. I understand that that's the way of life, is that even animals eat other animals sort of thing. And maybe what bothers me probably more than actually eating animals is the way our society processes, keeps animals in an inhumane way.

I live in a rural area and I pass dairy farms and chicken houses all the time. And I can't eat veal anymore, once you see how these animals are kept.

[Speaker 2] (9:35:43 - 9:35:44)

Yes.

[Speaker 5] (9:35:44 - 9:35:48)

So some of it might not be meat itself so much as what we do to these creatures.

[Speaker 2] (9:35:48 - 9:45:16)

Yes, the unconsciousness of how the meat is raised. Right, exactly. Yeah.

Yeah. Yes, I believe that too. I mean, the unconsciousness on the planet and how we grow our food and what we do to these animals.

And I can't remember which documentary film it was. Was it Food Inc. or something like that?

Where it showed how chickens are raised and it's like, you're right, it's inhumane. And it's interesting what I, in the movie Avatar, what I found so beautiful in that movie is when the aliens knew that somehow sometimes killing happens, death has to happen, you kill something. But it was beautiful that there was this blessing that was said.

After the killing took place, before the killing took place, it's like, wow, thank you for this, I'm so sorry. Whatever, I can't remember the words that were used. I know there are some religions that believe that you should be vegetarian.

I was, in fact, in one of those religions for a time in my early 20s where you should be vegetarian. And they gave these reasons of, you know, well, in the beginning of Adam and Eve's time, they only ate fruits and vegetables. And it wasn't later until, you know, in the Bible, they started eating meat and all this sort of stuff.

And yes, that may be the case in the biblical sort of story. But only each person in themselves can really know within themselves what feels right for them. But I do believe that if you eat meat, if you want to eat meat, to buy and eat organic, humanely raised meat, and bless it, wow, you have a blessing for this life that has given its life to us.

And it's the same with fruits and vegetables. Actually, that's a living being as well. They're living.

So is one wrong and the other right? It's all life. So the blessing can be given for everything, for the vegetables that we take the life of by picking it out of the ground.

So it is life. Now, whether or not we were actually meant to, I have no idea, you know? I mean, it's, in nature, there are some animals that are meat-eating animals.

They have fangs, they can bite into it, they eat it. On the other hand, one can say, well, we don't really have those fangs. So are we supposed to eat meat?

Don't know. But only you will know what's right for you. When you're in colder climates and the plants and vegetables can't grow on the ground, what do you do?

So the question really is, is how, if you can just remain without judgment of anyone else in what they do in terms of eating, what foods they eat, but just go deeply within and feel what's right for you, this is how you will know. Now, how we get there to feel what's right for us it's like we have to, in a way, we have been living so numbly. I mean, we have been eating food that is truly not healthy for us.

It's been full of preservatives, you know, full of antibiotics. So, I mean, it's like we've lost all sensitivity within our whole body to know truly what's good for us. We don't even know when we're hungry anymore.

We'll just sometimes eat and eat and eat. We don't even know when we're hungry. We can't feel it.

We've lost that connection of feeling our bodies. So when you actually clean yourself out, there are many ways to do that. I do cleanses all the time.

You know, not all the time, but you know, at least three or four times a year. In fact, I was saying to Shannon and Anthony, I said, you know, I think I want to do a retreat that we're fasting. And they're like, well, does that mean we have to fast too?

But it's a cleansing. It's like a purifying of the body because we've grown sluggish inside. So as we awaken every cell of our body, we begin to feel what's right for us.

And it's amazing when you clean yourself on the physical level, when you can taste the difference between, like say you're eating a nice raw salad, your body, my body goes, wow, yes, yes. I'm getting some nutrients and food. And then when I eat something that say, for example, cooked and all the life has been out of it, you know, cooked out of it, or, you know, you eat something that's kind of junky and you go, oh, why did I eat that?

Only the next day you go eat it again. Because we lose this connection. We've lost connection, not only to the essence of who we are, but even in this, the form, our holy temples, this is our holy bodies here.

So it, get in touch with your holy body. It's so sad when, you know, it's interesting. We were staying with a family one time and they have a young boy and he was eating, you know, like Kentucky fried chicken and, you know, chips and cookies and all that sort of stuff.

And his mother offered this fruit and it's just like, no, no, no, I don't want that. But I ended up having some fruit there and I took one bite into it. I realized this is not a peach.

I remember what peaches taste like. This is not a peach. Like even, I mean, if we don't buy the organic things, we're not even eating fruit.

I don't know what we're eating, but we're not eating fruit. This is not a strawberry. It doesn't even taste like a strawberry.

Remember that lush, just juicy feeling when you would bite into it when we were kids? Well, those of us who are old enough. Remember that, you know, you just pick it from the tree.

It was just so juicy. You buy it from the store. It was just so juicy.

It was all natural. All the sugar already there inherent in that fruit was so sweet. Well, it's not even sweet anymore.

And I thought, no wonder these kids are not eating fruit. It's not even fruit. It doesn't even taste sweet.

It doesn't even taste like fruit. I love fruit because I remember what it tastes like. So I'll eat it and I'll buy something.

If I end up eating something, it's like, oh, I don't want to eat this because it's not fruit. So they are starving. Our children are starving for something real, but they don't have it available to them for whatever reasons.

There's not enough money to buy organic food. What a shame. You know, it's like we can't even feed our children organic, fresh fruits and vegetables.

They don't know what it tastes like. They can grow up and not even know what an apple really tastes like. That's sad.

So, but they have to fill themselves with something. They are dying for that sweetness. So they grab that.

2012 to 2015 Eckhart Tolle TV Part 4

[Speaker 5] (0:00 - 3:32)

what an apple really tastes like. That's sad. So, but they have to fill themselves with something.

They are dying for that sweetness, so they grab that sugar, that chocolate bar, the candy, anything. They're filling themselves up. And they don't know what they're really, what the body is really calling for is something living, organic, fresh.

So whether or not we are meant to eat meat, I don't know. Only you can know, and don't judge another. It's going to be different for everyone.

Eckhart eats everything. He'll eat meat sometimes, rarely, but he'll eat, you know, mainly if he does eat meat, it's chicken. I, on the other hand, will really not, once in a blue moon will eat meat, but mainly I eat a lot of just vegan food.

Fish, occasionally. But that's this makeup here. And Eckhart has his makeup.

He comes from Europe. Where there is a lot of meat eating over there. So only you can really know for yourself in the moment.

And even if you are a vegetarian, are you only a vegetarian because your mind is telling you it's better to be one? Maybe that once in a while, if you're in touch with your body, you do need that fish, or you do need that meat. Go within and find out what is it that my body wants.

You're looking at a menu. Oh, what do I want today? You know, you're going through all the menu and sometimes you just got to, okay, I just got to tap within and see what my body needs right now.

So being a vegetarian and being spiritual are not necessarily hand in hand. You don't really necessarily go together. Because if you think, well, I'm spiritual because I'm a vegetarian.

They're eating meat. There's something wrong with them. They're not very spiritual.

That's an idea, a thought. All thoughts are not the truth. And we get fooled by them all the time, believing in them, thinking that it's truth when it's not.

Not one thought is the truth.

[Speaker 1] (3:35 - 32:49)

Good to be here in this moment. If you're not fully here yet, I invite you to enter the present moment with your attention instead of being absorbed in your thinking. And that simple thing is a shift in consciousness.

How do I enter the present moment somebody is thinking right now? I can't get out of my head. An easy way is to direct your attention to sense perceptions, whatever you see and hear at this moment and become a little bit more alert and go, oh, there's an alertness that arises and that heightens your sense perceptions, auditory, visual, and you suddenly become conscious of your surroundings.

And you might notice that one's usual state, well, not yours because you're all advanced spiritual practitioners, but other people's usual state is they're hardly here. They're only present enough not to bump into furniture. Whatever is happening around them is peripheral to their attention.

And a huge amount of their attention is continuously absorbed by thinking. And a lot of that is actually not terribly relevant to anything, but it pretends to be extremely important. Every thought has this seductive quality to it.

It wants to draw you in. It has a pull like a magnet. And if you follow each thought, it'll take you, you're at the mercy of whatever arises in your mind.

And you live like that. What a terrible existence. And you go drawn this way and that way.

And then after a few years, you can see it in your face. Your face becomes very tense. And there's no longer a light shining through your eyes.

Because all the consciousness is being devoured by the mind. And that's a dreadful state. It's been like this for a long, long time, many thousands of years.

And that really your entire sense of who you are, which is the most vital thing to know who you are. This is why the ancient dictum at the Oracle in Delphi says, know yourself. And one of the very important meditation recommended by, for example, Ramana Maharshi and other teachers is the question, who am I?

So your sense of who you are when you are completely identified with every thought that comes into your head, a lot of it negative, by the way, because negative thoughts are more seductive than positive thoughts. You can think about an unpleasant person who did something to you yesterday or said something, or failed to say something, or failed to do something, or should have done something. You can think about that for a long time, but you can't think that much about a beautiful sunset.

Okay. So all the things that make life worth living actually involve less thinking for joy to come into your life, a moment of joy. You go, ah.

And you might not realize that in that moment, there is a space that opens up inside you when you are not thinking, but not falling asleep either. There's just a space of alertness. And that is really already a glimpse that is what in Zen they call Satori, which is a flash of enlightenment, a flash, a momentary realization.

Beauty, to recognize beauty anywhere, for a moment, the thinking mind needs to subside and a little bit of space opens up and you go and then you truly look. And you might not notice it, but for a few seconds, you're not thinking. If you're thinking, you're not really seeing.

You can say, oh, that's a lovely flower. I wish I had that in my garden, but you're not really seeing it. To really see it, there needs to be a moment of alert presence in which thinking subsides.

Oh, there it is. And that's how beauty reveals itself to you. And that's how joy arises.

And that's how any feeling that is empathy with another human being, you cannot arrive at empathy or compassion through the judgmental mind. There needs to be a space within you that opens up and you can look at another human being without any conceptualization in your head. You look at them and you sense something in them that is deeper than their psychological makeup.

But there is a presence. It can only be realized through the presence within you. So that is the dimension within you without which your life, you're not really truly alive.

Or as Confucius would say, you're not fully human yet. If that dimension has not yet arisen in you, has not revealed itself to you, you are just on your, yes, of course, you are on your way. Everybody's on their way to becoming fully human, but you're not that, not quite there yet.

And some people are so deeply trapped in their minds that they live in a total, completely conceptualized universe where every human they meet, they immediately judge. And they take entire groups of humans and judge them. And so they dehumanize them.

And this is how violence can happen. Total loss of empathy. You no longer know what you're doing.

You no longer know what you're doing to other humans. We all know from recent events last week, people asked, how is it possible that humans can perpetrate such atrocities? Well, they are possessed by certain thoughts in your head.

They have taken over their minds. They're called religious thoughts. Nothing to do with anything.

It's not, it's not true religion. It's an ideology. It is a viral infection, so to speak, of your mind.

Thoughts can act like viruses. If you're not careful, they can take over completely. So a few groups of thoughts possess your entire mind and control everything.

Everything is seen through that viral infection in your mind, to use that analogy. And it's an amazing thing. So these are extreme ways, but millions are suffering from that, not perhaps as an extreme way as the terrorists, but millions are experiencing symptoms of that kind, lesser symptoms of the same disease.

So to know yourself, for most people, means it's an identification with certain images in their mind. First of all, there's the image, I am this physical body. And then, what is it that people derive their sense of identity from, the sense of who they are?

Usually it's with their physical appearance, and then the inner world of their thoughts, accompanied by emotions. And lots of emotions are, lots of very heavy emotions are created by dysfunctional thinking. We all know that.

And in the past, before you were spiritually awakened, you experienced that also. So there is a vast dimension in yourself that isn't, now, let's call it the transcendent dimension of who you are. There, where the person or the personality that you usually identify with, that usually gives you your sense of self, which consists of self-talk, basically.

The habitual self-talk in the head explains to you who you are. And it takes on board what others tell you who you are. It starts with what your mother might have told you who you are, and your siblings, and parents, and your environment, and your culture tells you who you are.

And this is absorbed by the mind, and then it becomes your story. And then that becomes a foundation for your sense of identity. This is where you derive your sense of self from.

So it's a conceptualized, because thoughts are concepts, a conceptualized sense of self. It's not, and then it attempts to make itself feel a little better by adding more concepts to their mind. There might be possessions.

Maybe if I get further more possessions, I can feel better about myself. Maybe if I find the right person who is going to make me happy, then my life will be fine. But these are all really concepts.

Even the big house or the big car gets translated into a concept in your mind, and then you identify with it, and it becomes part of the sense of me. But always uneasy and never enough, and never satisfied for very long, and always things seem to go wrong.

The Buddha already recognized that.

He said, wherever you go and whatever you do, you'll find dukkha, which is translated traditionally as suffering, but can also be translated as misery or unhappiness or unsatisfactoriness. So on that level, you can never be satisfied for very long. If you don't know who you are, but you're trying to enhance that mind-made sense of self.

So the most important dimension, one could say you only know one half of yourself, and that half is who you are on the level of form, physical form and the psychological form of me. And that's how most people live their lives, and they don't know what they are missing. Now, spiritual people have the idea that there is such a thing as a state of enlightenment that can be reached at some point.

Many Buddhists believe that a few more incarnations are definitely need, but then perhaps I will eventually get there. So it is made into some idea in the head that I need to reach and not realizing that that dimension, which we could call the spiritual dimension, which we could call the transcendent dimension, or which we could call who you really are, that is always already there. That is already present here and now.

And why do some people not know it? Because they are continuously completely overlooking it. Because the movement of thought plus the emotions that go with it has an enormous seductive quality that it hypnotizes you into continuously identifying with form that arise.

And every thought is a thought form, and every emotion that arises is an emotional, it's not a physical form, but it's an energy formation. Every thought is an energy formation, every emotion is an energy formation. You cannot see it, but you can feel it, and it has certain, it affects the body in certain ways.

So those things continuously absorb your attention, and there's something very vital that you overlook, and that is something deeper without which you couldn't even think. There would be no thought, there would be no sense perception. So what you then overlook is the presence, the formless presence of consciousness itself, which is always there.

If you stop thinking for three seconds, there it is. Where? Because if you look for it as if you could say, there it is, you'll never find it.

So if you look for enlightenment as if it could be something that arises, and you can say, ah, there it is, and now I have it, then you will never find it, because you would, it's not, that's not how you, you cannot grasp it. Can you, now let's bring this to what really matters right now. Can you sense that apart from any thoughts that may be going through your head right now, hopefully not many, maybe none, there is also in you the dimension of simple, formless presence.

To get you there, I could ask you the question, what does it really feel like to be you right now? What is that feeling of, what does it, what is it sense, what does it feel like to be you? Now, when I say you, I don't mean your personal history, you don't have to remember that for this practice.

What does it, something deeper that has never left you, that has always been there and always will be there, what does it feel like? Can you sense the presence that you are, that has nothing to do with your personal history at all? There is simply the light of presence.

And meditation, of course, is supposed to get you there, but you can, at any moment, you can be aware of it. How? Not by making it an object of your attention that doesn't work, because that awareness or that consciousness that is the essence of who you are, when you're looking for it and you go, okay, I'm looking for that great experience, the alertness behind the looking is it.

So if you're looking, if you're looking for yourself, if you're looking for the enlightened version of yourself in some future moment, you are missing that the very consciousness that becomes the looking, if you could catch it at a slightly earlier stage, where it's just pure consciousness, is it already. So if you can know yourself as consciousness, as the presence, then you realize the hidden dimension of life, or the transcendent dimension. I sometimes call that the other half.

It's not only a way of speaking, it's you can't divide life into two halves. But temporarily, just to help us approach this, see for a moment that your life consists of the life of form, physical form, mental form, but also of inner presence. In the same way, if you could, I could use an analogy of this room, if you wanted to investigate what is the essence of this room here, and you start looking at the people in it, let's maybe in this analogy, the people are the thoughts in your mind.

And then you're looking at the furniture and the walls, and the ceiling and everything. Okay, okay, I'm trying to get to the essence of this room. And then you can you can even analyze with microscopes.

Maybe it's hidden in the carpet, but maybe it's maybe with a telescope, maybe if I click my binoculars, maybe it's on that wall somewhere. And you miss the one thing that is pervades the entire room, which is the space of this room. So if you could pay attention to the space of this room, you would get the essence.

Without the space, the room means nothing. It we're using an analogy here, that there is a spaciousness within you, that is continuously missed, because you're so interested in the furniture in your head. And for many people, their mind is crammed full with furniture.

You can't even move anymore. And here comes another thought, and then here comes this. No space.

And the loss of spaciousness is the most terrible loss in life, because then joy, real joy cannot arise anymore. Love, which is a sense of connect, true connectedness with another, that all arises from a little bit of spaciousness inside you. Sometimes people become spacious for three seconds when they see a dog.

That's why I have this book about dogs and cats. You see a dog, and you look into the eyes of a dog, and you go, ah, it feels good. People love dogs, except people who don't.

But most people seem to love dogs. And they are drawn to them because for a moment, it frees you from your mind, because you know that the dog has no judgments about you. It doesn't, it is not that good.

It just looks at you and the tail wags. And for a moment, it can free you of your mind for a few seconds. And that's why it feels so good to look at the dog and say, oh, lovely dog.

And for a moment, there's just a connectedness. With humans, much more difficult, because the moment you meet another human, there's judgments, and you can sense that, except those humans who are no longer dominated by their mind, and they can meet you in that openness of presence. And they just look, and you know they're not judging you.

But this means those humans who don't judge you, they haven't fallen back to the level of consciousness of the dog. The dog, in a way, is in that beautiful state of connectedness with being, because the dog has not yet been totally seduced by thinking. But for us, we cannot go back.

We have to go forward. We have to rise above thinking, not fall below thinking. So here, the arising of presence is an evolutionary leap that humanity is now, we are beginning to enter this evolutionary shift where humans reach a new stage in evolution, which is a complete inner change where thinking still operates.

It's transcended, which means it isn't left behind completely. It is transcended so that you are no longer a thought-based entity, you are a presence-based entity. So you're no longer dominated by thought, and it's only then that your thinking can actually be used in a powerful and constructive way.

It's a wonderful tool to use your mind positively, to create. It's an miraculous instrument. It only becomes insane when it takes you over, and there's no space of awareness anymore.

So if you then derive your sense of identity from the presence within you, and more and more you become comfortable with spaces of not thinking, oh, you can walk from one building to another, or from the building to your car, and just be in that state of alert presence. It's beautiful. You see beauty everywhere.

You don't need to label everything anymore. That compulsion to label everything is the egoic mind. It doesn't operate anymore, and that's an enormous burden that falls away when you can go through not...

You don't need to judge everything. There is a deeper knowing there that is not conceptual. So one of the great spiritual practices is a very simple one, and that is practice not labeling or interpreting what you are perceiving.

And that you can practice anywhere, wherever you are. I always recommend do it when you're waiting for something somewhere, because you'll be amazed how much time we spend waiting for things. Waiting at the traffic light, waiting at the checkout counter, waiting at the airport, waiting, waiting, waiting.

Many people are waiting their entire life because they're waiting to start living, and then they reach 70, and they say, was that it? I'm still waiting. I haven't started living yet.

Awful. So use waiting. Instead of waiting, just bring an alertness.

Enter that state of... Invite that state of alertness in, and you go, oh. Why?

There's nothing wrong with waiting, because you always either stand, sit, or lie somewhere. Does it really matter where you stand, sit, or lie? But the mind says, I shouldn't be waiting at this checkout counter.

Why is this person so inefficient? Why is he talking to me? Why is he talking to this girl?

She shouldn't be talking to him. She should be doing her job. And you can discover that in yourself, and suddenly say, I choose something different.

The discovery of your mind, what your mind is doing to you, is an enormous step forward in evolutionary terms. The discovery of how your mind functions... Oh, I thought they'd shut me off.

They will in a minute. It implies that it's already that awareness arising in you, where you become aware of what your mind is doing. It's an enormous thing.

So the shift, then, you can use waiting periods instead of complaining, just being present. Enter the... Feel the presence that you are, the alertness.

And at that moment, you become a spiritual master, because all you have to do is wait. All that differentiates a person who is not yet awake from a spiritual master is that the spiritual master can be in the state of presence, which is complete alignment with the present moment without complaining about anything. Just is.

That's the Zen master. He goes, this is what is. What are you complaining about?

And this is why there was a Zen master who would never answer any questions. All he would ever do when people asked him questions about the meaning of Zen was, he would raise his finger and look at you. Can you explain the meaning of Zen, please?

Did you hear what I said? Did you hear my question? He's simply teaching presence, alert presence.

That's Zen, nothing else. And these people spend years in Zen monasteries and they still don't get it. Because they think, I need to understand something.

The Course in Miracles says, your understanding is not a powerful contribution to the truth. Now, the miracle is when you give up the need to understand yourself, my life, I need to figure out my life. What is your life?

It's a mental construct. So you're trying to figure out a mental construct that you call my life, and it's very complex. I need to figure out what it's all about.

Where am I going? What am I doing? Why not give up the need to understand and just invite presence in?

And then it looks for a moment from the point of view of the mind as if you didn't know anything anymore. And you don't, not conceptually. So you voluntarily enter that state of not knowing, and then you realize out of that state of not knowing, a deeper knowing arises, and a deeper sense of connectedness with life, and a deeper sense of connectedness with other humans and all life forms.

And that is the awakening of the shift in consciousness. And now I'm handing this chair over to Deepak.

So, right this moment as you're about to listen to me, just turn your attention to who's listening. So as you're looking at me, turn your attention to who's looking. That's you.

Okay. That you has always existed. It was there when you were a baby.

It was there, a different body, different mind. It was there when you were a teenager. Different body, different mind.

It's there now. And actually if you stay with it without anyone explaining to you, you'll realize that it's that timeless being in which time is born. Time is just the movement of thought.

Time is the movement of thought that creates a subject-object split. Me, Deepak, Eckhart. Okay, all of you.

That's a thought. That's a thought. And it is the movement of thought is not an observer in the midst of time-bound observation.

So as Eckhart said, you can spend your whole life studying scripture and spend your whole life in various practices. And it does help. It takes time for a fruit to ripen, but then one day it falls and the falling can be quite sudden, as in your case it was.

Transcendence is simply going beyond the subject-object split, which is artificial. It's not real. Nature and the universe is a single process.

So the subject-object split is an artificial split. And it is the cause of every single problem that we know. So I come from a tradition which is called Vedanta, which you referred to when you mentioned Sri Ramana Maharshi.

And Buddha came many years later and actually did refine in his own language the teachings of Vedanta. But in the Vedanta there are what I call the five kleshas. Klesha is a Sanskrit word which means the cause of suffering.

So the five kleshas are, number one, not knowing who you are. Number two, the addiction and the craving for permanence in a world that is inherently impermanent. Number three is the fear of impermanence.

Number four is identifying with your self-image instead of yourself. What Eckhart was saying, all the labels. So all the labels, all the definitions, all the evaluations, all the judgments, all the ideas, all the concepts that have come from conditioning, parents, your siblings, your culture, religion, history, economic conditions, all these things are collected and then identified with and that becomes the self-image.

The conditioned mind. So that's the fourth klesha. And the fifth klesha is the fear of death.

It's the fear of the unknown. The fear that actually is the basis of all religion, at least institutionalized religion, capitalizes on the fear of death. And in a way, all fears is the fear of death in disguise.

Because what is the fear of death? It's, as I said, the fear of the unknown, but it's also the fear of, I'm trying to hold on to something that's not going to be there in the next moment. Because in the real world, we do not have objects.

In the real world, objects do not exist. That's a perceptual artifact. There's only process.

Only process. A simple way of saying this is that there are no nouns, only verbs. The universe is a verb.

It's an activity. And being an activity, it never stops. Okay, so when even as you're looking at me or yourself, your body or your mind, your body is constantly changing.

Actually, even scientifically, the body that you have right now is not the body that you walked in with a little while ago. Because you're breathing, you're thinking, you're taking in information from the world, you have relationships, you eat, you eliminate. All these processes are constantly the flux of your physical body.

So, as I said, the body you walked in with is not the body that you have right now. And of course, in less than a year, every single atom in your body has been replaced, recycled. You don't have the same body you had as a kid, as a baby, as a teenager.

So if you think you're your body, you have a little bit of a dilemma. Which one are you talking about? And if you think you're your mind, you also have a dilemma because the mind is changing all the time.

And so here we go, bamboozled by the idea that things exist. Things don't exist. Only process exists.

Nouns are conventions of language. They're not facts of reality. It's a language convention.

There's no noun. Not even this microphone is not a noun. It has a little longer shelf life though than the body and the mind.

But there are no nouns. So all the suffering comes from nouns, things which don't exist. So we go over those five kleshas, not knowing who you are, trying to fix the flux, which won't be fixed, afraid of the flux, identifying with ideas instead of who you are, ideas about yourself, as you said, and the fear of death.

And the great teaching of the Vedanta is that all these five causes of suffering are contained in the first cause. And that is not knowing you, who you are. Confusing yourself with a socially induced hallucination that actually doesn't exist.

And the key therefore is, who am I? I mean, Sri Ramana Maharshi spent 20 years in silence and if people asked him a question, no matter what the question was, he would say, who's asking the question? And sometimes he would say, not only who's asking the question, but who is the who that is asking the question?

And you know, when you say, who am I? Then you could also ask yourself, who's asking, who am I? And if you go a little bit deeply into that, you'll come to the place that Eckhart was talking about, that who's asking the question is a transcendent being that is neither the subject of experience nor the object of experience.

So very frequently we say, I'm the observer, but even that is not correct. The observer and the observed, me and the other, simultaneously co-arise as the movement of thought. The real you is neither the observer nor the observed, but in which both the observer, the subject and the object of experience, simultaneously arise and simultaneously subside.

And they're doing so in every moment. That's the flux. Okay, it's a flux that is constantly creating a subject and object.

But the real being is neither the subject or the object. It's where the subject and object arise like waves on the ocean and subside. So before a wave arises, it's water.

As a wave, it's water. And when it subsides, it's water. It doesn't lose its wateriness.

And that's being. You are the being in which thought arises and subsides. Now that thought can have many qualities.

These qualities of thought are referred to in the consciousness literature. They're referred to as qualia. Now everybody has heard these days, thanks partly to my obsession with quanta.

Okay, quanta. What is quanta? It means quantity.

Okay, so quantum physics is the study of quantities of units of mass and energy. It's the smallest indivisible unit of information and energy is a quanta. But remember quanta units of measurement.

Qualia, on the other hand, are units of thought or qualities of consciousness. And they're usually just four of them. Anytime you have any experience, anytime you have any experience, you're either experiencing a sensation somewhere, or you're experiencing an image, or a feeling, emotion, or a thought.

Now Dan Siegel, who's a great friend of ours, is a neuropsychiatrist at UCLA. He says he uses an acronym SIFT, S-I-F-T. Every experience that you have is either a sensation, or an image, or a feeling, or a thought.

All of perceptual experience, all of perceptual experience, all of cognitive experience, or any experience, is actually just consciousness and its qualities. Okay, so right now I'm experiencing you as image and sensation in my body, in my consciousness. I experience my own body like that.

I experience you like that. Sensations, images, feelings, and thoughts are occurrences in consciousness of consciousness. So even though I see this as mine, and your body is different than mine, actually what I'm experiencing as you, and what I'm experiencing as my body, are just sensations, images, feelings, and thoughts.

And the whole universe is nothing other than that. Consciousness experiencing itself as the subject and the object, but both the subject, the individual subject, and the individual object, are movements of consciousness within consciousness. Okay, so that's why the great sayings of the great rishis, they say, I'm not in the world, the world is in me.

I'm not in the body, the body is in me. I'm not in the mind, the mind is in me. In the Bhagavad Gita, Lord Krishna, when he's talking to Arjuna, he says, Curving back within myself, I create again and again.

It's the mechanics of how we create our experience of the body, we create our experience of the mind, and we create our experience of the world. If we totally understand that, and come back to what Eckhart was saying, that you can't find this presence by looking for it, because it's the one that's looking. Okay, you can't find consciousness by looking for it, because consciousness is the one that's looking.

You know, in my field as a person who's trained in neuroscience, biology, endocrinology, today there's a lot of interest in consciousness as a brain phenomenon, because that's how we are trained. We think consciousness is a perceptual object, but where is the brain experience? When you think about the brain, where is that experience?

In consciousness. When you look at a brain as a perceptual object, that's also in consciousness. The consciousness is prior to brain.

Even the experience of the brain is, the perceptual experience of the brain, is a qualia. It's a quality of consciousness within consciousness. So, coming back to what he was saying, is all this neuroscience that we're doing, which is fun, a lot of fun to do, it's very inferential, but we will never understand consciousness by looking at a brain, or through neuroscience.

Why? Because only consciousness can know consciousness. Only consciousness can understand consciousness.

Only consciousness can experience consciousness. Any neuroscience validation of consciousness is inferential. It's not direct.

Direct is the presence this moment. So, when I started, I said, as you're listening to me, turn your attention to who's listening, or as you're looking at me, just turn your attention to the space between you and me. Presence is always there.

It gets overshadowed, as Eckhart was saying, by the furniture. You know, Rumi has a very beautiful poem. He says, who am I in the middle of all this thought traffic?

Because there's the center of being in which all the traffic is happening. And we are obviously identifying ourselves with the furniture and the traffic, instead of this presence around which the traffic is being generated as a result of self-interaction. The internal dialogue is, Eckhart was saying, speaking to yourself.

And that never stops, because we're so influenced by the quality of awareness, which is always looking out there for, ultimately, what is called happiness or fulfillment. Okay, get the right job, I'll be happy. Get the right person, I'll be happy.

Get a lot of money, win the lottery, I'll be happy. Get good health, I'll be happy. But realize what Eckhart said earlier.

All that is thought. Okay, all that is thought. If I do this, so before the thought arises, you're already happy.

And after the thought subsides, you're exactly where you started from. Okay, before the thought arises, you were at peace. Then the thought arose, then you did everything to fulfill that outcome of that thought, which we call desire.

And at the end, you're back where you started from. Just like before the wave arises, it's the ocean, and after the wave subsides, it's back into the ocean. So that makes it very obvious that happiness or joy is the starting point.

It's also the ending point. Now what's that poem T.S. Eliot, we shall not cease from exploration, and the end of our exploring is to arrive where we started from. At the end of our exploring is to arrive where we started from and know the place for the first time.

So what Eckhart was saying is, you know, instead of searching, just actually go back to where you started from. It's a journey without distance. And when you realize that, that there's a journey without distance, you turn the quality of your awareness to being present.

Now it's very interesting, we can say this many times, and you know, you can hear this, and you can go out, and then you get distracted. You get distracted, and then something happens at some point where you realize that you don't need to be distracted. You can be the timeless being in the midst of time-bound activity.

You can be the hub around which the whole universe arises and subsides. Because the universe, by the way, is nothing but sensations, images, feelings, and thoughts within consciousness. So there's a very important Mahavakya.

Mahavakya means big idea, and it's still an idea till you experience it in Sanskrit. Aham Brahmasmi. Aham means I am.

Brahmasmi, the universe. Because that's the only identity we have. We are the totality of the universe, the totality of the universe, as the continuum of space-time events now.

But that space-time events, the continuum is just a flux. It's coming and going, coming and going. So we go back to the fifth klesha, the fear of death.

People say, where do I go when I die? Okay, let me ask you a question just now. What did you have for lunch today?

What did you have for lunch? Salad? Where did you have lunch?

Now, as I'm asking you a question, the memory is coming, right? And you can experience it as a sensation, image, feeling, or thought, right? Where was that before I asked you the question?

Where was that experience before I asked you the question? Now, you know, traditional neuroscientists will say, it was in my brain, but I work with the best neuroscientists, my colleague, collaborators, Rudy Tanzi at Harvard, the chief neuroscientist and geneticist at Mass General Hospital. I said, Rudy, next time you have a conference, and you had 150 of the best scientists.

And I said, ask them, where is memory stored in a cellular level? Guess what? Not one of them could answer.

We know that when I asked you that question, and before you said salad, that there was a memory somewhere, but you can't find it in the brain. Can't find it in the brain. Do you remember the house you lived in when you were a teenager?

Can you see it now? So what are you seeing? You're experiencing sensations, images, feelings, thoughts, because those memories are associated with other memories.

If I go inside your brain, do you think I'll find a picture of your house? Or do you think there's some neural network where there is salad? So what happened?

When I asked you the question, a sensation, image, feeling, thought arose from consciousness, and then it subsided in consciousness. And that consciousness is transcendent. It doesn't exist in space-time.

So where do we go when we die? Where that salad was before I asked you the question. We don't go anywhere because we are there all the time.

Okay? In fact, every thought comes from there. Every memory comes from there.

Every desire comes from there. Every bit of imagination comes from there. Insights, intuition, imagination, creativity, choice, all comes from there.

And we have to be there in order to retrieve it. You retrieved it from your transcendent self. And being transcendent, it's not a space-time event.

But as you actualized it, then there was a little space-time. Okay? Ramana Maharshi, when he was dying, people said, we are going to miss you.

He said, but where am I going? Okay? What we call the physical world is a quality of awareness within awareness.

What we call the mental world is a quality of awareness within awareness. What we call the universe is a quality of awareness within awareness. And if you can just anchor yourself in that little space, the openness that Eckhart was saying, it's your ticket to freedom.

It's the ticket to freedom. Why? Because it's the you that never dies.

In the Bhagavad Gita, Lord Krishna says, water cannot wet it. Wind cannot dry it. Weapons cannot shatter it.

Fire cannot burn it. It's eternal. It's unborn because birth is a space-time event.

It doesn't die because death is a space-time event. A space-time event is part of the flux. So I think that's all I really want to say.

Okay? Now, just one minute. You know, we do these retreats, we do these retreats because sometimes people haven't sat down or been quiet for a long time, and it's almost impossible for them to be present.

So the retreat helps in taking you there. In fact, I do retreats myself in silence. So about two years ago, I took the opportunity to go to a monastery in Thailand, in the north of Thailand, and we had a very interesting routine over there.

Okay, and the routine was that, first of all, we shaved our head and our eyebrows, and we were barefoot, and so it was, you know, everybody looked the same, and there was no social mask. Secondly, we had to go begging. It wasn't called begging, it was called the arms round to find our food every day, and then, you know, people were so generous that we came back as if we had gone shopping to Whole Foods.

And then we shared our meal, and one meal a day, and the rest of the time was spent in silence and observing impermanence, because, you know, you soon realize that everything you're looking at is this flux. It's impermanent, and it had a very dramatic effect on all of us because it threw us in the present moment in a very interesting way. And so, when we were leaving, and the abbot, the senior abbot, who was the head of the monasteries, about half my age, you know, and we were in silence most of the time, but, you know, in the evenings, we had like two hours where we could talk to him, and he would ask me questions about quantum physics, and I realized he knew everything.

There was nothing I couldn't tell him. He had never read a book, he'd never learned mathematics or anything, but he had the experience that it wasn't difficult to explain to him what I knew intellectually. And on the day we were leaving, we were all in his presence, and he had a very gracious presence, just like Eckhart has, and he left us with two things, and I want to leave you with those two things, okay?

The first is, and this is both scientific insight and real insight, okay? There are no boundaries in the universe. Every boundary is conceptual.

In reality, there are no boundaries. We create them, just like we create latitude and longitude for purposes of convenience. So if I say, you know, meet me on 56th and Broadway on Tuesday at 6 p.m., now we've created an agreement for a boundary, but in reality, there are no boundaries at all. And the second thing, which you already know, is the present moment is the only moment that never ends, okay? The situations and circumstances around the present moment will change, but the moment won't change, because it's timeless, it's transcendent, it's eternal. So I'll leave you with what my abbot said to me, he said, the most important time in your life is now, the most important person in your life is the one you're with now, the most important activity in your life is the one you're involved with now.

And if you do that, the unknown will become known to you. The unknown is actually known only in the present moment, and that ultimately will lead to the conquest of death, because death happens in time. Only that which is born dies, but that which is never born cannot die.

Okay, thank you. I'm going to invite Eckhart, please welcome. So by the way, thank you.

By the way, you know, in the spiritual literature and in the yoga sutras of Patanjali, they talk about supernormal powers, they're called siddhis. Have you heard the word siddhi? Siddhis are dormant potentials, the ability to see in the future, the ability to experience the past, know previous lifetimes, remote viewing, remote healing.

And I'm experiencing a siddhi right now, and it says that Wayne Dyer is in this room. There he is, and you thought I wasn't psychic. So I'm going to first have a conversation with Eckhart, and then perhaps you can join us for a few moments.

Okay, so Eckhart, these questions have come through Facebook, and I picked up the ones that have come most frequently.

Just before we were talking, you were in the Buddhist monastery in Thailand, and there's this Buddhist scripture that came to mind that is one of my favorite sutras. I don't remember what it's called. It's a famous sutra.

The Buddha is supposed to have said it, but of course you never know. It says, so the Buddha is speaking to the monks. So he says, there is, oh monks, the unborn, the uncreated, the unmanifested.

If there were not the unborn, the uncreated, and the unmanifested, there would be no escape from the born, the created, and the manifested.

[Speaker 3] (1:08:11 - 1:08:34)

The idea of freedom is an idea. Beautiful. So I actually think I know the answer to this, but this is for you.

It says, can you describe your daily spiritual practices? Have they changed over the years?

Well, I don't, as you probably know, I don't have a practice as such, not a formal practice as a separate activity from ordinary daily living. But what naturally arises a lot of the time is spacious awareness. So I sometimes say it's a humorous, meant to be taken humorously.

It's my greatest achievement in life is that I don't need to think all the time anymore. And that makes life into a much more pleasant experience if you can be there as just as the presence. And so it's the intensity as I experience it may sometimes vary.

Sometimes presence can in certain occasions almost obliterate everything else. And at other times, it's always there's that space in the background. So it's hard to describe, but I'm sure you all know, you've already, almost all of you have experienced it.

If you're not yet permanently in presence, that's fine, but it is arising. So actually, alignment with the present moment is, you could say is my practice, but it's become second nature. So I can't call it practice anymore.

I would like to say what my practice is, because I actually was a disciple of Maharishi Mahesh Yogi for many, many years. And he did, in fact, initiate me into the practice that we all do here. And after a while, I did realize that the practice was like a tool.

And for me, I still do it because I'm so used to it. And besides that, sometimes even though I ignore the thoughts, they give me great ideas. And I make a living by selling words.

So I stay with the practice. Eckhart, how would you define happiness? Is being happy a realistic goal?

[Speaker 1] (1:11:22 - 1:14:25)

Is it a realistic goal? Well, it's partly a question of semantics, by which I mean how, what do we mean when we say happy? I personally don't use that term very much, but I know that, for example, Ramana Maharshi said, your true nature is happiness.

Happiness is your true nature. So he uses that term in a particular way. I don't use the word, I wouldn't use the word that much, because for most people, in common usage, happiness is a high.

You experience a high, and usually a temporary high. Ah, I'm so great! Yeah!

And so it's, you can't really, you cannot be on a permanent high. So if you have a high, you also experience the low. Oh, I thought that was going to be it, but it wasn't it.

So the term that I would use is spaciousness, joy, perhaps. It's that which makes the Buddha smile, when you look at statues, the good ones, of the Buddha. In the bad ones, he looks miserable.

But in the good ones, there's a very, there's just a hint of a smile on his lips. And why, why is the Buddha smiling? If you approach Buddhism from a purely intellectual viewpoint, in some universities, they'll tell you that Buddhism is a life-denying religion, because they don't really understand it.

They only understand the statements. And Buddha said, emptiness is the ultimate answer, which of course is true. But you cannot, if you've never had even a glimpse of emptiness, you will think it's life-denying.

So the Buddha has a slight smile, because no matter what the Buddha experiences, he experiences everything against the background of emptiness. Another word for which would be spaciousness, or another word for which would be stillness. There's always that stillness, and the Buddha is the stillness.

The Buddha is rooted in the stillness, which is when we use words, we create a duality, but the Buddha is the stillness. So that is really, I think when Ramana Maharshi used the term happiness, and I don't know what, whether it's even a correct translation from what he used in his native language, that is, I believe, what he pointed to. I personally would not use the term happiness.

I don't know about you.

[Speaker 3] (1:14:25 - 1:15:55)

Well, in the Buddha's teaching, there are four qualities of consciousness that he calls divine. So the first is loving-kindness. The second is joy, which is not happiness.

Happiness is a thought, okay? Joy is without thought. The third is compassion, and the fourth is equanimity.

And if you really think of these qualities of consciousness, they're actually, at a very primordial level, they are not thought, okay? None of them is thought. All these are very subtle ways of communion, which means me and the other is one.

Okay, so when Eckhart said, you know, happiness is high and low, yeah, happiness is a melodrama, in a way, and joy is not. Joy is essential. This question on Facebook, I'm an artist and drew inspiration for my work from the simple and genuine love that existed between me and my husband until I found out that he betrayed me.

Now I feel like my core is empty and my creativity is dead. How do I inspire myself to dream and imagine again?

Well, that's a sad story, but it comes from... It is, of course, it's a story. But as long as that is very real to you, it's there's suffering in it.

And there's a way out. I'd like to point the way beyond that for this person. Your husband betrayed you, okay.

Your husband is a human being, I assume. Now, I love that term, human being, because we have two words here. We have human and we have being.

Now, that which the love in you, when you were in the presence of your husband, that which you loved in the husband was the same in you. It was the being quality of that human. And the human is the form as which that he assumes that form.

And that form is imperfect. So when you don't know, when you bring them together, you think that love was an illusion, but it was not. You just haven't recognized that there is the dimension of being in him and in you.

And that's from that recognition, love arose. But the mind mixes it up with the form, and the form is imperfect. And so, because of that, now, because you have this thought, what you're telling yourself in your head is now blocking that deeper awareness.

The story that you believe in, in your head, that you are telling yourself, is blocking the deeper awareness of being. And that is, once you recognize that, you can feel that love again, because that love is who you essentially are. And so, and then the possibility of forgiveness also arises.

Your husband, you forgive the human, and whatever unconsciousness the human manifested. But the real forgiveness cannot arise until you know yourself as the formless, no longer identify with what arises in the world of form. And then you can look through that, and forgiveness arises naturally.

We say that the husband is a human being, but he is also being human? Yes. What is the best possible outcome of a life that one could hope for?

What should we strive to create for ourselves? Strive. Strive.

Well, the best and the one single worthwhile, truly worthwhile thing is to encounter, to realize, to discover transcendence in your life, so that you're no longer trapped in that narrow, personalized, form-identified, thought-identified sense of self. And if there's nothing to you but that, the person, then life is a very frustrating business. And this is what the Buddha referred to when he used the term suffering, and said, whatever you do, wherever you go, you will encounter that.

But he also pointed the way beyond, so there is the possibility of realizing your formless, true nature. And that begins with a gap between two thoughts. It begins this moment, when your attention moves fully into this moment, not just awareness of sense perceptions, but also, and this sounds a little strange, but it's key, awareness of awareness.

So if you can be aware at this moment, not only of that which arises in your immediate sense experience, or thoughts, or emotional field, but if you can be aware, that we're in a language, we always, of course, language always creates duality, so you have to make allowances for that. If you can be aware right now, you have to, it can only be realized now. If you can be aware that you are aware right now, in addition to the things that you perceive, there is a space of awareness.

That is what makes life worthwhile. And then, when that arises, and then becomes a living realization in you, that is really the one thing, as Jesus said, there's only one thing that truly matters. And then you have chosen that one thing.

That's the Mary and Martha story in the Gospels, where Jesus says to Mary, you have chosen the one thing that really matters. Whereas Martha was running around, oh, I have to think about this, do this, get this ready. There's only, there's one thing that truly matters.

And then, the rest of your life, what form it takes, is secondary. It will unfold beautifully, with, of course, comes, nothing is impermanent, and you won't need to cling to things anymore, and be afraid that they leave you. And, very important, you won't have expectations that the world is going to make you happy.

This is a very fundamental thing that many, it's an error in their mind. They believe that the world somehow has the ability, if they could only engineer things in such a way that everything would just fit neatly into place, and at some point, they can arrive at a place where the world is going to provide them with fulfillment. And, of course, advertising knows that, and so, advertising is built on that, to foster that belief that the world can do that.

So, once you know yourself as awareness, which is a joyous thing, there's a deep joy and satisfaction in knowing yourself as awareness, then you don't expect anymore that situations, conditions, or people should make you happy. And, the paradox is, when you don't have the expectation that people, situation of people, should make you happy and satisfy you, they are actually quite satisfying.

So, that's what, you know, stresses the universe is not behaving the way I think it should. Our culture seems to foster the desire to judge ourselves, honing in on what is wrong with our body, where we have fallen short, how we are not measuring us up. Many of us have a harsh inner critic, and we say things to ourselves that we would never say to a friend or loved one.

How do we learn to turn off this inner judge when it has been harping at us for many decades?

[Speaker 1] (1:24:26 - 1:29:23)

The inner critic, the, for some people have that very strongly, other people experience it from time to time. Sometimes the mind is, you feel happy with yourself, and then the next day, something else. But it manifests in different ways for different people.

For some, it's mainly the inner critic, criticizing myself. For others, others are very critical about other people. Others are very critical about situations they find themselves in.

They're always complaining. You may remember from before you awakened spiritually that you always, a lot of the time, there was this compulsive mind activity. A lot of that was actually complaining about things and people and where one is and why they should have, why didn't they, they should, countless stories that come.

And so people are trapped in this torture of their own minds. And the question is how to step out. Anything we say about how to go beyond that presupposes that there's already a minimum of awareness in you from where you can realize what your mind is doing.

So that needs to be there. And that is there in all of you and much more, of course. There are still millions of people on the planet.

They're also on their way. They don't have yet the minimum awareness. Tell a terrorist or any fundamentalist to be aware of their own thoughts and or question them.

They will get very angry. And so I don't recommend that. They are not ready for it.

So but you can recognize what your mind is doing to yourself. And you can then, if there is an awareness there, and then you can choose to direct your attention somewhere else. You don't have to follow everything.

You don't have to believe everything you think. Somebody even made that into a bumper sticker. I loved it.

You don't have to believe everything you think. And that is an enormous, you can disidentify from your mind and see what the mind is doing. And you can then also, by choice, place your attention on a flower or the sky or anything natural.

And you stepped out. I also recommend for people who are very much burdened by the mind, place your attention into the inner energy field of your body. Feel the aliveness that pervades the entire body.

And then you can't think that much anymore. You can't feel both the aliveness within your body and think a lot. So that takes your attention into wake up in this.

I don't know if anybody still experiences that here. You wake up at two or three in the morning and you're thinking. And it's not pleasant.

It's about my problems. And if you then suddenly you discover the futility of it, and then you also have a choice. At that moment, you have a choice.

And then you can say, I choose to place my attention on the inner energy field of the body. And from one moment, from one minute to the next, you're suddenly, you enjoy being awake at night and feel the intense aliveness in every cell of the body. That's one simple way.

It's a kind of meditation practice. It's one simple way of taking attention away from thinking. When you realize it is not only futile, it's also destructive.

And that needs to be then practiced if you have a meditation period. That's wonderful, of course, daily meditation period. But in addition, I always recommend mini meditations throughout the day, which could be a simple thing as taking two or three conscious breaths while you're waiting for the elevator.

Or do something consciously with full attention that usually you do unconsciously. Anything that is usually a means to an end, make it into an end in itself. Washing your hands.

Be totally present. You're getting out of your mind. Walking down a few steps.

Be totally present rather than needing to get to the bottom. Be there in every step. So little mini meditations gradually help you to disidentify from the movement of thought.

So this is what I would recommend to our questioner and to anybody else who is still burdened by their minds or tortured by their minds.

[Speaker 3] (1:29:31 - 1:31:01)

So for those of you who like formulas, here's one. Stop. Okay.

It's an acronym. S stands for stop. T stands for take three deep breaths as Eckhart just told us to.

And while you're taking those three deep breaths, smile everywhere in your body from head to toe. O stands for observe. Observe your body, as you said.

And P stands for proceed with love and kindness. Break the response. Okay.

So it's 9 o'clock and our live stream is ending. So I want to bring Uwain. We don't want to lose this opportunity at least.

I've known Uwain now for 25 years. We've grown up together. He just looks a little older.

But we are brothers. What am I doing here?

It was at the very last observation you made, Deepak, that the word love finally came in. And it's been my journey to learn to come to a new kind of love in my life. I have been reading a great teacher from Bulgaria whose name was Peter Dunov, of whom Einstein said at the height of his popularity back in the 30s that the whole world bows before me and I bow before Peter Dunov.

Peter Dunov was a man who talked about a different kind of love. He said there are basically three kinds of love. One is human love.

And human love is a love that changes and varies. So this is a love that, I love you, but you came home late and you forgot Valentine's Day, so I don't love you so much. And it's constantly changing.

I love you, I hate you, and on and on it goes. And then there's a love that he called spiritual love, which is a love that never changes, but it does vary. This is a love that I can only define as the love I have for my children.

I have eight of them. And it really doesn't matter what they do or how they behave, how they conduct themselves. The love is just there.

I'm sure the people who've committed some of these atrocities that we've been experiencing the last few months here in America, the mothers of these people still love them. Having eight children, I know that it varies. Sometimes it's a little stronger than others, but it's always there.

And I'm sure you know that with your children. And I see Rita there as we were talking about her children, your children. And then there's a love that Peter Doonough spoke about, which is a love that he calls divine love.

And this is a love that never changes. And this is a love that never varies. And this is a love I aspire to.

And the only way I can describe it, it's in the gospel of Thomas in the Nag Hammadi scrolls that were found in 1945. Jesus is quoted as saying that when you make the two one, then you can enter the kingdom. And the opening line of the Tao Te Ching, a book that I studied and lived and wrote a whole series of essays about, the opening line of the Tao says the Tao that can be named is not the Tao.

And so I try to imagine a love that Jesus spoke about when you take the two and make it one. So this is a love that has no opposites. So if I were to ask you the word, I said, what is joy?

And I say, what is the opposite of joy? Most of you would probably say something like despair or sadness and so on. And if I ask you to imagine a joy that has no opposite, it's just joy.

Or if I were to ask you, what's the opposite of love? We could come up with many antonyms to love. Try to imagine a love that has no opposite.

That's all there is. Nothing else can come up. I was thinking when Eckhart was speaking about what is it in us that you talk about happiness.

And I was thinking, I don't use the word happy either. Shakespeare in one of his plays said, I think he said it this way, my crown is in my heart, not on my head, not decked with diamonds, nor Indian stones, nor to be seen. My crown is called content.

A crown it is that seldom kings enjoy. And that kind of love is the love I aspire to. Contentment, a love that knows no opposite.

Now we're talking up here about being human, and of course we're all in human bodies, and making the two one is almost impossible for us. There's a woman here in the audience who I didn't even know yesterday that I was going to be here today. I just happened to be staying at a hotel nearby.

I'm going to see my publisher tomorrow to do some recording, and then I'm going to Denver to do a workshop on the weekend, a writer's workshop. And sitting next to me on the table is Eckhart Tolle, my friend, man who I've done a program with recently called The Importance of Being Extraordinary. And of course to my left is a man who we call each other brothers.

We've loved each other very, very much since the early 1990s. I think it was 1990. So the idea that I was going to be here, I didn't even know this was going on.

And Eckhart said, why don't you come, and here I am. And when I walked in, someone else walked up to me and said, Wayne, what are you doing here? And her name is Anita Moorjani.

Stand up, Anita. Where are you, dear? And Anita, I have written a foreword to a book that occurs called Dying to Be Me.

And she, I think she's speaking here, are you speaking here tomorrow? On Friday here at the Chopra Center? Right, right.

So Anita has described what it was like. I mean, she had end-stage lymphoma cancer for five years, was down to 82 pounds, had tumors the size of lemons throughout her entire body, and only had a few hours left to live. And became an observer and watched this whole process.

And I saw something about her experience on the internet and located her in Hong Kong. She happened to be in Dubai when I found her, and I asked her if she would write her story. And she wrote her story and sent it to me to see if we could publish it.

And I sent it back to her and said, it isn't good enough. I want you to go back to the state that you were in when you experienced the kind of love I'm speaking about here right now. A love that has no opposites.

The words awareness have been tossed around up here, higher awareness. But in that state, that state where there is only one, there is no opposite, whatever you place your attention on, you become. And the only thing that you can feel is a kind of unconditional love.

So for me, as I aspire, it is to live a love that has no judgment, no criticism, no condemnation towards any of God's creations. And if we can get to that place, and while we are human, there will still always be the two, the dichotomy will always be there, there will always be the opposite. But in the world that Eckhart describes so beautifully in The Power of Now, we can do this inside here.

In here, we don't have to have those judgments, those criticisms, those condemnations. And when we get to that place, because as many of you know, I was diagnosed with leukemia three years ago. And I had an experience of having a remote healing from John of God down in Brazil.

Many of you, probably everyone in this room knows who that is. And what I thought happened is that these entities entered into my body, and they just healed me of leukemia. But that isn't what happened.

What happened is that these entities entered my body, and they took out fear. The word leukemia is loaded with fear. It isn't about fear of dying.

It's just, it's such a word. It's just cancer of the blood, you know, every word going through your body. It's all of the things, all of the things about cancer, the cancer that Anita spoke about so brilliantly in her revised edition of the book, which was done so beautifully.

And so it is, I woke up the morning after I had had this remote healing from John of God. And my two of my children were there with me on Maui. One of them was my daughter, and I looked at her, and I just, I had never seen her the way I had seen her that morning.

And I put my arms around her, and I just said, I just can't describe to you how much I love you. And I looked at my son, and I put my arms around him, and I looked outside. I live on the ocean.

The ocean looked different. It's never, it never, I just had never seen it before. The palm trees just look different.

The birds, the grass, every stranger that I encountered. In the Course, it says there are two ways of reacting. There's love and there's fear.

And everything that is love cannot be fear. And everything that is fear cannot be love. So what I would ask you to do is to ask yourself, how much of my life and the decisions that I make are based upon fear?

Do you eat the foods that you eat because you're afraid that if you don't, you'll get sick? Or do you do it out of love? This is my body, this is the temple I live in, and I want to treat it that way.

Do you drive the speed limit because you love everyone around you and you want them to be safe? Or do you drive the speed limit because you're afraid that if you don't, you're going to get a ticket so you have a radar detector and on and on and on it goes. And I could go on with these kinds of, you can look at almost every single thing that we do in our life, and so many of them are based on fear.

And what Anita's experience was when she was in the other realm is that there is no such thing as fear. And cancer, and Deepak and I have done many programs on this. In fact, I remember in London at the Palladium, you and I standing up there one time asking that question, why so much cancer in our world?

Why so much illness? Why so much disease? Because you used to always say it's perfect health, you know, that we don't, our bodies do not have to, there's nothing physically in there that says these bodies have to get older and they have to deteriorate and they even have to die.

And if we could get the fear out of our hearts and just come from a place of no judgment, no criticism, no condemnation towards any of God's children, we could live what Shakespeare was speaking about. We could just be content. And that's all I have to say.

Thank you so much. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (1:44:16 - 1:44:18)

Thank you. Thank you very much.

[Speaker 1] (1:44:20 - 1:45:39)

And the fear, of course, perpetuate itself through judgments in the mind. And judgments are thoughts that we identify with, that possess us. So the key then is to disidentify from the judgments and to invite the place of no thought into our lives.

Ramana Maharshi was asked by a disciple or a visitor in his ashram, how can we know that we are making progress on the spiritual path? How do we know that? And Ramana Maharshi said, the degree of absence of thinking is the criterion for progress on the spiritual path.

So now you know whether you're making progress. The degree of absence of thinking is the criterion for progress on the spiritual path. It's as simple as that.

Well said, well said. One other observation, I've just spent the last six months or so in a secluded state of writing every single day. And I've written something called I Can See Clearly Now.

And it's just a look back at all of the things that just like, so there's look back at, I lived 10 years in an orphanage. And what did that result in? And all the way up right through just recently.

And I think about how I happen to be here on this stage tonight, with two people I admire so much and love so much.

[Speaker 1] (1:46:22 - 1:46:32)

Well, it was a synchronistic event brought you here because you were sitting behind the table behind ours last night. It was just amazing. Yes, to have you.

[Speaker 4] (1:46:32 - 1:51:29)

So let's look at, this is just fascinating to me, because having just written about all of this, like we're talking about, you were talking about time, both of you were talking about time earlier. And so I like to think that there's this thing called horizontal time. And just imagine a line going across here that represents time.

And this is called chronological time, or passing time, or cause and effect time. So what got me here? I made a decision to go down to that restaurant last night to meet with my friend Mark and his daughter.

I didn't even want to do that. But something said, go down there. So there's cause and effect.

So Mark called me. I said, okay, I'm not sure. I don't know.

And on how did I happen to get here to even to San Diego? That's a whole other story about why I'm even here. And you think that you're making all these choices, and cause and effect.

So I did this, and that caused this, and that caused this. And then we showed up in the lobby. And then some young woman from Russia recognized me and wanted me to be on her TV show that she's doing.

She's cooking raw foods. And I said, no, I can't do that. And then we went into the restaurant and then came over.

And I meet Stephen Goldhauer, who was the brother of someone that I was in love with for several years, years back, who I haven't seen in a long time. And I see Greg, who worked at the Omega Institute, and whom I've known. And all of these people are showing up.

And Eckhart comes over. And we just had a program that just come out. And all of this stuff is going on.

So this caused this, caused this, caused this. And then he said, well, we're having this program tomorrow. Would you like to come over?

I said, okay, but I'll go in the back. Because I don't really want the spotlight to be on me. I want it to be on these two guys.

This is their program. So I'll just come in. No, no, no.

We want you to be in the front. We'd like to have... So here I am in the front.

Then I had the psychic experience. And Deepak, my psychic brother, who knows everything anyway. So we've got this whole horizontal thing.

This caused this, caused this. And I could sit down and write them all out, all the reasons how I got here tonight. I'd have to go back to when I was born in 1940, and when my mother was born in 1916, and her mother.

We could just go all the way up to this moment. And here I am. And then there's another kind of time.

And this is a time that isn't represented by a horizontal line, but is represented by a vertical line. And this is a vertical line that goes right up to God. And this line is called eternal time, in which there is no time.

There is no, there's nothing but one. There's only oneness. Okay, so everything in eternal time has already been taken care of.

Carl Jung said, at the same moment that you are a protagonist in your own life, and you're making choices, at the very same moment, you're also the spear carrier, or the extra, in a much larger drama. You are all, he said, doomed to make choices. Now, you want to talk about a paradox, right?

You're doomed, that means it's all taken care of, and within that stance of being doomed, you're making choices. So now we've got this line going straight up, representing eternal time. So my being here right now was already handled.

It was handled the moment of my conception. But the point where this line crosses this line, and that cross is made, at that very point, is where you can see both times operating at the same moment. You can literally see that you are making choices, and they're already taken care of.

Everything is taken care of for you. And so what Deepak and Eckhart have been saying is, there is no need to worry about anything. It's all just taken care of.

And even your worry is a part of the eternal time thing here. And here was the conclusion. This was from a book called, To Know We Are Loved, by Rashad Field.

You know Rashad Field? You know that man? He's still alive.

To Know We Are Loved. He said, and this is the one I want you to walk out of here with, and really think about. Your conception and your death are happening at exactly the same time.

It's the same experience. When you get that, you can get back, and you can see yourself making all of these decisions, but you can also see that it's all handled for you. And in eternal time, there's no opposite, which means there's no past, and there's no future.

There's only... Thank you.

Okay, so I'm going to conclude now, this evening with just three simple observations out of this whole experience. The first is, every event is a conspiracy of the total universe. So go with the flow, okay?

Second is that love actually does heal, and there's a biological reason why it heals. It creates what is called limbic resonance in your brain, and it starts self-repair mechanisms, what in medicine we call homeostasis. It takes you back to your original state, which is well-being.

And the third is, the love he was speaking for is really so well articulated in the teaching of Nisargadatta Maharaj, who you introduced me to and became my teacher, absolutely. He says, my love radiates from me like light from a bonfire, focused on none and denied to none. So good night and thank you.

I think I understand. I definitely feel the interconnectedness of all of us and the oneness. What I'd love to hear your thoughts on are the unique aspects of our individual existence beyond the world of form and ego.

In other words, is there a part of us, a soul or energy that transcends death?

[Speaker 1] (1:53:32 - 2:29:38)

Well, there's the form which is not just the physical form that you are. There's also the mental form, the psychological form that you are. And deeper than that, there's an energetic formation.

Also consciousness has taken form temporarily and appears as a human being. But what you see on the surface is only a surface appearance. And underneath that, there's the energy that animates the form and that temporarily takes on that particular form.

Also, even that energy, as long as it's behind the body, is there and outlives the body for quite some time. And it's still form, but form is not separate from that which animates the form ultimately. It just appears to be.

So in the same way that the wave movement of the sea is not separate from the sea, the ripple on the ocean is not separate from the ocean, but for a little while it appears as something separate. So on the level of form here, you are a man or a woman, you are of a certain age, you have a certain psychological makeup according to your past and perhaps even past lifetimes, that all operates on the level of form. So you can honor the level of form for what it is without worshiping it or identifying with it and believing that this is who you truly are.

But it doesn't mean that you totally reject it, because it is not separate from the one life, the one unmanifested, timeless life that appears in billions of life forms that continuously come and go, appear, disappear, appear, disappear. Anybody would very quickly find it easy to be connected with the formless dimension if you could see a speeded-up version of life forms as they come and go. And bodies being born, growing up, reaching maturity, getting old, finally becoming decrepit and dissolving.

If you could see these things in one room, if you could see within two minutes of the people sitting in this room popping out of existence, at least on the level of body, one after the other, dissolving as if they'd never been like soap bubbles, you would very quickly sense an underlying... First, you would be amazed. Here you go.

Even with flowers, sometimes you see it in films, a flower comes out of the ground and immediately withers, and it's gone. If you could see that, you would easily connect with that which is beyond form, and that is the power of becoming aware of the fleetingness of all forms. The essential thing is to be connected with that, and then you can honor the form as which you appear for a while, and be active on the level of form.

It doesn't say, I'm the formless, so I'm never going to do anything again. No, you can take up things, learn to do this, learn to do that, not expecting ultimate fulfillment because nothing is going to give you that on the outside, nothing that you can do or possess or knowledge. None of that can tell you who you essentially are, can give you ultimate fulfillment, and yet you can pursue these things, acquire knowledge, read some more books, enjoy it.

As long as you enjoy it, the level of form has its place. There's no need to say, I'm never going to read another book because it's all illusion. Or you learn to play an instrument, you learn this, you learn that, you deal...

Artistic creation, whatever it is, dance, whatever, enjoy the level of form, but you can only truly enjoy the level of form if you are rooted in the formless. If you're not rooted in, if you don't have that point of stillness, that space of stillness in you while you pursue things, then things will become frustrating to you, and they will, for a little while they might be great, they give you excitement or whatever, or some egoic fulfillment for a little while. Ego is never fulfilled for very long, as the song says, I can't get no satisfaction.

So if you pursue forms and you're not rooted in that essential reality within yourself, all forms will eventually become bitter. Even the most pleasant thing that you pursue, even if you learn to play the piano, you become the greatest pianist, and one day you won't be the greatest pianist, or somebody is greater than you, or arthritis comes into your hands, or whatever, or it's no longer fulfilling after a few years. But whatever it is, all forms that you pursue, for the sake of the form alone, expecting something through your pursuit that it cannot give you, that always life is just one frustrating thing after another, and then people, very many people become disillusioned or cynical and don't believe in anything anymore.

Well, of course, you've been pursuing all the illusions all your life, and some people lose all interest suddenly in anything because they've seen, but that's, perhaps it was, there was a man who wrote, I don't know how it got into the New Testament, one book of the New Testament, Vanity of Vanities, All is Vanity, written by somebody who's done it all, and has seen how vain, now vanity in that sense is the old meaning of the word, it means useless, empty of meaning.

Vanity of Vanities, All is Vanity, I've done it all, he says, I can't quote it literally, but it's worth going back to, it's a lovely piece of writing, it's nothing to do with God or anything, or how it got into the New Testament, I don't know, but I'm glad it's there because it's a beautiful piece of writing, it expresses a state of consciousness of somebody who has pursued things on the level of form, and expresses his dissatisfaction, his deep dissatisfaction with things.

And then all he comes up with, well, you just eat and drink and be merry, that's a superficial thing, it's not no true solution there, it's just, it's an expression of a disillusioned state of consciousness, but it's a beautiful expression of it, and so it's a lovely work of art to read that, and it's a faithful reflection of a state of consciousness that is disconnected, that thought there was some answer on the level of form, when you know that there is no ultimate answer and otherwise no ultimate fulfillment, no ultimate self-realization, I want to find myself through this or that, then the world of form becomes actually quite a pleasant place when you do not have unreasonable expectations, you honor it, you play with it, you participate to some extent, or to a large extent, and yet one of the things, of course, that's expressed in many ancient scriptures, such as the Bhagavad Gita, you are not attached to the results. Now the Bhagavad Gita tells you, don't be attached to the results, but it's, what comes prior to that is to be connected with the formless stillness, the alive stillness inside you, it's very hard, if not impossible, not to be attached to the result if you are not rooted in the being.

If you're not rooted in the being, you need the result of your doing. Do not be attached to a result really only works if you are connected, and then you can see, you can enjoy action in the world of form without being attached to the outcome, and that's an enormous freedom, and only then can you truly enjoy the doing. If you're attached to the outcome, you have a mental projection of where you want to get to, and that spoils to a large extent the joy in doing what you do, because you need to get there, you think, it's a future point that doesn't really exist, and even if you get what you wanted, if you're not, if you're disconnected, it's not going to make you happy.

Even if the outcome that you wanted comes, it's still not happy, or the very outcome that before you thought would make you happy makes you unhappy. Hence the saying, there are two ways of being unhappy, not getting what you want, and getting what you want. So as we sit here with nothing happening except one little thing, the mind can drift off and create some imaginary happening, so you start thinking about past, future, dreamland, because the mind is not comfortable with nothing happening.

So you can, as you sit here, drift off into dreamland of past and future until finally the session actually starts, not realising that it has started already. In the same way that people wait for their lives to start, not realising that it started already. So what's the alternative then to drifting off?

The alternative is to just be present with your attention in the simplicity of this moment where there's almost nothing happening. So what's left of you when you're not following some train of thought, and the space opens up? What's left then of this moment?

What's the content of this moment? Just whatever your senses are perceiving, the totality of the room, the lights, some noises, the voice, and that which makes it all possible, there's a light in which it appears, the consciousness behind it all, that's what's left. It has no form, no time, just presence, and that's who you are beyond past and future, nothing to do with your personal history, except that your personal history has brought you to this moment of being aware that there is a dimension in you that has nothing to do with your personal history, and nothing to do with conceptualisation in the mind, any kind of mental noise, just a kind of an aware space, and that's the ground, all what arises out of that is joy and aliveness, and it's peaceful to know yourself as that is peaceful, it is peace, but a live peace. So the peace is already there as the essence, never in conditions, outer conditions, or mental conditions, cannot provide you with peace except the delusion of peace for short moments. So to seek peace in conditions, whether mental conditions, or external conditions, is frustrating, and you overlook the simple fact that the realm of peace, which is the unconditioned consciousness in you, the timeless, the light of the world, Jesus called it, is already there, in its fullness, has always been there, will always be there, although saying has and will doesn't make sense because it's timeless, but it's being, it's overlooked, the essence is overlooked because of the seductive nature of the world of form, thoughts that continuously arise, sense perceptions, and you lose yourself in forms, thought forms, and external forms, and following up, and then you're full of stuff, looking for yourself in some other stuff, more stuff for my mind, and then so you overlook the essence that's always there, so it's a redirecting of attention from attention to form, and now we have to be careful, if I say, attention to the formless dimension in you, that sounds as if the formless dimension in you could become an object of your attention, but it can't, because the formless dimension in you cannot become an object of your attention, of your consciousness, because the formless dimension is consciousness, consciousness can't become an object to itself, so in that sense you can never find the essence of who you are as if you say, I know, I have it, you can never say, I have it, all you can ever say is, I am it, so it can't be an object, you cannot make yourself into an object, and I know myself, you can't know yourself, you can know lots of things about yourself, all to do with mental content, but you cannot know yourself in its, who you are in your essence, because you are the eternal subject, the basis of all knowing, the moment you say, I know myself, then there's I and myself, you've already split yourself into two, and basically that's the ego, where you split yourself into two and say, oh, that's me, and then you have a relationship with yourself, which my dog does not have a relationship with himself, the cat doesn't have a relationship with itself, the split hasn't occurred yet, me and who I think I am, so usually the progression for people is, first you have a dysfunctional relationship with yourself, you hate yourself a lot of the time, and sometimes you say, oh, I'm really great, but not for long, and then you doubt yourself, and then you're learning about becoming more loving towards yourself, that's great, that's the stage of stickers on your bathroom mirror, I love myself, that's the intermediate stage, and then from there you go on to the realization that there are not two of you, that you are yourself, and what's left is the simple fact that I am who I am, or I am that I am, which by the way was God's answer from the Old Testament, when they asked God, who are you? So you can't know yourself, you can only be yourself, there's nothing conceptual to know, if it's conceptual, that's not who you are, in other words, you have to embrace ignorance, as the Course in Miracles says, your understanding is not an important contribution to the truth, and of course, there's something in you that wants to, I want to understand myself more, because you can go that way for a long time, and of course, there's always more, and eventually you get to the end of the road where you give up, and that's the moment when you're no longer a problem to yourself, and when you're not a problem to yourself, by the way, you're not a problem to others anymore either, how many people walk around with an identity, the sense of identity, that basically consists of the belief that they are a problem, which seeks a solution, of course, there is a solution, but that's not where the ego itself is seeking, the solution is already here, it's not in time, this moment, the realization that at this moment, you already are who you are, as the awareness in which the form of this moment appears, in other words, you become aware that you are aware, you know yourself as the awareness, the awareness knows itself, that's an amazing realization, that's the I am realization, but not this or that, just I am, and that's peace, to know yourself through that act of not knowing, not to know yourself in any conceptual sense, to be yourself as the awareness, and then the dance of forms, of course, continues in life, and there's a piece in the background, the art of living is to be aware that you are the awareness, be aware that you are the presence, be aware as the presence, the awareness, while not only you look at things and observe things, but even while you do and talk, and you'll notice spaces in your life, and that's vital, spaces while in between things, where before there was no space, at least you didn't notice it, but now you notice that there are spaces, many spaces in your life where there's an opening into just pure presence, and it could just be picking up an object and putting it down again, looking at a tree without labeling it in any way, just being the perceiving presence for it, walking from here to there without making each step a means to an end, but just be present with every step, the spacious stillness when you're listening to another human being, just being there as the space, not as an object of some mental noise, and so there's a gradual thing where the personality recedes a bit in your life, still operates when it's needed, but more and more there's awareness that arises, you are there as an aware presence rather than as a person with a past and a future, so the person begins to become transparent somewhat to the light of awareness that shines through the form, whereas before it was dense, it's just pushing against, trying to get through little chinks, occasionally get through, you have moments of ah, and then it's gone, so it gets through. Now you may notice a certain alertness is required, no tension or strain, but a certain alertness so that thought does not get hold of you and drag you along where it wants to go, the old conditioned thinking, so certain alertness is required, and we are here, this is our meditation today here, the alertness needs to be there for otherwise you drift off into the dream state of identification with thinking, and then suddenly, oh, out of that alertness, thoughts can come, but they will be not a replay of the old conditioned thinking, but more vitally alive thoughts when they do come, insights, realizations, a new way of aliveness when you, that is there, a fresh new thought, inspired, creative, and at other times, there's just, of course, love is part of what comes out of that unconditioned space, can't come from anywhere else. We are lucky today to have an honored guest here, it's becoming a tradition as part of our sessions, and I'd like, this guest does not need introduction, but I would like to introduce her by telling you how I first got introduced to her, she doesn't know that, I haven't told you yet, in, it was about 1986 perhaps, and I was living in London, and the Course in Miracles had just been published, I think the year before, in England, in a one-volume paperback, and whereas at first I, when I heard Course in Miracles, I said, that's probably just, it's another weird thing that's come through from California, I had the European prejudice, later I realized that many wonderful things do also come from California, some weird things too, of course I didn't realize the Course in Miracles didn't really originally come from California at all, it came from Manhattan, Columbia University, well unofficially, not sponsored by Columbia University, and so I was visiting a friend, having tea, and talking a bit about this Course in Miracles, that I had actually discovered was actually quite profound, so I had bought a copy, and my friend said, oh I want you to listen to this, somebody gave me this tape, a copy of a copy, sound isn't too good, but you'll still understand, this is a woman, she gives talks about the Course in Miracles, okay I'll just put it on, now listen to this, and he put it on, and I, it almost seemed like I breathed in at the beginning of the talk, and I didn't breathe out until the end of it, half an hour later, there was such fire and empowerment in it, when the talk finished after half an hour, I went, wow, that's amazing, and I, what's her name, and she said, oh I can't remember, oh it's Marianne Williamson, oh never heard of her, at that time there was no, there were no books yet, and so on, so the, I still remember how the talk finished, she said at the end, and it's almost over, thank you very much, now I can't remember what that refers to, I think it must refer to the egoic insanity of the world, and it's almost over, and I, we have her here, and I'm going to ask her in a minute, whether she still thinks it's almost over, please welcome Marianne Williamson, please, so is it almost over?

[Speaker 2] (2:29:40 - 2:30:12)

Well, as you well know, even though it began in millions, millions of years ago, in time as we know it, it's not actually happening, it's a hallucination, which is all just the twinkling of an eye, anyway, so from that perspective, it's always beginning, it's always almost over, and it's always ending,

[Speaker 1] (2:30:12 - 2:30:16)

in any of these moments that you discuss, and in another sense, it's over already,

[Speaker 2] (2:30:17 - 2:30:29)

yeah, exactly, in any moment, which you so profoundly describe, it can't exist, yes, yes, so when we're with you, it's over, yes,

yes, and so how is the, now the thing is the realization in humans, that that dimension is there, where this is recognized as a kind of dream, that the important thing is, whether humans realize that, because as long as you don't realize it, you are part of that dream, which very often turns into a nightmare, how is the, I know that Marianne is much more in touch with, I am with the world, the current affairs, and so on, especially in the States, how do you see the collective consciousness in, let's just maybe talk about North America, and later about the world, how do you see the state of the collective consciousness now?

Well, from a spiritual perspective, we can't have a meaningful inquiry about anything in the world, without the context of that inquiry being what's happening in the realm of spirit or pure consciousness, and one of the main points of the Course, and any study of truth with a capital T, is that there is only one of us here, and that in truth there is no world, it's all happening inside us, and because within that perspective, all minds are joined, because there's only one of us here, in whatever moment we as individuals reach that place of pure consciousness, the presence of which you speak, holy instant, and Course in Miracles, we don't just create that greater opening for ourselves, but simultaneously it's created for everyone else as well.

I was telling you yesterday about a fascinating documentary I saw the other night called I Am, and in the documentary there's a conversation about cruelty versus cooperation in the animal kingdom, and there was something there that I'd never seen, and it was if a group of deer, or a group of gazelle, or a group of any animals that all travel together, how do they decide which waterhole to go to, or when birds are flying, what happens to make the whole flock fly a certain way, and what was so fascinating to me was it was in this documentary they were saying that in this group, I can't remember if it was gazelle, or deer, or something along that line, there is an alpha male leader of the pack, but that in the decision of what waterhole to go to, and there were three of them, it wasn't the alpha male who made the decision. It was as each individual gazelle, or deer, whatever it was, turned their head towards a particular waterhole. When 51 percent of the animals turned their head in one direction, the whole group of them went there, and that often the alpha male was just like, oh, okay, we'll go there, and I thought that was so amazing.

We talk about that in terms of 100th monkey, or the tipping point, whatever that is, but this elucidation of the 51 percent in nature I thought was fascinating. So I feel hopeful. First of all, I think hope itself is a moral imperative.

I feel hopeful about the state of humanity, because there are so many groups just like this, because you, people like yourself, are being filmed, and people literally all over the world are participating in this deeper inquiry and experience. It's not just an abstract teaching, it's the entire journey trickling down, and this is clearly happening, and it does not belong to any one ethnic group, or geographical region, or religion. So the state of humanity, for me personally, is just fine, thank you.

The problem we have, or the challenge we have, the situation we have, is that there are institutional identities, mainly political, financial, in terms of business, technology, wielding tremendous material power, and that material power takes profound forms, such as nuclear bombs. And even though those material identities are never the source of the enlightened progress, I believe that they are there in a way as a signal to us not to tarry.

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (2:36:19 - 2:36:46)

Not to tarry, because, as the Course in Miracles says, the ego is suspicious at best and vicious at worst. And as soon as we reach that vibratory field of whether it's 51 percent or whatever it is, then all of those material forms will fall of their own dead weight. Yes.

As soon as there's enough light, darkness cannot exist.

[Speaker 1] (2:36:47 - 2:37:13)

Yes. We already see that happening to some extent, some of the monolithic, egoically created structures are... The wall in Germany.

Yes, collapsing from within. Of course. Russian communism collapsing from within.

It's almost the saving grace, perhaps, of the ego that it seems to have built into it a self-destruct mechanism that eventually gets triggered.

Well, the Course in Miracles says there is a limit beyond which we cannot miscreate. However, in Course in Miracles terms, it is not up to you what you learn, it is merely up to you whether you learn through joy or through pain. Oh, the ego's dominance will fall.

The only issue is, do we go away of wisdom or do we go away, which would involve immeasurable amounts of human suffering? And that is our choice in the matter. Not whether the ego's dominance will end, because like you said, it's got a built-in self-destruct.

The issue is, how is this going to end? Is it going to end through joy or through suffering? I'm a mother, and any parent has had the experience of something that happens when this fierce impulse arises within you and you say to your child about whatever it is, that will not happen in his house.

And I look forward to the collective uprising in humanity, realizing that every child on this planet is one of our children, and realizing now that this entire earth is our house, it's our home. I think when it comes to certain forms of possibility, which are nothing short of catastrophic, just as we would, seeing that possibility of catastrophe inherent in a situation, say to one child, that will not happen here, that we will get to that place about this planet, that will not happen here. Because as we do, as that conviction, because the Course in Miracles says miracles arise from conviction, as the realization that the transformation will occur, but that it is in our hands, how quickly it occurs, and how much suffering it does or does not involve, when that understanding is met with a conviction, we will not go that way.

Then I believe something joyful beyond, just like the night of the falling of the Berlin Wall, times what? A million?

[Speaker 1] (2:39:40 - 2:40:12)

Yes, yes. So what is the individual's role as far as the huge egoically created structures is concerned? I'm a kind of person, I'm almost withdrawn a bit from the world, except for the teaching that goes out into the world.

You're a little bit more of an activist, so how do you see your role as far as the...

[Speaker 2] (2:40:12 - 2:40:32)

Well, from a Course in Miracles perspective, we are all given our own assignment. We all have a particular part to play. You are a profound player in the world, as everybody here knows, because you are acting so profoundly on the level of cause.

[Speaker 1] (2:40:32 - 2:40:32)

Yes.

And when we are in that state that you mentioned earlier, of pure consciousness, we receive nothing short of instruction, whether it's conceived of that way or not. It's interesting, looking at you, having been born in Germany, moving to London, ending up in Canada, I feel strongly that there's something here about honoring one's incarnation, where you were born, nationality, sex, sexuality. And even though in your case, clearly, there's a profound internationalism to your assignment.

And you and I have discussed how my daughter lives in England, and she's got some soul connection to England, even though she was born in the United States. I have some... I take very personally and deeply the successes and failures, both contributions and mistakes of the United States as an American woman.

But from a Course in Miracles perspective, which is just one statement of truth, of course, at the deepest level, we're neither male, female, black, white, Jew, Gentile, American, Canadian. I mean, those are all... But when we are in that place of depth inquiry, and depth knowing, and experience, we're beyond all of that.

And yet we are sent to work. And you work plenty out there. And the Course in Miracles says every day, we are to say, where would you have me go?

What would you have me do? What would you have me say? And to whom?

So I just try to do that as much as the next person does.

[Speaker 1] (2:42:41 - 2:42:48)

So honoring the form without identifying with it and believing that's who you are.

[Speaker 2] (2:42:48 - 2:42:50)

Or taking it too seriously.

[Speaker 1] (2:42:50 - 2:42:52)

Yes, that's an important...

[Speaker 2] (2:42:52 - 2:42:57)

Gandhi said, the greatest service I can be to my country is if I can reduce myself to zero.

[Speaker 1] (2:42:59 - 2:43:52)

Oh, that's a wonderful statement. So that really means discovering the unconditioned dimension in yourself. That's when you...

The form as which you appear ultimately is recognized as an illusion, not who you are. So the elimination of ego is the really inherently connected with the... What is perhaps the central point of this teaching?

The possibility of compulsive thinking coming to an end, old conditioned compulsive thinking, so that a space arises in you where there is no thinking, but just pure awareness.

[Speaker 2] (2:43:53 - 2:46:03)

It's counterintuitive. But when we are there, realizing the illusionary nature of the realm of form, that's when we have power within that realm. Because we don't take it seriously at the same level, we no longer fear it.

We no longer fear its dance because we know that we are not that. We are not its success or its failures. And that's when we have the power from this perspective that we so embrace to do that which we are sent to do within it.

Like that slogan, what would you do with your life if you had no fear of what the outcome would be? Because when you were talking before about how the dream has become a nightmare, I don't know if you were saying that here or when we were talking before, that this world is a dream and it has become a nightmare. In A Course in Miracles, it says we do not go from the nightmare to awakening.

We go from the nightmare to a happy dream. So that when, you know, right now we have 17,000 children on this earth who starve every day, just that fact alone. We have a billion people on this planet who live on $1, $1.25 and less a day. Now when we have a planet where, and no dearth of food by the way, when we have a planet where everyone is fed, where basically there is no unnecessary human suffering, it will still be a world of bodies, therefore it will still be a dream, but it will have become a happy dream and then we can wake up. Which is real different from a lot of those people with the stickers in their bathroom, I love myself, I love myself, I love myself, because it's a real slippery slope to therefore I don't have to engage in the world because it's all an illusion anyway. It's not my karma if a child is starving, etc.

Right? Am I correct?

[Speaker 1] (2:46:03 - 2:50:06)

Yes. So as sometimes happens in people's dreams, in the middle of the dream they realize they are dreaming. The dream can still continue and this is very much when you wake up here, you realize what comes to an end is the identification with form, because you are rooted, I'm using of course somewhat different terminology from The Course in Miracles, but you know it's the same thing.

So you're rooted in the formless. When you're rooted in the formless, the eternal in yourself, which we can call inner space, which we can call stillness, which we can call pure awareness, when you're rooted in that, then the world of form not only, as you said, is no longer taken absolutely seriously, I sometimes put it this way, I say it matters, but it does not matter absolutely. It has an importance, but its importance is relative, it's not absolute.

The only absolute importance is whether you know who you are in your essence, and that's, Jesus said that with Mary and Martha, when Martha was running around getting concerned with all the things that need to be doing, and Mary's only chosen to listen, but that means you have chosen, he said only one thing is ultimately needed, and you have chosen that one thing. So I don't think he said never to do anything again or work in the kitchen, but to know what is primary, and then what is secondary, tends to unfold with much greater ease, and no longer creates the suffering that is there inevitably when you believe that that's all there is and take it for absolutely real, and everything is deadly serious and matters. That's why people walk around through life, they're really frightened throughout their life, what's going to happen next, it's all, it's the world of form is threatening to them, and the world is perceived as hostile basically, and that's the reason is, and they're trying to rearrange the world so that it's no longer hostile, but it doesn't work.

No matter how you rearrange things, it's still, you feel it as hostile, and so, and then the realization comes, well it doesn't work that way, you have to first find the peace that is an essential part of who you are beyond form, that's always there, not dependent on time, and then from there, you can deal with the things of the world, give the world of form its due, even participate, but it is no longer that nightmarish thing that it was before, when you were trying to get something out of the world, to find fulfillment or whatever, and so that is perhaps what Causing Miracles means, and what you just mentioned, where as you begin to wake up, it turns into a pleasant dream, it's still the world of form, but it's as you're rooted in being, first of all, you no longer create suffering for yourself, because usually your mind is the thing that creates suffering for you, and you don't create suffering for others, that's an enormous contribution, it's a contribution of not adding to the suffering of the world, enormous thing, so that's the first thing that happens, and then, that's how the world changes, but it becomes a more benign dream.

[Speaker 2] (2:50:07 - 2:52:59)

In A Course in Miracles, when it's talking about the world of form, it says about the world and the illusion form, it's not that it's bad, it's that it's nothing, and that it's holiness or unholiness has to do with the purposes the mind ascribes to it, so when we, I love in the Course when he says, let me use your hands, let me use your feet, when we look at the realm of form with a kind of divine attachment, we are not less invested in what occurs here, we are invested in love, I love that line, be fully invested in an effort, but not attached to the result, and I think that this is a very important issue, because if we get this wrong, it makes the spiritual seeker ineffective in ways that perhaps we do not wish to be, look at something like you're here in Canada, you can turn on television, Canada humanitarian aid workers, your servicemen and women are all over the world, um, doing profound work, risking their lives, that's significant, you don't want to not let that in, you want to let that in deeply, because once again, it is a realm of form and a realm of profound power, anytime our spiritual, to me, anytime our spiritual inquiry in any way ignores the suffering of human beings, it does not include that as a factor, the unnecessary suffering of human beings, then perhaps there's a little insidious ego influence that we want to look at there, yes, I mean, from A Course in Miracles, this perspective, this entire room is filled with illusion, the fact that your body is separate from your body is all an illusion, but that doesn't mean this room is not filled with profound reality, which is the love inside us, so for me, in the realm of form, yes, it's all nothing, but when I got a call, would you like to go be with Eckhart Tolle and do this, and what seems to me the obvious blessing, a personal conversation with you as well, it's not like nothing real was going on here, it's something profoundly real, using the realm of form as a teaching device, so that's how I've...

Yes, yes, yes, it's beautiful.

[Speaker 1] (2:53:08 - 2:54:03)

The importance of the present moment, I was telling you earlier, many years ago, I copied from A Course in Miracles all the sayings about the importance of being present, and it says, for example, the closest, the present moment, or the holy instant, as it's called, is the closest approximation to eternity that this world offers, so the eternity, of course, is the timeless dimension, not everlasting time. The Course in Miracles is full of the importance of what I call presence, of the importance of salvation is offered to you in this instant.

It says it has taken time to misguide you so completely, but it takes no time at all to be who you are.

[Speaker 2] (2:54:03 - 2:54:08)

And the only place where eternity intersects with linear time is in the present moment.

[Speaker 1] (2:54:08 - 2:54:10)

Yes, yes, yes.

[Speaker 2] (2:54:11 - 2:54:13)

You've led the world to a profound understanding.

[Speaker 1] (2:54:15 - 2:54:19)

That's the vertical dimension of depth, yeah.

[Speaker 2] (2:54:19 - 2:54:58)

You know, in both the Christian cross and in the Jewish Star of David, the visual symbol is that of the intersecting dimensions of the vertical and the horizontal, and the way The Course in Miracles talks about Jesus, it says, he lived on the earth, but thought only the thoughts of heaven, which takes us back to that, how do you dwell within the realm of form, with your feet planted firmly here, but you're thinking so above this realm that the two intersect divinely and harmoniously and beautifully. Yes.

So you've come since the talk that I listened to in 86, or whenever the talk that you gave, and then after that for a few years, I didn't hear anything more about, except that I went to a talk you gave, because I loved that recorded talk so much. The following year, you came to London, you gave a talk at the Mind-Body-Spirit Festival, and I went there and enjoyed that very much.

[Speaker 2] (2:55:33 - 2:55:34)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:55:34 - 2:55:35)

You didn't see me, but I saw you.

[Speaker 2] (2:55:36 - 2:55:37)

Although, maybe I did.

[Speaker 1] (2:55:40 - 2:56:16)

Yeah. And then, I didn't hear from Marianne Williamson for a few years, and I don't know how many years passed, and I had moved from London to Somerset in England, and one Sunday, in the Sunday paper, the front headline mentioned Marianne Williamson in big letters. I said, what is this?

What's she done? Do you remember that, when suddenly you got out into the world? I think it has something to do with Elizabeth Taylor.

[Speaker 2] (2:56:17 - 2:56:19)

Oh, I thought you were going to say my first book.

[Speaker 1] (2:56:19 - 2:56:26)

No, that wouldn't be in the front page of the News of the World.

[Speaker 2] (2:56:27 - 2:56:29)

I remember in the London Times, in my picture.

[Speaker 1] (2:56:30 - 2:56:48)

Suddenly, and then the book came out soon after that, and that first book was Return to Love. Wonderful book. I'm sure many of you have read it, and millions of people, I'm sure, have been helped and are continuing to be helped by it.

[Speaker 9] (2:56:49 - 2:56:49)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:56:50 - 2:56:59)

And then, of course, many more books came after that, and the most recent book, which I haven't read yet, I was very surprised.

[Speaker 2] (2:56:59 - 2:57:02)

You shouldn't read it, because it might have an effect on you that one wouldn't wish for it to have.

[Speaker 1] (2:57:03 - 2:57:27)

It's about weight loss. That's right. So, it's a book about the spiritual aspects of weight loss.

[Speaker 2] (2:57:27 - 2:59:58)

And it, of course, is an extension of the conversation we've been having that the epidemic, I don't know how much Canada is experiencing, but certainly south of here in the United States, we have a very serious problem here. And, of course, that stems from exactly, you know, as the Course in Miracles says, you think you have many different problems, but you really only have one, and that is your separation from God. So, the answer is that the answer with a capital A, no matter what the form of is.

But this idea that when we identify too much with the body, our dense thinking about the body actually is an erroneous perception of the body, which produces dis-ease and dysfunction related to the body. And it is when we see the body as merely a container for light, having been thus reminded in consciousness, it returns the cells themselves to their native intelligence. So, there are cells in our body that know how to keep the lungs breathing and the heart beating, and that same perfection, because we are a perfect idea in the mind of God, that perfect imprint is expressed in every aspect of ourselves.

But for people who are dealing with a serious compulsion or even addiction in regards to physical weight, it's like a breaker switch has gone off. And we are, as the Course in Miracles would say, temporarily inaccessible to the power of the atonement in this one area where the perfect appetites are no longer operative. The cells of the nervous system, the cells in the brain, have literally been knocked out of their native knowing.

And so, knowing that everything that you talk about is the answer, no matter what the problem, achieving that pure state of consciousness that you speak of, literally takes pressure off the body and gives the body an opportunity to heal. The Course in Miracles says the body heals when we're not looking at it. And that all disease or dysfunction of the body arises from over-identification with the body.

So, this book, of course, in Weight Loss and Spiritual Lessons in Surrendering Weight, is taking this spiritual inquiry and applying it specifically to the issue of problems with one's body and weight.

[Speaker 1] (2:59:59 - 3:00:04)

And that could, of course, apply to other forms of addiction also.

[Speaker 2] (3:00:04 - 3:02:04)

Absolutely correct. It just seems to me that when it comes to drugs and alcohol, it is part of the mainstream conversation, whether someone has gone to a 12-step meeting or not, it is part of a mainstream understanding that it is a spiritual disease that needs a spiritual solution. I mean, that's kind of in part of the cultural jargon about the 12-step.

And even though Overeaters Anonymous exists and is a fine program, it doesn't seem to me that the issue of the spiritual problem and the spiritual answer has quite saturated the popular conversation about weight yet. It tends to be more on the level of effect diets and exercise. And they could be great diets that absolutely work, and great exercise programs that absolutely work.

The deeper problem is our inability to stay on the diet, or sometimes so painfully for people, the diet did work, the exercise did work, but within a certain amount of time, the subconscious force of the addiction or compulsion just comes right back. So, there's only one truth spoken many different ways, and I don't think any of this is so much something that we don't already know by now. You know, that path towards the 51%, and you're a large part of this.

You know, the Course in Miracles says, enlightenment begins as an abstract intellectual construct, and it makes its journey without distance. So, I believe enough of us actually, for a tipping point, get it intellectually. You know, we've all read the same books by now.

We've all listened to the same tapes. So, in a way, and you're a perfect example of this, someone didn't come here today so much to hear something they didn't already know. People are here to access more deeply those things which by now we do already know.

[Speaker 1] (3:02:05 - 3:02:05)

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (3:02:06 - 3:02:09)

And the era of data collection is over, I think.

[Speaker 1] (3:02:10 - 3:02:11)

That's a good saying.

[Speaker 2] (3:02:11 - 3:02:27)

I have to remember to quote you. And I think you are one of the few on the planet, I'm not saying this to pander, one gets more than information, one gets a transmission listening to you, and it's truly an honor to be in your presence and to learn from you. Thank you.

[Speaker 9] (3:02:27 - 3:02:28)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (3:02:34 - 3:04:04)

I'd just like to ask one question, your view on, because I'm often asked that question, and I'll tell you my general perception. It's, I know you were very much supported President Obama during the elections, and often people ask me, how do you feel now about President Obama? And I still have to say the underlying state of consciousness that he represents is so vastly more awakened than what preceded him and what surrounds him.

That still applies. I still have a feeling that there's an underlying state of consciousness that is more evolved than what we've seen before and what is around him. On the level of form, which does not mean that he is free of mistakes, and I, from the beginning I thought, why cannot he see that Afghanistan is not going to work, but I hope I'm wrong.

How do you see it now after a couple of years, him in relation to the country as a whole and the world as a whole? What is his function? Is he being dragged down, or is he still able to, in your view, to remain conscious while dealing with all these unconscious forces?

[Speaker 2] (3:04:07 - 3:05:38)

I don't want to have a codependent relationship with Barack Obama. I don't want to always be basing my views on what his potential is. He's responsible for his actions.

I passionately supported the president, and the way his administration has unfolded, I have come to believe that you simply cannot put new wine in old bottles. And in the United States, the Democratic and Republican Party have a lock on the narrative. Mm-hmm.

And within that conversation, I have begun to doubt whether or not the kind of profound transformational shifts that we were led to believe the president believed in during the campaign can occur. Mm-hmm. I'm disappointed.

And as a woman, I think that's part of what we learn in relationships. At a certain point, what you do is what matters, not what you say or what I think in your heart you really believe. He's an adult.

[Speaker 1] (3:05:39 - 3:05:48)

Yes. Of course, your expression was the Democrats and the Republicans have something about the narrative.

[Speaker 2] (3:05:48 - 3:08:50)

There's a lock on the narrative. And that goes back to what you and I were saying earlier about the state of humanity, the state of everywhere. And this is not just in the United States.

This is really Western civilization and actually global civilization to some extent. You see it everywhere, this new conversation bubbling up. You see it in education, you see it in the arts, you see it in politics, you see it in spirituality.

In politics, it's an old conversation. It doesn't allow for the bubbling up of this spiritual renaissance that is trying to occur. And it's too powerful a segment of our collective expression of power to be ignored.

And therefore, and yet for me as an American looking at this last election where, well, not this very last one, but before where the Democrats got the House, the Senate, the White House. See, I'm of a generation that still remembers a great moral force at the center of the Democratic Party in the United States. I remember Bobby Kennedy and I remember Martin Luther King.

And the way I see it, we're now living at a time where one major political party in the United States sees the desperate amount of human suffering on the planet. And they say, well, it's really sad, but it's not government's job to fix it. And if the private sector does something about it, that's great.

The other major political party, which I grew up believing saw addressing that suffering, the suffering of the oppressed, the injustice that so many people endure as the core of its reason for being there, now has become, at least in its current behavioral patterns, a party that looks at all that suffering, does what it can to ameliorate it on the periphery, but if we are honest with ourselves, is not fundamentally addressing the underlying causes that make all that suffering inevitable.

And I don't know how the Canadian system works, but in the United States, our first president, George Washington, warned us about political parties. There's nothing in the Constitution. So in the United States, third-party involvement has been extremely important.

Abolition came from the abolitionist party. Women's suffrage came from the suffrage party. Social security came from the socialist party.

So it is, as they say in AA, it is about principle, not personality. I don't care how cool that personality is. Something is rotten and it's not being fixed.

And I'm a mother and I'm too concerned about our planet and my country and all of our great-grandchildren to be willing to act patient when patience is perhaps not the virtue that it might appear to be.

[Speaker 1] (3:08:50 - 3:09:20)

Yes, so there is a rising new consciousness, but some structures that have been around for a long time, egoically created by the collective ego, some structures cannot perhaps be reached sufficiently by the rising new consciousness for them to change, to become instruments for change. And that might also apply to many economic structures, banking and so on.

[Speaker 2] (3:09:20 - 3:09:30)

Absolutely. And that is the question where we are right now. And for myself personally, I'm new wine.

Yes, you can't be put in those old bottles.

[Speaker 1] (3:09:31 - 3:09:32)

Yes, that's right.

[Speaker 2] (3:09:32 - 3:09:35)

And that's how form was never meant to be permanent.

[Speaker 1] (3:09:35 - 3:10:08)

Oh, no. And especially at this time, as there's an enormous power behind the arising of the new consciousness. And already we saw how the monolithic structure of Soviet communism collapsed because it was so rigid, nothing new could reach it.

And so what then is really, we are destined to see is the eventual collapse of those structures in this transformational period on the planet, that those structures that cannot be reached, they will, they cannot survive.

[Speaker 2] (3:10:09 - 3:10:46)

And then it takes us back to the concern about human suffering. You're right, they'll fall. But do they fall through tender care and careful midwifing?

Or do they fall chaotically and with harm that might not have been there had the new not been midwifed more consciously? That seems to me to be the right conversation. And then every individual has to ask for themselves, what part do I play both conceptually and in terms of our behavior?

[Speaker 1] (3:10:46 - 3:11:37)

Yes. And just coming just a little bit, your own evolutionary journey as you, The Course in Miracles was a decisive transformation for you when you discovered that. So that was the beginning of your, for most people, awakening is a process, the awakening process, I call it.

And so this has been going on for you for since you discovered The Course in Miracles, whenever it was 30 years ago. And how do you feel in your present evolutionary process here? Peace is arising more and more in your life?

[Speaker 2] (3:11:38 - 3:11:49)

I had this question that was like a boulder in the road for me. And I think you answered it for me today.

[Speaker 1] (3:11:49 - 3:11:50)

Yeah.

[Speaker 2] (3:11:50 - 3:11:53)

So I'm feeling quite grateful.

[Speaker 1] (3:11:53 - 3:11:53)

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (3:11:54 - 3:11:57)

Thank you. Good. Good.

[Speaker 1] (3:11:59 - 3:12:09)

Thank you. Marianne has a weekly class if anybody's in LA. Where?

[Speaker 2] (3:12:10 - 3:12:21)

At a place called the Regent Theater right now that might be moving at some point. So if someone looks at my website, www.marianne.com, the information is there.

[Speaker 1] (3:12:22 - 3:12:28)

Yeah. Weekly class and you discuss, you talk about a lesson in The Course in Miracles, usually how to apply it.

[Speaker 2] (3:12:28 - 3:12:36)

Or some situation in life with the perspective. Like you, Eckhart, I try my best to listen and whatever. Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (3:12:36 - 3:12:41)

And I am going to read your book anyway, The Weight Loss Book.

[Speaker 2] (3:12:41 - 3:12:46)

Thank you. Just don't do the lessons, okay?

[Speaker 1] (3:12:48 - 3:12:50)

Maybe you shouldn't do it either.

[Speaker 2] (3:12:50 - 3:12:52)

Well, I did them. That was kind of the point.

[Speaker 1] (3:12:57 - 3:13:04)

Marianne doesn't seem to have aged because I remember seeing photos of her from 20 years ago and she looked exactly the same then as she does now.

[Speaker 2] (3:13:04 - 3:13:05)

Well, my clothes are on.

[Speaker 1] (3:13:13 - 3:13:55)

Well, it's been just wonderful to sit with you and you've brought The Course in Miracles perhaps to so many people who otherwise would not have been open to it. And I think, I'm sure for many others, they took it from you rather than going to The Course because you've kind of, in some ways you have translated The Course in Miracles to make it more accessible to people.

[Speaker 2] (3:13:56 - 3:14:15)

I'm like the Russian literature professor. I'm not Dostoevsky. So I think, I always look at my book, A Return to Love, I see it as like the cliff notes of A Course in Miracles.

But obviously, you don't just attend the Russian lit class, you read the Russian novel.

[Speaker 1] (3:14:15 - 3:15:13)

I used for about two or three years, I used The Course in Miracles as a teaching device also in small seminars and workshops. So I still love it and picked it up again last night because I knew we were going to meet here today. And it's just, it's always fresh and new and every line is inspiring.

It's not for everybody, as you know, and as The Course in Miracles itself says. No, it's only one version of the universal curriculum, which is, as in the words of The Course in Miracles, the universal curriculum is the evolutionary path for all human beings, which is the same. And there are different versions of it and The Course in Miracles is one.

So if it's for you, you will know it probably when you pick it up and start reading it. And if it's not, that's fine.

[Speaker 2] (3:15:13 - 3:15:28)

I think it's so beautiful. One of the ways you can tell something is true, with a capital T, is if it dovetails with everything else you know is true. That's what's so beautiful about the multifaceted nature of the universal curriculum.

[Speaker 1] (3:15:28 - 3:17:20)

Yes, it's a wonderful thing being able to recognize the truth, the essential truth, no matter in what form it appears. I couldn't do that until this inner transformation occurred in me. Before that, I could only see the differences in the different teachings.

They looked so different. There's the Christian teaching and there's the Buddhist and Hindu and then other Course in Miracles. I wasn't able to see that they're all one.

And after the awakening that I experienced, I still remember picking up an old copy of the New Testament at my mother's place. I was visiting my mother and there was an old copy, New Testament, which the Jehovah's Witnesses had given her, although she didn't want it. But it was there waiting for me.

And so I picked it up and I suddenly saw the deeper truth that's in the, although some of it has come down to us in a distorted way, but even beyond, I could still see the power behind the teaching and the deeper truth to which it pointed. And then a little later, I saw the Bhagavad Gita and the same, this all points to the same fundamental truth that's there. And then there's an inner recognition that says, yes.

And of course, whatever it says, you know it already, although you might not have been able to formulate it, but then you see it reflected. The same listening to a teacher who teaches from that deep place of realization. Immediately, I still love listening to other spiritual teachers when it's teaching that truly comes from that deep place because it's such joy to listen to it in somewhat different form, the same truth.

[Speaker 2] (3:17:20 - 3:18:01)

Universal spiritual themes is the I was giving a talk in New York City with Robert Thurman, Professor Thurman, who is really the foremost North American Tibetan Buddhist, right? And so he was, it was on Buddha and Christ from the Course in Miracles perspective. And so he was going to talk about Buddha and then I was going to talk about Christ as in the context of A Course in Miracles.

So he spoke and then they said, okay, Marianne, tell us now about Christ. I said, everything he just said. It's been called a Christian Vedanta, actually, by the man who scribed it.

Yes. Bill Thetford said that of A Course in Miracles.

[Speaker 1] (3:18:02 - 3:18:05)

Christian Vedanta. Oh, that's interesting. Yes.

[Speaker 2] (3:18:05 - 3:18:08)

And here's the Jew. So, you know, it's all one.

[Speaker 1] (3:18:09 - 3:18:19)

Yes. And other forms of Christian teachings that not the conventional Christian teachings. Do you have you, do you know Joel Goldsmith?

[Speaker 2] (3:18:19 - 3:18:50)

Of course, Joel Goldsmith. And I think a lot of what Elaine Pagels wrote about in about the Nag Hammadi manuscripts and the Gnostic Gospels, there's more and more of an understanding that A Course in Miracles belongs in a broader category of the Gnostic mystical Christian tradition, which it's kind of interesting because you look at A Course in Miracles and then you look at a lot of traditional Christian interpretation and you see 80 percent's the same.

And then, boy, where it deviates 20 percent is huge.

[Speaker 1] (3:18:50 - 3:19:32)

Yes. Yes. Joel Goldsmith, to me, is the really a Christian version of what in India is called Advaita, which means non-duality teaching because he uses Christian terminology, but it all points to the absolute non-duality of life.

And Advaita teachings have become very popular in the West in the last few years. There's only one, there's only God and it's the oneness of all life. And to some extent, the A Course in Miracles is also pointing continuously to oneness.

[Speaker 2] (3:19:33 - 3:19:47)

Oh, absolutely. Sure, because nothing else exists. Yes.

If you're, God is all and what is all-encompassing can have no opposite. So when you're thinking without love, which is God, you're actually not thinking, you're hallucinating. Yes.

Which, once again, is like Buddhism. It's all Maya, it's all illusion. Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:19:48 - 3:20:31)

The one obstacle that is common for people is that I've seen it with people who are drawn to Advaita teachings, the Indian non-duality. They begin to believe, they believe that the belief in non-duality is the realization of non-duality. And then they stop there.

And so there are people who teach Advaita, they have become maybe even quite well-known teachers, and they teach from intellectual level. They have mastered the terminology of non-duality and they can answer any questions by applying the terminology of non-duality. And it sounds quite convincing.

[Speaker 2] (3:20:31 - 3:20:34)

But it hasn't trickled down from their head.

[Speaker 1] (3:20:34 - 3:20:34)

Yes, that's right.

[Speaker 2] (3:20:34 - 3:20:36)

They're still triggered when their mother calls.

[Speaker 1] (3:20:36 - 3:21:04)

That's exactly it. Exactly. And so, very good.

And so a good criterion you can have is after you've listened to it, it doesn't feel good in here. Something in here tells you that's not it. You can feel it here.

There are some Advaita teachers who have realized, and then it's true teaching. But if it's only an intellectual realization, basically it's a fallacy.

[Speaker 2] (3:21:05 - 3:21:18)

You passed the test. Thank you so much.

[Speaker 1] (3:21:19 - 3:21:27)

Thank you, Marianne. Maybe just a little moment of stillness.

[Speaker 5] (3:21:27 - 3:24:37)

I understand there's probably only one answer to this question, like so many that will be asked. How can a movement that is so inwardly focused demonstrate political power in the same way that some corporate interests and evangelical interests have done so, I think much to the detriment of our political process?

[Speaker 1] (3:24:37 - 3:24:41)

I didn't quite understand. Can you just repeat again?

[Speaker 5] (3:24:41 - 3:24:54)

How can an inwardly focused movement demonstrate political power to beneficial effect instead of the detriment of our nations?

[Speaker 1] (3:24:54 - 3:24:57)

Thank you. This is a question for Marianne.

[Speaker 2] (3:25:01 - 3:28:49)

How did the Indians get the British to leave? What was Gandhi's movement of nonviolence if not an inwardly focused movement? Martin Luther King went to India.

He studied the principles of nonviolence, and he brought those principles back for application in the civil rights movement, struggle for civil rights in the United States during the 1960s. Please forgive me for some level of ignorance about Canada's history, but most of our countries have had pretty much the same trajectories of places where there were levels of injustice that moved to justice. If you looked at the abolitionist movement in the United States, all the power, when you were just talking about the corporate power, the abolitionists didn't even have cell phones.

They had no computers. They had no way of connecting. The economic power behind slavery, the institution of slavery in the United States, in the southern states of the United States at that time, was the equivalent of corporate power today.

But they had a better idea. They had what was ultimately a more life-sustaining idea. That's the power of that line that Martin Luther King used to quote, that the moral arc of the universe is long, but it bends towards justice.

Because ultimately, if you stand on something which is life-sustaining, freedom and liberty and fairness for life and all its forms, then you have what Martin Luther King called cosmic companionship. This is what is the symbol of the Christ child in front of the three kings. They bowed to him.

When you are in the presence, ultimately, no amount of money, no amount of corporate power, no amount of governmental power, none of those external powers, which are false anyway, will ultimately stand for all the reasons we were talking about earlier. They are powers of an illusionary world. And when we recognize, as Martin Luther King said, there is a power in us more powerful than the presence of bullets, in the presence that Eckhart so eloquently describes, as there is a collective field of presence, which is what the Indian non-violent movement was.

It was a collective field of presence led by Gandhi. A collective field of presence led by Martin Luther King in the United States. Then ultimately, all powers of form will fall in the presence of light.

The Course in Miracles defines light as understanding, and in the presence of light, darkness cannot be. And also, the Course in Miracles says faith. There is no such thing as a faithless person.

Faith is an aspect of consciousness. But we tend to have more faith in the power of the disaster than we have faith in the power of presence. We have too much faith in corporate power.

We need to have more faith in the power of presence, the power of love, which is not saying that all corporate power is bad, by the way, but corporate dominance. So I think sometimes political activists today are disturbed by an ignorance of history. Because if you want to see political miracles, we've already had them.

From suffrage to the abolition of slavery, to many examples. It's not like, well, it's never happened. Thank you.

[Speaker 10] (3:28:49 - 3:28:50)

Thank you.

[Speaker 8] (3:29:08 - 3:29:47)

I have a question about ignorance. I find myself to become quite ignorant. I have compassion and love and come from that place, but I don't seem to respond to what's happening around me so much because I understand it's an illusion.

And every time I see it, I just feel it is an illusion and it's okay for what it is. But now listening to you, I'm thinking maybe I should go back and be more active and participate. I used to be that way, but now I'm more like, it is what it is.

[Speaker 1] (3:29:50 - 3:35:11)

Well, I'll say a few words and then... Well, in any situation, prior to any action, the main factor is your state of consciousness. And any action you take arises out of a state of consciousness.

If you see something that maybe suffering is being inflicted on another human being, it would be a misunderstanding of what spirituality is to say, well, this is just another illusion. So on the other hand, if you take whatever you see out in the world to be an absolute reality and nothing else, then you get lost in trying to solve the problems of the world on the level of effect. So that is the danger of people who are activists or try to help and do things.

There is a place for this one dimension that is the level of effect where you can take action and do things. But at the same time, you need to be aware of the level of cause where the causal level of human suffering and unconsciousness and the causal level of human suffering is in state of consciousness and it starts with your own. Are you connected to the deeper level of who you are?

That's what we always address here. Are you connected with that? Or if you are connected with that, then what your mind calls illusion, then you truly know that this is not ultimate reality and yet it has a relative reality.

And you can take action and at the same time be connected with a deep inherent peace, an energy field of peace. The action that you then take, spontaneous action, is imbued with that peace. And if you don't know who you are, then you're trying to solve the problems of the world exclusively on the level of form and they cannot be solved on the level of form.

The level of form is an addition, an added thing that comes. Your state of consciousness is the primary factor in any action you take. Now, one needs to be careful with teachings that say it's all illusion, not that it is not true, but like Advaita teachings or Course in Miracle teachings, all illusion.

On what level do you know that? Is that just a belief in your mind that tells you, oh, it's all illusion? You don't really know that.

It's actually not true as far as you are concerned. As Marianne said, you still get, when you visit your mother-in-law or whatever, you still get triggered by whoever your mother or your mother-in-law or whoever it is. And to say then, well, it's all illusion, well, you don't actually, you don't seem to know that your mother-in-law is illusion because you react as if she were absolutely real.

So they don't really know it. Whether you know that, truly know that it's illusion is determined by your state of consciousness. So when the deep peace is lacking, then you don't really know it in the depths of your being.

You only know it intellectually. And if you only know intellectually that it's all illusion, that's not the truth. You're fooling yourself that it needs to be a living truth inside you.

Then it becomes true for you. So really it's only spiritual teachers who have reached that place, they say it, and they are absolutely right when they say it. And then somebody repeats it who just hears those words and then thinks that's the solution to the world.

It's not. It's a lie when you just repeat it for as far as you are concerned, because you haven't gone to that place where you truly know it. So that is your primary responsibility is going to that place where you know at the deepest level.

And then you can be of benefit in this world because then any action you take is connected to a deeper level. And there's more than just the action you take. There's an entire energy field behind it that is that that changes the world.

And so the difference then between head knowledge and lived living knowledge.

[Speaker 2] (3:35:13 - 3:38:30)

There are monasteries, both Western and Eastern, both in the Eastern religions as well as Western orientations, where people just live in silence, monks in silence. They are probably doing as much to keep this world from blowing up in a nuclear catastrophe as is anyone. So what someone is, quote unquote, doing is on the outside does not even say, because just as Eckhart was just saying, if someone is acting in the realm of form, but they're bringing the old consciousness, they're actually recreating the old no matter what they're doing.

And similarly, people who are, quote unquote, doing nothing, but they're praying all day for all living things are doing plenty. When books like The Course in Miracles say the world is an illusion or I need do nothing as Eckhart was just saying, this is extremely important. When you hear these lines out of context, that is a profound misunderstanding of A Course in Miracles or any serious spiritual teaching to think that the conversation stops there.

Because The Course in Miracles says we are to do whatever we are sent out to do. Now, I would never presume to know you might be in a phase where a doing of nothingness was necessary for a part of your own purification of consciousness. And just as true as that might be that you were meant to be here today to hear talk about a quickening.

If you're only acting on the world of form and not addressing causal issues, then you are only creating more of a problem. But if, just as Eckhart already said all this, if you're only dealing on the realm of cause, you're not like those monks praying for the world. You're just using it's all an illusion anyway, so I don't have to do anything as an excuse.

You're also perpetuating the problem. So it's both and. I want to tell you one quote from Martin Luther King Jr. He said, you have very little morally persuasive power with people who can feel your underlying contempt. So that's the spiritual activist's creed. Dear God, I want to yell and scream at this person on television. I can't stand them.

And you come to understand that your own self-righteousness, your own spiritual superiority, your own sense that you know and they don't know is the problem. So first you pray, please help me get rid of my own craziness. The Course in Miracles says the primary work of the miracle worker is to accept the atonement for himself.

Dear God, I really believe I'm better than they are, smarter than they are. And if only they were gone, the country would be fine. Dear God, heal me.

Right? But then the issue is when you're flat on that, you won't feel moved to just sit there. You will, when and to the extent to which it is your assignment, do that which you are called to do if you are called to do it.

But just as Eckhart was saying, you will do it from a different place. So the answer is both and, isn't it?

[Speaker 8] (3:38:31 - 3:39:17)

Everything seems to be always is one thing yet is another. It seems that actually it's really funny because you say something but the opposite is truth as well. So it kind of contradicts everything in life, contradicts itself.

Give us an example. Yes, I can be out there active and fight and that would be great and it will be beneficial for the energy of this planet and mine. Yet, if I don't and just sit in peace and love and just be still, it's the same.

No, if you go out there and you fight, you will only be temporarily managing an effect.

[Speaker 2] (3:39:17 - 3:40:37)

It will only be an allopathic suppression of the symptoms. The issue is how much time did you spend in the presence that morning? Did you meditate and prepare inwardly before you went?

And then if you went, you might have gone to the rally but you wouldn't be coming to fight. You would be coming to be the presence in the midst of this chaos. You would come in a whole different way and that is what the world needs now.

These are illusions but there's a part in the Course in Miracles where it talks about how you could take a spiritual teaching, you could take the power of now. It's a book, it's a form, it's an illusion but it's an illusion that leads beyond illusion. So the Course in Miracles talks about the highest level of thinking of which the ego is capable.

It's still the ego's world, we're bodies, we're talking but it's the highest level of thinking of ego which ultimately will lead us. So I think it's both and. You pray, you meditate, then you show up if you feel moved to show up but you will show up emanating something much more profound and causal than just, well man, I'm angry.

Which means you're just part of the problem. You're as much a hawk as they are.

Or take an example, let's say very often whenever humans come together in institutions and companies they sit, the enormous amount of conflict that's generated, let's say there's a committee meeting, there's conflict, I mean not only where you might expect conflict in the big financial institutions, there's the same amount of conflict when egos come together in hospital administrations, churches, church administration and so on. So let's say you are there at a committee meeting where everybody is energized egoically and in other words it's quite insane and your job is to embody, before you even think of what you are going to say or what you want prior to all that, your job is to embody a different state of consciousness as you sit there.

That comes first. It doesn't, what you want to happen or your point of view is you can forget for the time being. First is what is my state of consciousness?

Are you there as another agitated and egoic presence and saying things should be done the spiritual way? I totally disagree with everybody. Or do you embody the presence and then you sit there and you begin to listen to all the people discussing things without saying oh you're all so ignorant.

You should be, without the judgments of the mind, you simply watch and you're there as a still alert presence and you watch and then you may find at some point words may come out of your mouth and you say something. It will be totally different energy from the energy that these people are putting out but it's not that you are saying now I'm going to show you the right energy. No it doesn't.

It comes out of presence. Words that come out of presence are not, they don't generate more confrontation and human unconsciousness and it may well be that suddenly people listen but that's the result. You're not attached to the result and you cannot predict what will come out of your mouth.

Maybe nothing will come out of your mouth and you will just be there and perhaps the very fact that there's one human being who holds the presence might change what these people say or do in the room. It could happen. It doesn't matter but that your primary responsibility is embodying a different state of consciousness.

Whether action comes out of that, words come out of that is secondary. So that's that really is we've all had experiences of how dysfunctional these all these places are where egos come together. Where egos come together it cannot not be dysfunctional.

[Speaker 2] (3:43:53 - 3:45:32)

Now this is it you know the whole these inquiries are so endlessly fascinating because once you're on that level of pure consciousness or reality with a capital R you are in the realm where there is no time or space. So when you are in that meeting of the hospital administration in Vancouver and you go into pure consciousness which by the way cannot but affect the people in the room in ways that you will never know there could be a suicide bomber somewhere who says I'm not going to do it. Literally there could be a soldier somewhere who says I'm putting my gun down.

So once we're in that realm of pure consciousness we're in the one mind that's the esoteric meaning of the line there is only one begotten son means we're all it. So it is not just as you were saying which is well if where you find yourself is the hospital administration meeting that's your assignment today. But it's also that place where spirituality intersects spiritual practice intersecting global activism because you actually are affecting the entire globe and contributing to that 51 percent.

But also affecting you have no idea where this might be. We know that when the butterfly flaps its wings in this southern tip of the planet that it affects the wind currents at the North Pole. We know that this is the same on the level of consciousness.

So you are working on the world if you're working on yourself deeply.

[Speaker 1] (3:45:33 - 3:45:58)

Yes and you're very powerful in that sense you are very powerful the power the wonderful quote that you're what's the most famous quote from Marianne which is usually attributed to Nelson Mandela but it's actually by Marianne which is our deep it's from it's from a return to love of course it's of course content our deepest fear is not that we are inadequate our deepest fear is that we are powerful beyond measure it is our light not our darkness that most frightens us that yes of course and then I'm the only person I know doesn't have the rest of it memorized

it's lovely thank you now I believe that did you say Marianne needs to go soon yeah so let's thank her for being here a wonderful valuable incredible additional thank you

thank you thank you great honor great honor god bless you

now here we have another question another person who is dissatisfied for another reason I'm on a path of awakening but my deep loneliness at loneliness at not having a life partner is an obstacle to my spiritual development I get deeply depressed though I do my best to stay present in the now instead of dwelling on my longing what advice could you offer okay well I won't say internet dating um there is a part in every person the form you the the form identity of who you are and the level of form tends either towards the male or the female it might not necessarily be the physical the physical male may tend more to hit the other so it doesn't necessarily depend on your the physical form but you tend to pretend either to towards the male or the female and therefore you're not complete because you're only one half on the level of form which is the physical form or the just underneath that the the psychological or emotional form and so there is a natural longing for the other polarity the completeness in a human being and you can feel that as a sex is only part of that but it goes beyond sexual longing it's there's more to it than that there's also an emotional longing for the other and you can so they come they go together and there's that pull that you can feel as on the level of form and when that is not satisfied then that can lead to unhappiness particularly if you have not transcended at all your identification with form if you are still totally totally identified with you as this physical form and psychological form the transcendent dimension has not come into your life at all then you would become very dissatisfied and depending also to some extent what culture you live in there are traditional cultures still on our planet where it's almost whether you have to find a partner and if you're not everybody would look down on you as being a total and miserable failure in in some traditional cultures if you if you're not married at a certain by a certain age or you cannot give birth to children people look down on you and despise you and you're miserable for the rest of your life you have not fulfilled your form identity and and so and also in some traditional cultures the the sense of self is very strongly bound up with whether you're a man or a woman so more so than in the west it still persists to some extent in the west but much less so than in some traditional cultures where if you're a man in certain cultures you are this because 70 percent of who you feel you are your self-identity is the male you are the male and you look at every woman as a as a that's a female you can't relate to a human to a woman as a human being you are the male and she is a female and she of course not your equal and the woman is totally identified with being the female form and behaves according to that kind of collective conditioning so depending on where it is i won't act it out but here in the west it's a little easier to step out of those collective expectations it is more acceptable in the west to say my choice is not to get married and you can even say my choice is not to have children and people say okay so there's a bit more freedom there and yet the longing for the other on the form level is still there emotional sexual the essence is to be able to transcend who you are on the level of form whether or not you find a partner that meets that longing or whether you go from one partner to another and another or you find one life partner with whom you're for the rest of your life that is secondary really because even if you have a partner if you have not gone deeper and and encounter the transcendent dimension to who you are beyond the form identity of you as the male or the female or whatever the nationality or the particular status in society whatever makes up your form identity in addition to gender if you haven't gone beyond that then even the relationships yes you might have found your partner but you won't be satisfied in the relationship with in the absence of the transcendent dimension the spiritual dimension you may come to some kind of compromise and living together somehow managing to stay together but it you'll be actually you have a longing to get out so the people who are who are outside the relationships have a longing to get in or marriage and those who are in have a longing to get out so the young the young the young girl or man late teens early twenties they want to get into the cage and those who are in the cage want to get out of the cage it is quite possible to to notice the sense of if in in the absence of a partner it is quite possible to notice a certain sense of lack on the level of form and yet have a lot of spaciousness around that sense of lack yes i can feel that there is a longing but the longing does not consume you the longing has not taken possession of you and making you into an unhappy person a totally unfulfilled and bitter person perhaps no the longing is there but the longing that arises from your particular form of you exists within a spaciousness because that is the transcendent dimension and who you are is not the unfulfilled longing who you are is the presence or the stillness around it that is the shift so the longing may persist but you can live with it however if you are no longer trapped in the longing it's also quite possible that a change will come into your life particularly if the intense neediness goes i need somebody and then everybody you everybody you meet can feel the the neediness and you're when you when you've given somebody your phone number you've just met and then you're waiting for them to call and they they're less likely to call when the neediness is there they're more likely to call when a certain spaciousness is there i'd like i'd love you to call i'd love this person to call me but he may or she may or may not and there's a again a spaciousness around it so you of course you can take action towards meeting somebody i don't know the question whether the questioner has taken any action and actually gone to places perhaps where one meets people are not necessarily nightclubs we might not meet the most conscious people in bars but there are other places one can go to where you meet people and even the internet why not this is the way many people read that way but even there if you haven't gone beyond the then the absolute neediness of needing somebody then it's less likely to work out for you but if you have that sense of inner some inner spaciousness around the longing then the way in which you approach others changes without that absolute that pull so that's my suggestion then is see if you can on the outer level see how and where you could meet people and explore perhaps you will find somebody here or there why to realize that the transcendence is the most vital thing does not exclude the possibility of taking action on an outer level of course that is always secondary but why not and maybe you find a good website where you meet conscious is there such a thing conscious dating if there isn't maybe it's a business idea conscious dating of course the the difficulty is a person who thinks of themselves as conscious maybe deluded so find that place where the polarities actually don't are not there anymore in the being the I am-ness that's deeper than the form and go there as much as you can it may not totally free you of the longing but that's okay the longing will just become a thing that's no longer overwhelming and then if take action and see what happens

Hi Eckhart, I just want to thank your consciousness for your teachings Thank you very much. Did I say it right this time?

I strive to be a role model of presence for my two-year-old son Teddy but if I send him to preschool he may be influenced by unconscious teachers and other adults there who do not know about your teachings my instinct tells me to homeschool him until he can reach a certain level of consciousness if my son was your child what would you do and my second question is this millions of parents teachers grandparents parents educators are crying out for a roadmap for applying your teachings can you please create a lecture series and a book to help adults raise the consciousness of the next generation

thank you well the second question let's start with that first if that happens then that will happen I don't I don't start with an intention it's just when something wants to come through it comes right now I feel that the consciousness is increasingly moving through human beings and quite a few teachers too that that thing will be created through them through consciousness moving through people who are already in the educational establishment and they will have experienced with that they know what's wrong with it and they will consciousness will use them to bring about what you are talking about maybe it'll use this form too we'll see so that I'm sure will happen I already know individual teachers who are bringing in consciousness it's not not part of the official curriculum but they are doing it it's happening so if this is how change usually starts it's from the bottom up not by imposing a new system from the top but the change starts from the bottom and then seeps up and then reaches the top until finally it becomes part of the curriculum in a few years we would love that hopefully we'll see and then your child when the what at what age would you would your child right now so because of your teachings

[Speaker 7] (4:03:19 - 4:04:17)

I'm able to be very aware of how I act with him and I'm you know soaking up this time to give him formless attention being the presence letting him play in the dirt and not label it having him use his senses and just be with the dirt and not care about if he gets dirty or not it's because of your teachings that my parenting philosophy has drastically changed and I don't meet a lot of educators out there that I I feel that could kind of give him that you know presence for him while he's soaking up pain bodies here and there I kind of want to be that foundation and so the only solution I can come up with is that I should home school him until he gets a little bit older and he's able to practice you know certain he has a certain level of consciousness

so I don't know if you have any other case it's not too good to send them to school to at too early an age so you also have to there are some types of schools that are better than others if such a school is in your vicinity where you live they Rudolf Steiner schools or Montessori or these alternative schools and some of those schools are aware that a child at an early age should not yet be burdened with too much conceptual knowledge or mathematics also and keep the child in touch with sensory reality they encourage that so if you can find a school like that a kind of alternative school that may be acceptable and then you have to look at what other if those are not where you live see what the schools are like there eventually the child will have to interact with other children I wouldn't send a child to school at such an early age in any case or even teach writing too soon sometimes these days it's taught far too soon if the school is not it's not alternative but not too bad because there are huge differences in levels of consciousness in schools then you may have to send him to school and then compensate for what he learns there to some extent at home the home environment is still very very important for a child and to some extent can compensate for what happens at school school is much harder to compensate when the home environment is bad it's harder for the school to compensate for the bad home environment bad meaning unconscious than for home to compensate for relatively unconscious school environment so the home environment is more fundamental than the school but be careful and use your intuition and then you'll do the right thing you cannot protect your child too much from the unconsciousness of the world that this may be a temptation but sooner or later your child one way or another will come into contact with the unconsciousness if you prolong it for not extreme forms of unconsciousness but some forms of unconsciousness if you delay it for too long then it's like like keeping a plant in a in the hothouse for too long and then finally when you think okay well it's the plan is big enough to put outside now but it's never been outside and then it may struggle to survive outside the challenges of life and many of the challenges of life are challenges of unconsciousness in the world that we live in they are actually a vital part also of the awakening so many parents want to remove challenges to some extent it's a good thing to of course not to expose a child to damaging environments yes that's all good but you cannot remove all the challenges nor would that be a good thing so the child will grow in consciousness by encountering unconscious humans including unconscious children so of course you wouldn't want to send a child to a school where there's a lot of physical violence definitely not but milder forms of unconsciousness the child will come into contact with and at first it's yes it's a form of suffering but then he will grow in consciousness through that that generates more consciousness that's all right thank you so much thank you i'm bringing on the mick jagger bruce springsteen and bono all rolled into one this is the guy now when you see him you're going to go really but he is the rock star of the spiritual movement he is the rock star eckhart tolle is the person who embodies and is literally walking presence so when i first read eckhart tolle's book a new earth everybody of course had read the power of now and i read a new earth new earth life changing i would have to say central most important book i ever read i mean if you never read any if you only want to read one book in your life i would say a new earth is it his teaching and his definition and understanding of ego turned the concept inside out for me and for a lot of other people who followed us on um those a new earth lessons uh we actually broke the web back in 2008 when we first did those 10 lessons of uh of a new earth his writings allowed us to understand for the first time actually didn't you guys what ego was because we always thought it meant just being arrogant so he calls his uh session the awakening of consciousness that's it that's what we're here to do the awakening of consciousness from the rock star himself eckhart tolle

[Speaker 1] (4:10:46 - 8:45:16)

nice to be here and now as you can see this speaker must be really dynamic they had to bring out a chair for him a few days ago a question that oprah likes to ask came to mind uh i'm sure you've heard it then the question is what do you know for sure what do i know for sure she asked me that question a few years ago i don't remember what the answer was because it came out of the present moment but it's a very interesting question it can take you to a very deep level as it can be answered on many levels and what may be true on one level may not be true on a deeper level i prefer the word deeper to higher because higher kind of takes you out of yourself deeper takes you more deeply within so an example i could say what do you what do i know for sure i know for sure that i'm sitting on a chair that's the most surface level of things i know for sure that this is a table and of course on one level that is true if you take it to a deeper level if you really looked at these atomic and subatomic structure of this thing that i call chair and that i call table then you would realize maybe it's not a table on that level it's not a table it's atoms and molecules and 99 empty space in between so it's no longer a table it's true on this level but not on a deeper level and so you can go to many i can say what do i know i know for sure that my books have changed the lives of millions of people because people keep telling me that i assume that they are honest and that's true on one level but if you take it to a deeper level are they my books who am i where did these books come from am i the consciousness out of which these books came i what come what i what level of i so you can you can then deeper and deeper whether it's not me the person who wrote the books it's the consciousness that used this so-called person as an instrument and used the mind so you can go deeper and deeper and so as i was pondering this i finally arrived at the most the at the deepest answer that you cannot doubt what do i know for sure what do i know for sure and if you go to the deepest level because everything else can be questioned including whether us sitting here is actually absolutely real it seems to be but on the other hand tomorrow you might wake up and for a moment you might not know did i dream yesterday what happened that this wonderful spiritual gathering or did that actually happen or when you're desperate you remember many things and they suddenly your life seems to have a dream-like quality because things evaporate very quickly things arise situations and it's gone there are many dream-like qualities to a person's life and many philosophers has questioned they said is is life a dream on some level one could say that it is nobody can prove that this event here you sitting here listening to this man on the chair that you are not dreaming this you could be or the one consciousness is dreaming it this is possible nobody can prove otherwise so i cannot know for sure yet that that we are actually here you are so it means you have to go deeper what if i can't be sure that this is actually happening what can i be sure of it's maybe a dream and then suddenly you arrive at something they arrive at the realization that in order for a dream even if it is a dream or reality for anything to be there needs to be a consciousness in which it appears so even if it's a dream the dream must appear in a consciousness without consciousness there is nothing there needs to be a light of consciousness for a dream to be experienced so even if it's a dream there is still a you that's experiencing the dream now that you may not be the personality you with a name and a personal history a limited personal history and a limited personal future but there is a there is a presence there in which if it is a dream or reality in which this dream is is being perceived becomes appears in the light of what it appears in consciousness there is an awareness in which the dream appears if it is a dream and now that now we have reached the deepest level of the question what do i know for sure what i know for sure and i speak for everyone is that at this moment i am conscious otherwise there would be nothing i must be conscious i may be dreaming but i'm i'm the dream is i'm conscious so that is the substratum to use a geological term for everything one could use certain analogies you could say it is like the canvas on which paintings appear the difference between in this analogy is this canvas that is you the consciousness is in the background for it enables everything to be and to appear and to arise and to subside to form and to go back into formlessness and the pictures that appears on this canvas is your entire life experience whatever happens to you the changing pictures on the canvas of your awareness and so the only difference between the actual the artist's canvas and this canvas is the pictures change constantly they're not static the one thing that's constant about your life is changed everything is in flux as the ancient greek philosophers already found you cannot step into the same river twice everything is subject to change that was the philosopher heraclitus or heraclitus 2,500 years ago he said eris panta rei is the greek term everything flows everything is in flux that was his main teaching heraclitus is a pre-socratic philosopher he was he taught before famous socrates but then there was another pre-socratic philosopher parmenides who said the exact opposite he said change is an illusion nothing ever changes and they are both right parmenides refers to the canvas and heraclitus refers to what appears on the canvas what appears on the canvas is your life situation you're the continuously changing life situation but who is experiencing that life that is sometimes fine sometimes not so fine sometimes disaster sometimes elation continuous change continuous changes what do i know for sure i know for sure that i am at this moment conscious this this is a first-hand realization you don't need secondary evidence you cannot even have secondary evidence that you are conscious now that even that is perhaps not absolutely correct when we use those words because when i say i am conscious that still implies that there is a duality that there is an i who has a certain quality that's called conscious to it there's a duality when you say i'm conscious so let's change that and say i am consciousness that is the essence of who i am presence consciousness now most people don't know that they are so hypnotized by what appears on the canvas of their awareness that everything that appears on this canvas of their awareness draws their attention incompletely there's all the things that happen around you all the time they draw your you can see how they draw your attention out continuously and want you to identify with go into them especially nowadays with all the devices that we have early in the morning first goes the first text message thing and then and then your attention goes to the next thing let's need to check the emails now this is why and then your attention what you have to do now and so it's not and then not only external things draw your attention continuously even more so the mind the thought every thought that arises absorbs your attention and you identify with it it goes so most people are so drawn into that that them all that exists is all the stuff that appears on that to continue for a moment with that analogy all the stuff that appears on the screen of their awareness that hypnotizes them and so they are not aware of the essential background to their lives they are not aware of their essential beingness they are not aware of the essential I am I am is the most profound truth so what do I know for sure so the most profound and unquestionable answer is I am I know that for sure but don't add anything to it because that's temporary that's a temporary appearance on the screen of of the I am awareness now spiritual awakening or the awakening of consciousness because when you don't know that when you're hypnotized by everything that arises externally and internally in your mind well ultimately it's all internal because for anything for you to know anything it must arise within you so you need to be aware most people don't are not aware that that dimension exists in them so and that's a terrible one could almost say their life is deprived the most essential dimension is missing they don't they don't know the I am and the I am is an interesting thing that's used in different in different spiritual traditions God's definition of him her or itself is I am that I am Jesus is said or is supposed to have said nobody knows for sure of course because it went through so many people writing and translating I am the light of the world that's in the gospel of John and in another gospel he said you are the light of the world and both of course are correct so what is the light of what does he mean you are the light of the world that is his way if he had said you are consciousness people would have said what what but at least by using the light they have some analogy so perhaps they could get a little bit of a sense of what he was talking about now the important thing is as we sit here for you to come to this realization and many of you already are in touch with that dimension within themselves to actually realize at first hand what it means when you say I am and add nothing to it and then what follows the I am or you can use a little mantra that in especially the Indian sage Ramana Maharshi recommended highly he said sit down in meditation ask yourself the question who am I and so many people tried that and some succeeded and some didn't a little secret if you find an answer to who am I on a level of concepts then you didn't get it so on the level of concepts there is no answer to who am I the answer is wrong that's a bit of zen like thing they whatever answer you give is wrong because when you ask yourself who am I and do you need to enter a state of alertness almost as if you were listening this is just an analogy but the kind of alertness that you may you may be familiar with when you let's say you are in a room or outside someone you're trying to listen to a distant noise I gave an example of that in the new earth trying to listen to dissonance you need to be alert to so that you can hear it and that alertness is is a is is an aware presence without thinking it is just an an alert presence that goes who am I is meant to take you into that state of presence and that state of presence is the answer so there's no conceptual answer there's only the answer of experiencing yourself as pure presence and that is not difficult it's bit between two thoughts the gap between two thoughts is the I am presence you experience yourself as the canvas as the consciousness so here's one thought comes to an end the other one hasn't arisen yet and in between two thoughts for example now you have a moment of spaciousness and in that spaciousness you sit here and you just look around and you take everything in and you come to the amazing realization that you do not always need to conceptualize interpret or label everything that comes into your awareness you can just be there as a pure presence and then that is a another way of knowing things in our intellectualized mentally overstimulated civilization we believe that the only way of knowing things is to analyze and to conceptualize but that's only one way yes there is a place for it but if that's all you know let's take an example you go into a forest and you walk in the forest there's one way of perceiving the forest and that is looking interpreting what you see you know the name of that tree you know that bird or you ask why wonder what that's called on and so you label it you interpret it you might be very knowledgeable so you can explain to people what these things are how these plants grow how old that tree might be and so on and that's fine that's one way of knowing the forest but there's another way of knowing the forest and that is going through the forest with very little thought but just an alert presence and that is a very different way of experiencing the forest from the way of interpreting it so and in that way you would go and you notice your mind becomes very still and in that stillness you perceive everything but in addition to perceiving everything you are aware of a an underlying presence and that underlying presence is both yourself at the most essential level beyond the egoic personality that is short-lived anyway there is the yourself as the conscious presence but then you can also sense a presence the presence of the forest that science could never reveal to you that the analytical knowledge could never reveal to you you become aware of the sacredness of the forest and you connect with whatever you're perceiving at a deep level you feel a connectedness with the trees and the plants and the totality of the forest in a way that you could never have experienced if your only way of knowing the forest had been the conceptualizing mind so and it is not necessarily the case that you need to be in either one or the other it is possible for us to be in the in both dimensions so that we are not obsessively interpreting when but we can occasionally interpret and then go back into alert stillness being the awareness in which all this arises then you feel a connectedness with everything that before you could not feel when you it only related to to it through the conceptualizing mind because the conceptualizing mind brings up barriers between yourself and the other and the same thing applies to human beings when you meet a human being if you're not aware with a deeper dimension within yourself the essence dimension as i sometimes call it or your essence identity then you cannot be aware of the essence of another human being that you meet all you see then is the physical form that's often the first thing you see which either you find pleasing or not pleasing or it attracts you or it leaves you indifferent you like it or you don't like it and then as you start speaking to another person you interact on the mind level and the emotional level also and so you get the emotion mental emotional conditioning of that person and then you relate on that level to that person and immediately you interpret that person you have opinions about that person you have judgments about that person many people are very quick to judge the moment they meet somebody they've two minutes later they've formulated an opinion about you and i often find it difficult people sometimes ask me after i meet some what did you think of such of such and such a person that you met this morning and i go nothing because i now if you ask me now i can start thinking and i can probably come up with something and tell you something in a few minutes but so far i had not formulated any thought about that just come just communicated with that person and i had no thoughts about that person i enjoyed the interaction but i have no particular opinion so the what we call the ability of humans to have empathy to have empathy not only for other human beings but also to have empathy for nature to have that sense of uh benevolence towards other life forms benevolence another word for which is goodwill or we could even be daring and say love not in the conventional sense but true love which is a sense of connectedness with another in order to sense that and it is vital for you to be a true human being you're not even truly human i would agree with confucius who said that 2500 years ago you're not fully human if you do not manifest those qualities of benevolence goodwill compassion towards others so you're still not it doesn't mean you're evil it means you haven't arrived yet at being fully human humanity of course is a work in progress and some some are lagging behind a little bit more than others and that doesn't make them evil you just have to see oh they're a little bit behind but make sure the ego doesn't get hold of that thought so humans are evolving and the vital thing is for the world that we inhabit to change is a shift in consciousness so that humans can relate to other humans and the deeper level of essence and not the conceptualizing judgmental mind because that operates not only on the personal level it also operates on the collective level on the collective level where people have collective egos political egos religious egos dreadful things as we all know are happening there and they cannot sense anymore that which unites them with others they cannot feel the other anymore as a living being they cannot sense the shared consciousness that you share with every life form with every human being with everything that exists ultimately there's a beautiful saying an ancient saying which goes consciousness sleeps in the stone meaning the mineral of the stone even that has a glimmer of consciousness but it's sleep consciousness dreams in the plant consciousness awakens in the animal and consciousness awakens to itself in the human and so that that is the awakening of consciousness that is the call also be called spiritual awakening that is happening to a certain segment percentage of population on the planet still a minority but that's fine so the essence of this awakening is to realize now i'm this is not an absolute truth it's a temporary way of putting it there are two of you there is the form identity of you with a personal history and a personal future and you do your best there it's good you'd have to do your best you learn things you improve your skills you experience things you have you travel you get a good job as good as you can improve yourself as a person good but not enough then there is the other you one could say the other half that is the formless you the formless and timeless essence of who you are that you need to know that as your ultimate self otherwise if you only know the form you the form identity life becomes very frustrating you never really get any any lasting peace or joy in your life because everything changes so quickly but whatever you achieve you for a moment gives you pleasure or annoyance and then either it's taken away or it dissolves or it no no longer gives you pleasure because you've had it for too long it's so life becomes very frustrating if the deeper dimension is missing in your life and that is the formless knowing yourself as the essential i am and that is a sensing that is a the ability to just become still the ability to look at something or someone without imposing immediately conceptual thought on on it or him or her the ability to become still i said in my book the stillness stillness speaks a little meditative book you're never more essentially yourself than when you are still you're never more essentially yourself than we are when you are still because when you are still you you are you can sense yourself as the awareness as the consciousness and it has no qualities as such you you cannot make it into an object of knowledge and say ah there it is you can you but you can sense there is a presence that presence you don't need to remember your name you don't remember your personal history to know that to know yourself as presence it's it's available here and now it's just has always been available here and now but has always been overlooked jesus said the kingdom of heaven he talked continuously about the kingdom of heaven what does that mean completely misinterpreted for a long long time my interpretation of what he said called kingdom of heaven is i translate or paraphrase where kingdom no longer fits our world kingdom is dimension realm or dimension heaven heaven in english is a word that in most other languages is the same word as sky in french in spanish in german heaven and sky are the same word so this kingdom of the sky the dimension of what is the sky what is heaven when you look at the sky you see vast spaciousness so my translation of kingdom of heaven is the realm or dimension of spaciousness so jesus used that analogy to point people to an inner dimension of consciousness that is available to them here and now not in some future not some future point that i need to get to i need to get to the kingdom of heaven it's here and now he said that all the time but but still they made it into some future point and and he also said the kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be perceived you cannot say it's over here or it's over there but truly i tell you it is here within you what was he talking to talking about the inner realm of spaciousness or stillness where the mind subsides and you know yourself as an i am presence that is your true identity and once you know your true identity in the background of your daily life then you can deal with the foreground of your life in a much better way and the foreground of your life becomes a pleasant playground where you actually do good and enjoy yourself without demanding that something in the foreground of your life should make you happy including a person terrible demand to make upon a person to say make me happy it's a recipe for disaster as you might might have experienced it this make me happy usually ends in divorce and it usually means it usually means make me unhappy so anything that you expect to make you happy in this world is not going to make you happy short short while short brief moments perhaps but not any lasting happiness nothing can give you lasting happiness except the realization of the i am presence there is a peace and and a joy is very subtle joy in there and then the world is no longer such a frustrating place yes challenges come still come but the way you deal with them is more peaceful you don't create drama out of little challenges you don't create huge unhappiness when things go wrong that's the shift that's the awakening of consciousness and this is the purpose of your life is to embody that whatever other other purpose there is and that varies from person to person but whatever the your individual purpose is it needs to be aligned with the universal purpose of your life and that is awakening consciousness thank you does being in the now or awareness alter the dream or movie that is being played i understand that the dream or movie is not real now what that's quite a good question i understand okay you can have some conceptual understanding if you see that all forms are fleeting that is undoubtedly true it gives you and you say god it's it is eckhart says it's like a dream and if i look at it it's actually true it is a bit like a dream because yesterday is dissolved already just like last night's dream is gone it's evaporated and and my people that i knew have dissolved and and what i did years ago the my vacation five years ago we were in europe look there are the photos where is that now it's dissolved already it's just a figure standing in front of the eiffel tower what is what is on that it's gone already so all the fleetingness is just amazing thing so conceptually you can understand it and say okay it is all of it is a bit like a movie now what now that doesn't free you really from because the next moment something happens and you're totally part of it again you're totally trapped in the movie and compulsively you're you're acting out your part your script your conditioned behavior patterns your conditioned thinking your conditioned reactions so one moment intellectually you can say yeah it really is like a movie and then the phone rings what you're playing your part again you're in the middle of it you've completely forgotten that it's a movie it is only when you are when nothing is happening no phone is ringing nobody's knocking on your door and then you can sit again say yeah it's all like a movie so there needs to be a deeper realization that goes beyond the conceptual and that is the opening up of what i sometimes call space consciousness in you when you truly contemplate the impermanence of all things not just as an intellectual idea that you agree with but to look at it without any going beyond concepts and look look face the fact of impermanence directly for example by looking at if somebody close to you dies sitting with their body for quite a while and then go through the emotions then go perhaps beyond the emotions or go to see any dead body although for that in the west you can't do it in india you can you can't just go somewhere and say i would like to see a dead body you have to they won't allow it in india you just sit in certain street corners or in certain places and you see them they're carrying them past to the funeral pyre and you can just sit there and the most powerful thing would be then to see a dead body being burned without any concepts just face the fact directly that opens up space consciousness that opens up the depths in you where you begin to disidentify from form when you see a form dissolving in front of you and you don't conceptualize you just face it it is so amazing and even me talking about it can to some extent help you to go through that as you imagine it it's sometimes enough to imagine it the form dissolving being burned the body that was so real a few hours ago it's now dissolving in flames and that is such a it's so incredible to if you had totally believed in the solidity of the physical universe it's so incredible that you become speechless and thoughtless and in that when the form dissolves and you face it completely something opens up within you that we can call the formless and it's deeply peaceful not happy no deeply peaceful and it can even happen when there's sadness deep sadness and yet and behind the sadness there's a deep peace and this would be the case if somebody close to you dies and you see that happening to somebody you could not not weep if you see your father or your mother being burned now here you want they won't allow you to see it but if you could you would weep but there's a possibility that at the same time you because you see it is it is you live it is not the universal condition of all humans in all forms and it's your turn quite soon too you seeing all that something in you would or that there are tears and yet you see how short-lived it all is and then something opens up in you which is spacious and has no form it's and that's consciousness itself so consciousness can dis-identify the dis-identification can happen when you deeply contemplate the fleetingness of a form a human form can even be with an an animal your your dog dies it could happen also some people become very deeply very close to an animal after living with an animal for many years and suddenly it goes so any again this is where loss comes in any loss that can also do it but of course the deepest loss is the loss of a human and so when it's not resisted then you see it oh and you can't any idea that you formulate will be running away from the simple and bare fact of impermanence any any conceptualization explanation will stop you from going deeper even if you have the explanation you say well they're not really dead they're really moving on and i just have to okay but that if you don't explain anything that you go deeper beyond form rather than explaining to yourself that they exist in some other form which of course then eventually will also go through transformation again and so on and so on that's the power of contemplating transience which is everywhere for me it's always even a spiritual thing to to look at old photos of people nobody knows who they were and i always whenever i see them in magazines or sometimes in antiquarian bookshops they have collections of you see these old photos and they're just they've all dissolved and that's i find that this is deeply peaceful old films made let's say film made in 19 30 1935 40 and all these people that are running out the screen in getting excited about this in that the actors are all gone they've all dissolved and if you see a crowd scene people walking along the streets of new york or wherever all the crowds all long dissolved and the crowds that you see now in a few years gone and that's those are incredible meditations when you face that and so that's the the power of facing the fact of what the buddha called in the pali language anicca impermanence all phenomena are impermanent fleeting anicca buddha said wow and if you attach yourself and identify with any form you will experience dukkha suffering also be translated as misery also can be translated as unsatisfactoriness and so on unhappiness because the buddha said there is no self in any form that's the truth of anatta no self so if you're seeking a self in a form if you identify with a form with a body even a thought form or the psychological form of me then you identify with impermanence you're seeking a self where there's only impermanence and that self is the delusion and she saw that two thousand six hundred years ago the truth of the impermanence of all things but he saw it i mean people knew already but just to see it and to look he said look so those three are to me the most essential parts of the buddha's teaching dukkha anicca anatta dukkha is the fact of suffering if you identify with which means seek a self in impermanent forms not just in bodies but also in thought forms emotional forms and the psychological form of me so the entire buddhist teaching and is really the disidentification from form in order to realize the formless that underlies all that and of course the buddha called that emptiness which is not a very inspiring concept and he did that on purpose because if he had given us an inspiring concept we could start believing in it and the belief in the concept would become a substitute for the realization emptiness can't do that with emptiness emptiness can't have a name what's it called but emptiness oh jesus used the word kingdom of heaven it's the same thing it's a formless realm of course that is on the one hand you feel ah kingdom of heaven of course much easier to misinterpret it's more inspiring of course but much easier to misinterpret and very easy to make into something somewhere that is somewhere else which they did for a long time and many still do kingdom of heaven is we go to it some people are good enough you'll go to kingdom in in many languages actually the word for heaven and the word for sky are the same so in spanish cielo in german himmel you go you go to the sky and so although jesus said the kingdom of heaven you cannot observe the kingdom of heaven cannot be well it does not appear with signs to be observed it is not here or there you can't say there it is that's what jesus said nevertheless people say the sky you the kingdom of the sky it's that's the in many languages that's what it is i believe i got sidetracked a little with impermanence but really this is what it's all about it is a movie because it's like a movie or a dream because it is impermanent and so when you know that as a deep fact when you experience the impermanence by facing it directly then you are not so unconscious anymore more that you act out the script unconsciously continuously for the rest of your life the script means the conditioned patterns of your mind the reactive patterns the thought patterns the emotional patterns if there is an awareness that becomes the most important factor then and then you move back into the movie because you participate in your life situation and your life with an added factor you could imagine a little bit like an actor in a movie who suddenly realizes that he or she is not really the character that's being played out but he still plays his role or her role does his things but then the realization that he is not that will affect the role so he's not going to stick to the script as before the script will still be there but changes will come into the script because the awareness brings an additional factor into it so where in this whereas the script for example dictates that when this woman leaves him he goes into dreadful despair and contemplates suicide perhaps as this happens that was the script but suddenly in the movie because the awareness is there he just instead of going to the roof and contemplating jumping off the building he finds himself going to the beach and looking at the sea and breathing things change in the script suddenly spaciousness comes into the script where before there was and another thing that happens in the script he may look at a leaves moving in the wind a little breeze coming through the tree and you can if you see that in the film isn't that amazing suddenly the camera goes from the script into suddenly another dimension is present in the film you look some films actually do that those those films where there is a spiritual dimension that's i've seen films where suddenly the camera goes into and show something that's not part of the not part of the action it on the way almost takes you out of the action it brings a depth to it like the as i mentioned in some before there's a paper piece of paper or a paper bag being tossed about in the wind in the american beauty that film and and the and you watch the amazing thing of wow nothing to do with the action and so a dimension comes into the script and then the movie begins to change because another dimension flows into it so that's the answer to now what but so it's not enough to to say oh well it's all like a dream or movie that's a that's not a realization that's only a concept in your head for the realization you need to deeply see the impermanence which we just talked about or really face it then something opens up within you and then saying that it's like a dream or movie is not just a thought in your head it's a realization you're actually fully aware of the impermanent nature of all things and that changes the way in which you interact hope you had a good lunch abundant but not excessive otherwise you might go to sleep beautiful day particularly appreciated by those of us who come from the northern hemisphere where it's getting cold now we will have plenty of opportunity in the next few days for questions also questions from you answers perhaps too today i may just answer some written questions this is only a very small selection out of several hundred it's hard to choose it's only almost random choice not totally random but almost but before i do that perhaps just a few words and this will take between five minutes and one hour when you want to strengthen the physical body what do you do you exercise but what what is that actually when you exercise what do you do when you exercise one way of putting it is to say that you create difficulty for the body you create obstacles for the body to overcome there it is running on the treadmill lifting weight it's an you're creating a difficulty for the body any exercise is making life difficult for the body but that's a way of looking at it that's not a normal way of looking at it you take the body out of its comfort zone although there is a stage where the body once it gets going the body may enjoy the energy of it but until that flows there's a discomfort and that's the only way the body can get stronger if the body stays in its comfort zone then well you would be lying on a sofa or in a deck chair it's very nice but the body doesn't change so that's an interesting almost an analogy for something that happens to humans because it seems that life for everybody creates difficulties so it's not one would have thought if i were god i would make life easy for everybody and you would then see most likely if you did that most likely there would be no evolution would ever have happened or no further evolution if you do it right now because it's only it seems both on the physical level and beyond it's only through facing difficulties which you could also call challenges which you could also call problems if you like which you could also call one damn thing after another the strange thing is only by encountering these challenges do we grow in consciousness and generate energy it awakens us eventually now if you overdo physical exercise you put too much strain on the body you could kill the body you could kill yourself and this has happened people who were so obsessed with physical exercise that they overdid it i've read for example whenever it was one or two years ago a man who wrote about the incredible benefits of jogging died of a heart attack while he was jogging he wasn't that old so you can overdo it and then instead of the body getting stronger it dies and you could also say when you look at life and humans life on this planet probably many other planets you would say well it's all very well sometimes it seems to work that through facing challenges and problems we grow we grow out of identification with mind we grow out of the ego we transcend our conditioned state of consciousness and a new consciousness arises and if i know not actually speaking for myself without facing difficulties and challenges there would not have been any growth in consciousness and no awakening if i had had a what's the word for example a trust fund where you know from a very early age your parents have already looked after your security and you know from an early age you if you don't want to work or anything you don't have to you can have a comfortable life without ever doing anything so there are people like that there may even be one or two here but if you are here and you are a trust fund baby then other things must have happened to you that created difficulties it wasn't financial but there were other things and even eventually to a trust fund baby other difficulties will happen but for quite a while it could be that this person remains stagnant or might enjoy certain activities or indulge in sensory pleasures until it gets too much it's no longer satisfying and then reaches a critical stage and sometimes there was a man in i met him many many years ago i was taken to an a kind of cocktail party i wasn't i didn't move in those circles but it just happened accidentally that i ended up there and somebody took me and says you must come and look this is you're going to meet the sixth richest man in england or somebody somebody a friend of mine who was impressed by these things so i met this man who became rich apparently because he invented one little thing one he had one idea and became a billionaire this is not uncommon these days by the way with the internet but this was before the internet he had one idea and that's called tetra pack the drinks that come in a carton and it has a carton that has a particular kind of opens in a particular way so that you can pour out the liquid it's called it's a patent tetra pack so he came up with that and he became a billionaire and i've talked to him briefly and then had forgot about many many years past and forgot about it and two or three years ago i happened to read in the paper that his son who was by now he was probably 40 years old was a drug addict seriously addicted to drugs and lost completely control of his life was drift completely and he was they arrested him he was driving under the influence of some drugs and when the police entered his house they found in one of the bedrooms in big house in belgravia in london they found his wife the dead body of his wife had been in that bed for several months and he just couldn't say he hadn't killed her but he she probably died of a dark drug overdose and he just couldn't face dealing with it so he just closed the door and there was a dead body this can happen to the extreme cases of trust fund dysfunction so in other words when life gets too easy for you things can quickly deteriorate but that's your opportunity then because first life gets too easy then because it gets too easy it deteriorates and you lose more and more consciousness and then it is possible that you encounter so much suffering that then finally experience the difficulty of life and then there's a possibility of growth so this could happen to this man too now there's always the possibility of awakening so you could say of course well this is all very good it works in some cases in some cases physical exercise makes the body stronger and in some cases encountering difficulties in life helps you to awaken but you might say there are many other cases where all that happens is just seems to be just difficulties with no growth that's not at least that what it looks like on the surface people who have not enough food who are starving or diseases not to mention human-made difficulties which probably like warfare and violence inflicted by humans and other humans which improbably has created far more suffering for humanity than man-made disasters the madness of of humans who having not yet evolved into full humans because they lack benevolence and empathy and goodwill towards their fellow humans at least those who don't fit into their mental concepts of us and them so they're inflicted enormous suffering so part of the difficulties faced by humans have been inflicted by other unconscious humans so when you look at the life on the planet many people use this as an argument to prove that god there can be no god they say this is a very common argument they say look at the suffering if there were a god how would he allow all that suffering to take place and if there is a god this is how the argument goes if there is a god who allows that suffering then that god whether we call him he or she or it would be morally inferior to us because we see that this suffering is not just so these are arguments that you often hear people who want to prove that there is no god there cannot be a god and if there is a god it's a malevolent god but they may not be right the premise from which they start may already be erroneous and that premise is that there is a controlling figure somewhere who who from somewhere looked at everything and who could if he wanted to change things here and there and arrange things so that there's absolutely everything is absolutely fine all the time so there's a projection of a powerful figure who could exert and sometimes does exert influence and at other times withholds help and inflicts suffering or of course then you have to project come up with another figure if you want you don't want to have a malevolent god you have to predict there's a devil okay then now we have to divide we have two deities then the good one and the bad one gets very complicated but it's quite possible just as an alternative suggestion that the basic premise is already erroneous there is no controlling father figure what about god let's call god now a universal intelligence expressing him her itself through billions of life forms taking form incarnating into form so to speak throughout the universe so gradually the universe is becomes an expression of that underlying intelligence which comes from a dimension that has no time and space to it but gradually in this dimension gradually brings about this multiplicity of life forms which at first is asleep there's a dreamlike state and then gradually there's an awakening in this dimension i do not attempt it would be presumptuous and absurd for me to attempt to explain the universe so i'm going to stop right now because anybody who thinks he can explain the universe using a few sounds produced by the vocal chords which after all only consists of five vowels a e i o u and then you add a few what are the others diphthongs or whatever consonants it's been a long time consonants are produced by air pressure in the mouth so by combining the sound these five basic sounds produced by the vocal chords with a little bit of air pressure here and there and attempting to explain the universe is obviously absurd but one can give little hints it's okay it's it's a little bit like more like a poetic image it's a little bit like that and then you go and then you may find that on some deeper level which is non-conceptual there can be a different kind of insight or understanding of what the universe is all about but you may not be able to talk about it very much and if you do talk about it you might talk about it in the form of a poem or a poetic image or just a little analogy or as jesus used parables and so there's no ultimate explanation through words it would be totally impossible words can point to something give a little hint and then they can also point to a state of consciousness where you can realize certain things i don't want to say intuitively but some some almost intuitively knowing non-conceptually certain the nature of reality because you have looked deeply enough within yourself and if you've looked deeply enough within yourself then you understand not conceptually but on another level many of the secrets of the universe so because it's all in you you're a microcosm of the entire universe if you understand the universe understand yourself not conceptually you can't go very far conceptually so i've had a few insights here and there of that i wanted to put on paper when i wrote the power of now as i mentioned before i wrote for example there is a black hole at the center of each galaxy and in that time nobody said that and i believe the editor said you can't say that because you can't prove it nobody knows so i took it out and how do you know even that there is a black hole at the center have you been there no i know that there's a black hole inside me and that's the emptiness i think that's what i said but he didn't understand and later years later i read about they actually now say that there is such a thing well or such a no thing because it's not a thing it's formless so the argument then could be a fallacy that says if if there is a god there can be no god because he would do something god may be awakening in this dimension in the other dimension god is there's no time the universal intelligence is already complete timeless or but in this dimension it moves in and and it awakens in this dimension that's the only way i can put it don't want to go any further so if you consider that possibility that and also humanity you would say it's not fair that one person is born into relative easy circumstances well in the west another person is born into third world country and it never is given a chance and this is true also if you look at it only from a surface point of view but what if all humanity is one consciousness that is going through a certain degree of suffering and each entity seemingly independent entity going through his or her own suffering and only briefly appearing as one body and then appearing again in a different form so you could look at all of humanity as one a single consciousness that is awakening said you are a cell so to speak in that single awakening consciousness another interesting intuition i had that you could write a science fiction book about that the eventually there will only be one human being left when the evolution is complete there will only be not no longer billions of humans all humans will be contained in this one conscious being and probably not only all humans but all life on the planet will be contained in that one conscious being which is not male and not female and of course has no physical form anymore and that's where it's all going and then on all the other planets similar things happen so each planet produces one magnificent consciousness and that's where we are moving to and that the essential identity of that magnificent consciousness which is part of the greater consciousness that again is a cell in the greater consciousness that the essential identity of that one magnificent conscious being is already your essential identity here and now so it's not nothing separate from you it already is awakening in you the one consciousness is awakening in you and in every human and in you it's already a fairly advanced stage of awakening relative to many other humans on the planet you have come into contact with the spiritual teaching which already signifies that you are at a relatively advanced stage for millions and millions of humans the only teacher they have unfortunately as yet is their suffering in the same way as you until you came to a point where you were ready to embrace conscious evolution your teacher was your suffering my teacher was my suffering that it brought me to that point of the beginning of the awakening and the opening stepping out of ego so retrospectively i can be grateful for the suffering and also retrospectively you can be grateful for the suffering that you have encountered because it has brought you here here not just the physical place here it has brought you where you are at right now in your state of consciousness which is awakening and that is wonderful so that to just add a practical afterthought to this if possible at all do not resent encountering difficulties or problems in your life because that's how it works and it doesn't stop even even if you awaken even if you're awakened there's still things that you get challenged further everybody gets challenged by life in one way or another you can't even the trust fund baby gets challenged by life eventually so so when you encounter difficulties small or big see if you don't say this should not be happening this is the underlying attitude if that's your underlying attitude you're in a state of resistance for example many difficulties come in the form of other humans humans are difficult you might have noticed many so they come in in the form of other humans and then the underlying mindset for many people is this shouldn't be happening these these people shouldn't behave like that what we're really saying is they should be enlightened and why aren't they well what about you so difficulties come in the form of other humans and then you see this is meant to be you're meant to be challenged by other humans and you cannot not be challenged no matter how conscious you are you will encounter other humans who are not or not yet and they will try to create problems for you and sometimes they achieve that it is true also that you attract fewer unconscious humans into your life as you awaken more the awakening it is true that you are you're not going to move in circles where you surround it completely by completely unconscious humans but you can you cannot totally avoid contact with unconscious humans in fact they need to come into your field of consciousness because they can be helped in many cases by being in your field of consciousness but they can only be helped if you do not react when you encounter them if you say you do what you have to do but you don't the the underlying mindset is not this shouldn't be they shouldn't do that they should know better well they don't so then other difficulties come in other ways because you can encounter so we just really talked about relationship if other humans means relationships they can be the intimate relationships of people living together there can be relationships of people working together other kinds of relationships then now this already makes up for a lot of problems that people face it's relationship problems and then you can and then you have others if you don't have relationship problems and life says okay i'll give him or her something else then you have a work problem at work usually connected with the relationship too but maybe some additional factors or you have a health problem you have a problem where you live you have a financial problem that's a big one for many not enough or maybe is enough but the mind says it's not enough who knows shortage the problem of losing your job the problem of insecurity which isn't a problem unless you think it you should have security that life is insecure you don't know what's going to happen next to you that can be a huge challenge but once you accept that actually insecurity can contribute if you no longer fight it if you don't demand that your life should be secure it can contribute to the arising of presence because it forces you more into the present moment insecurity means you go into the future and see you can't control it anymore you don't know what's going to happen next oh dear i wish i knew i wish i had secure job a secure income a secure family environment i wish i had a secure pension plan i wish i had a secure life insurance i wish i had secure this insecure that then i would be okay of course you wouldn't these things are if you remove the element of risk or insecurity from a person's life this is similar to the trust fund baby then you remove one of the most important areas where you can grow by being challenged so sometimes the emphasis in our societies in the west is too much on security these days the i i mentioned somewhere before i read last year in i was going by a school secondary school and it was the beginning of the summer vacation and they have a big sign outside where there's always notices they post notices and then on that big sign at the school it said have a great vacation be safe that sounds reasonable advice because you don't want to be unsafe but is that the main thing of your vacation i was you come back after the summer the teacher asks you and say i was really safe what did you do i didn't leave my room because i wanted to be really safe so there is life again needs to be a balance between security and risk taking and accepting the insecure the basic insecurity of all of all life i when i wrote the power of now i was already in my uh late 40s and i had didn't have a home anymore there was that wasn't the time that the original time when i didn't have a home because after the rest time i did have a home but then i let go of it and then i had a limited amount of money as i briefly mentioned in the book to finish the book what would happen after that in my late 40s no life insurance no job prospects no income no savings except those that were running out no home no relationship even nothing so and that insecurity contributed to the intensity of present presence through which the book came it could have led to fear and it could have blocked me if i had demanded that my life should be more secure than it is but i did not demand that security i accepted the insecurity and it became enormous presence presence because all security is has to do with future orientation so the more you have future orientation the more insecure you feel because you cannot control the outcome so the fact that my money was running out that i had no home of my own anymore i was just going from place to place contributed to the energy behind the writing and the book so that's a wonderful thing some people cannot take that step they feel if i'm if i let's step into the unknown the impulse that came to me was so strong at the time when i knew i had to leave england for the reason i didn't know and i had to move to the west coast of north america didn't know why but the impulse was so strong i had to obey it well i didn't have to but i did but i'm sure if i had not obeyed that impulse which wasn't didn't just come once it was there every day i would have probably fallen ill and maybe would be dead already by now so the life demanded that i step out into the unknown if that is the case with you then you know what to do without being rash about it you still need to look at the practicalities so insecurity is one of the great challenges wonderful and all these things of course life insurance these are just illusions how can you ensure your life first of all life insurance isn't life insurance it's death insurance because that's that's what it is about they just don't call it death insurance because nobody would want to buy it so the universe the one consciousness whatever you want to call it is awakening in every human and every human's essential identity is that one consciousness so it's not a it's not a personal thing because if you think yourself only as a person then you have the delusion that you're an autonomous entity cut off from everything and everybody else but you're not an autonomous entity you are just a cell in this vastness and for a few years the cell gives itself a name or is given a name so and so that's me me me it really changes your life when you're the way you feel you sense your own life to be if you are the awakening consciousness in this body it's wonderful the retreat in australia will be held at a resort owned by a colorful politician is it possible for mr palmer and yourself to do a talk together as it would be an interesting comparison of the different states of human spiritual evolution besides he may for the first time be still and listen well it is not nothing is impossible it could happen he could suddenly awaken spiritually if he hasn't yet i don't know much about him i only saw one little clip on youtube in which he expressed his opinions and so who knows it may happen still waiting to hear from donald trump about it sometimes when you think certain people are you think this person definitely is not going to awaken it's just impossible but you may be wrong it's things can happen to any human that can suddenly trigger a spiritual awakening so let's see what happens this is a question uh somebody who does not have any pressing challenge his only challenge right now seems to be the repetitive nature of ordinary existence and he asks i notice the repetitive daily patterns of waking washing eating doing this and that eating washing sleeping groundhog day it causes a low feeling when i notice the repetitiveness there's a misprint here is this conscious awareness or just a thought or feeling and how to not feel low about this cycle how to not feel low the repetitive nature of waking up eating going to work the answer to that is expressed in the zen famous zen saying chopping wood carrying water chopping wood carrying water describes life i suppose in a zen monastery where you in the morning you chop the wood and then you go about your daily tasks and then you carry the water and what what chopping wood carrying water means what it implies is that you bring absolute presence to these repetitive tasks so you do them with that high degree of alertness and you're present with every movement then it's no longer a repetitive task because it only happens this time and it can be a helpful way of bringing presence into this world so use the everyday tasks so with you it's not just well not that many people these days chop wood or carry water because you've got running water but there are other things that you do repetitively you could make a list for things that you do every day certainly and those bring conscious attention to those things so that the doing becomes a meditation so to speak and not a means to an end but an end in itself whereas usually all those repetitive tasks are a means to an end and you want to get it over with as quick as quickly as you can and mentally you're somewhere totally different somewhere else probably or you're complaining how boring this life is so if you can bring that alert presence to the menial tasks of everyday life those can be transformed into a meditation and then you might not even need to sit in meditation if you can use all those things and bring presence to them and do that within presence and through presence then you don't need to sit for a long time you're already doing it in the do this the doing so it's a re complete reef i don't know what a reversal of the usual approach to these things and you can then welcome these daily tasks and then you can see the beauty of chopping wood and carrying water when when it's done in full consciousness this is by somebody who does not want to sit in a cave for 20 years sitting in the cave for 20 years is lifeless that is no more living than being taken up with ego form shouldn't be being manifest into form is self-annihilating and unnecessary being throwing down itself into form only to require the denial of form seems masochistic and self-annihilating okay i think i know what she means we are not in we are not denying form we want to appreciate the forms deeply all the beautiful life forms around us humans nature the sky everything yes there are it is true some spiritual traditions that deny form and that say that all form is evil whatever uh there was even a time in christianity when christianity was very much engaged in asceticism uh even washing your body was considered as an unholy thing to do because it would be giving too much attention to the physical form and the more dirty you were the more holy you were so that's not that is not necessary and really the answer to this question summarizes what we've been talking about you in order to really appreciate the all the life forms around you you need to be rooted in the formless and with one foot in the in one dimension the other foot in the other dimension and that is when you become still and then you look around that is one example of having one foot just to simplify it to have one foot in one dimension and the other so to speak in the other dimension if you become still thinking subsides and then you look around when you look around that's the dimension of form and you see the multiplicity of forms people flowers trees animals objects light forms but you also you're also aware that there's a stillness but what is that stillness that stillness is a presence an awareness it has no form it is essentially who you are and from there you perceive and you're rooted in that one foot in being and you perceive one foot is in form and then you can even start to think sometimes when you have to you think about something without losing an underlying sense of presence there's still a stillness behind the thinking and in between the thoughts there's still there's still that there that means having one foot in one dimension the other in the one formless being and form so you're not denying form it's only the deep appreciation of form can only happen when you realize what lies behind all forms and that is the one being or the one consciousness otherwise without having one foot in the being dimension all you have is do is the multiplicity of forms and then you grasp at one and you think that might satisfy you and you look something else or you reject that one and grasp at that one and you look out now what do i need now i need i need that i need that not necessarily an object it could be an object but i need that kind of situation i need that kind of acknowledgement i need that kind of i need the respect from you i need this and i need that i need to be acknowledged i need to be given attention i need your love so there's always that why do you need all those things i need a new car why do you need all those things because you don't have you're completely lost only in the world of form and you look for ultimate satisfaction through the world of form and nothing in this world of form can ultimately satisfy you not for briefly yes briefly a good big meal good meal can satisfy you that was a great meal sex can satisfy you briefly it doesn't last that long so it goes and then and then that's then it's over and then you go okay who are you what was your name and then the problems start so and and then you you have to use forms you want to use them to enhance yourself with it just doesn't work so that's why you need to you can only appreciate really the world of form when you have one foot in in being awareness stillness and then relate to the world and then think if you have to think and when thinking comes to an end your back is a stillness again and even while you think you can still think within that field of stillness you never lose awareness of the stillness or the awareness itself which is the stillness you feel yourself as a conscious presence that's having the foot in the in being and it's only from there that you can love the other as yourself and all those things because loving the other as yourself means recognizing the other as yourself and of course the body of the other is not yourself that's very different from you even the psychological makeup of the other is not yourself but there is a there is a deep dimension to the other and that is what you share with the other it's the same consciousness has taken a different form but the underlying consciousness is the same it's your consciousness ultimately there isn't my consciousness and your consciousness there's only consciousness and that's so the recognition of that one consciousness expressing itself through countless forms is love or if you want to call it goodwill or benevolence or agape meta loving kindness and then you don't need love anymore because you give love not in the conventional sense of the ego oh i love you it's no no it's you give you give the goodwill it comes you're the giver of love not the d not the demander of love but the the irony is when you give love you get it back so and you don't need it you don't need it back but you get it back and you appreciate it when it comes back it's lovely the bell is a spiritual alarm clock it says wake up be present and it's strange to see myself reflected so many times in this room just slight differences on the surface one consciousness you won't really know that for yourself until or unless you're able to stop thinking if only for a moment and in that moment when you're not thinking then you know yourself as consciousness it's so subtle and so easily overlooked that most people have no idea that such a thing is possible although certain sages or teachers since ancient times have pointed to it using different pointers and as usually happens the pointer is mistaken for that towards which it points in india the ancient spiritual philosophy there's a term called turiya which means the fourth it refers to the fourth state of consciousness the normal state of consciousness in normal existence are the waking state which is although there are different levels to the but let's leave that aside the waking state which is everybody's normal life experience unfolds in the waking state there's the dream state when you go to bed at night and as we know psychologists agree who have tested what happens to your consciousness when you're going to sleep when you sleep are there fundamentally two stages there's dreamless sleep and there's a dream state and this is what the three states of consciousness mean dreamless sleep which is wonderful but you don't know it but it's amazing that every night and sometimes not just in the night sometimes it happens in the day the dreamless state of merging with the one pulls you and that's why all life forms on the planet periodically go unconscious in the conventional term of the word isn't it strange let's say if you came from some other planet where this doesn't happen you would arrive here and say isn't that strange all these people every day every night they they drop completely unconscious they go it must be very strange if you come from a place where this doesn't happen but whether there is such a place i don't know probably not dreamless sleep the dream stage which is measured we can also watch if you look at your cat or your dog you can observe the differences between dreamless sleep exactly the same as with humans dreamless sleep when they're totally still and the dream state when there is some twitching or movement there's eye movement as in humans rapid eye movement it's called and when psychologists measure sleep then they measure the moment eyes move you're dreaming in the same if you watch your dog or your cat the same thing happens in addition the dog or cat may exhibit other signs of dreaming in the case of a cat the whiskers go the mouth may move i wonder what they're dreaming about i at some i had three cats at some point when i lived in england so i observed them very closely and this is what happens and with dogs sometimes the legs move in when they're they're running obviously somewhere or the tail goes quite amazing dreamless sleep dream and normal wakefulness is there anything else yes there is but most humans don't know that there's the fourth state of consciousness which is thoughtless awareness and to the other fourth and that's um reserved for a few yogis in the past who through strenuous effort realized that they are consciousness and yet now it becomes more accessible and this would be in a more enlightened society or world the most fundamental thing that is taught at school lesson number one the fourth state of consciousness and every day that is a lesson so that they become familiar with that but that's not happening yet that's fine we are here to make it happen but first it needs to happen within yourself a moment of cessation of thinking and what's left is a simple a clear field of spaciousness one can use other words and whether this lasts for you for a few seconds at a time or longer as long as it's there it doesn't matter how long more important is how frequently it arises in your life you might become a very good meditator if you practice some form of meditation and it may be although most meditators don't actually get there well maybe maybe most or half of them don't actually get there because they're trying to get there in their meditation so they cannot be because they're trying to become so the very meditation method may be misleading because you're trying to become good at it you have some goal you need to arrive at but that's not that takes you away from the realization of the spacious awareness which is already here now it's not a state to be achieved and that's another thing that has been misleading and has misled countless spiritual seekers and continues to mislead countless spiritual seekers they believe that there is a state that they need to achieve or somehow bring about or produce but that way of looking at it one can look at it that way yes but that way of looking at it actually is not helpful and it's not absolutely correct it is much closer to the truth to say that is that state that you want to achieve or thought you had to achieve is already here in you but why don't you know that because it's continuously overlooked so why is it overlooked because the world which consists of the multiplicity of sense perceptions stuff happening plus thoughts have such a hypnotic pull that that's all there is to most humans they only know themselves as that the this content-based consciousness the content of your mind is sense perceptions your life whatever is going on in your life and what you're thinking about what's going on in your life the story that is imposed on the bare facts of this present moment which really is always quite simple and not complicated but the story brings in a lot of heaviness and stuff so you put the mental story on top of the simplicity of the present moment and then your life becomes problematic i don't know anybody whose life is not problematic on that level so you're not the only one or life has not treated you unfairly because it's problematic so the most important life lesson apart from any other goal or purpose you may have in your life which of course varies from person to person many different goals and purposes and that is good but those are all the differences on the surface level of reality your what you do in your daily life or what you aspire to on this that level may be very different from person next to you but on a more fundamental level a deeper goal that is every human's destiny and should be the underlying goal before any personal goal arises and before you pursue any personal goal and while you pursue any personal goal to realize that the most important life lesson to be learned while you are here in this form or as this form is the realization of who you are in essence beyond the person and then you have you live and this is the mastery of life so to speak that you are moving towards and some of you already virtually there or there and you're just here because it's you enjoy being here the mastery of life is to to live in the two dimensions simultaneously so you don't deny the level of forms you don't say i'm not going to do anything anymore i'm not going to take any action anymore because it's all illusion some spiritual seekers will tell you that it's all illusion anyway so what's the point of doing anything i'm just going to sit and there may be a few very few individuals here and there whose destiny it may be to become just an opening in into that dimension and to have no longer any personal destiny whatsoever those are very few and most of them live in india and that's good they they they provide those few provide a kind of selfless service because whatever one human being the state of consciousness any one human being affects the state of consciousness of the totality of human beings because there's only one human consciousness and beyond the human consciousness there's only one universal consciousness so there are a few who are meant to be whose purpose it is to go just for one year five years ten years so if that is your destiny if you think it might be your destiny i would recommend that you move to india where that destiny is recognized and respected which of course is also the reason why in india there quite a few who make a living by pretending that that's their destiny that's another matter for most of humanity the destiny is balance balancing one way of putting it balancing being and doing or we could say balancing being and becoming so on the level of doing or becoming there there are certain things still perhaps that you want to achieve there are maybe certain things that you want to become you might be at right now you you might be engaged in learning this or that music or some whatever some science some skills whatever it is dance engineering astronomy astrology you can't immediately be a master at that that involves becoming and it involves doing so you're not complete on the level of becoming yet and that level of doing and becoming is one part of life the emphasis in this teaching is not on becoming not because i reject becoming but because what the world needs more at this time because it's the balance is totally lost what the world needs more is the awareness of being the being awareness so that a balance can happen in the world whereas most of the world is lost in becoming and doing go to any big city and they're all running around and they're all becoming now it might be for a few years it might be exhilarating but then the frustration sets in and your body begins to suffer and become ill we constantly achieve the next thing but part of becoming is what i often describe as always the next thing never this this is never fully acknowledged because the full acknowledgement of the present moment belongs to the being realm so a person who is constantly engaged in becoming does not can never fully acknowledge the present moment because he or she is always running away from the present moment and there is of course there needs to be the balance between yes you're going somewhere you have a life goal or either a huge life goal or a limited life goal like you want to learn this or that subject you have that life goal but as you pursue that goal whatever it is are you losing continuously the present moment so you're no longer you're never comfortable with the isness of the present moment you never see the not except perhaps for brief glances you never see the beauty around you and the aliveness there's never a full appreciation of the miraculous nature of life that that is always around you there's because you're too absorbed in becoming and so if you went to the other extreme then you be you would become that you would be the yogi who renounces all becoming and as i said in india that works if you do it here they will lock you up so what in your life as you pursue a goal another way of putting of approaching it is to ask yourself if you are not really enjoying while you pursue the goal whatever it is in your life if you are not really enjoying the doing because you are so focused on becoming and achieving and arriving at this future point that the enjoyment of the doing is so is greatly diminished or disappears completely because all you want to do is arrive but you're not there yet that's the nature of stress how stress arises stress means there is a continuous focus on the next moment so you are torn away and this is a produced by the human mind through thinking you are torn away internally from the present moment into a non-existent because future never exists except as a thought you are torn into this so-called future which is a never never land because it can never arrive you can never reach the future because the moment it becomes reality in your life it's the present moment so by having this mindset an excessive focus on becoming or arriving or achieving you lose completely the being dimension and then your life is completely out of balance even if you achieve in the eyes of the world fame or wealth or worldly success and yet you are a frustrated and unhappy human being perhaps pretending that you are happy but you're not and then you have to take drugs or alcohol or go from one relationship to another or compulsively pursue the next thing and the next thing and the next thing accumulate more of this and this and so it's well that's not a mastery of life even if you have your private jet does not mean you have achieved mastery of life in fact you may be completely deluded not necessarily you could have a private jet and have achieved the master wouldn't that be great so that that is our purpose here is to have that balance and here the emphasis of course on of this teaching is on finding the being dimension awareness of being which is why i talk so much about the present moment because this is always the moment your attention goes fully into the present moment you have withdrawn attention from becoming and doing and you are that what arises is the being dimension so and that is associated also with a sometimes brief but vitally important cessation of thinking in that moment when you become completely aware of the present moment and it starts with sense perception you're suddenly aware of your surroundings you may also suddenly be aware of the inner energy field that you feel you're alive in this present moment there is aliveness all around you and you can perceive it through your senses you hear you feel you see you smell but there's also an aliveness an inherent aliveness in your body so you become aware simultaneously in the present moment of a sense of aliveness within and without so in addition to what you see with your senses there is a an underlying field of aliveness that you can be aware of in the present moment and that's the being dimension or presence and that's who you are in essence but that's not only who you are in essence that is the essence of everything so when you realize that for yourself it's not the person who has that realization the universe has that realization the universe which for a moment because your life is a moment and on a cosmic scale your life here as a person has a very short duration it goes well then was that it yeah then the the element of continuous frustration and discontent and the feeling there's something not right here or the feeling there's something vital missing in my life but always looking to the next thing to find the vital thing that's missing in my life i have to find it if you don't realize it's already here so you there's something i don't feel i don't feel complete there's still something lacking a sense of lack something is missing i don't know what it is you might even not verbally say that there's just a feeling that something is missing or something is not right of course not because your life is completely out of balance but you're i'm not nothing personal i'm not talking to you i'm talking general terms if you if your life were completely out of bounds you wouldn't be here or if you had accidentally stumbled upon this place you would soon leave so the being dimension is accessed obviously in the present moment and the doing of course requires time you cannot do anything without some dimension of time make a cup of tea you need some time to make a cup of tea learn to become this or that you need time to become a doctor or to become a musician or to become a dancer or to become whatever you need time that's the time temporal dimension and yet although you need time the paradox is that you never really not really that you never never actually experience time or the passing of time except in your head as a thought as an anticipation of the next moment or memory of the last or other moments from the past that's how you experience time but the never is a direct experience time you can never experience directly because whenever you ask yourself where's time all you ever get is the present moment so on one level of your life time seems vital or to do things now on another side of that coin of time what on one hand time seems useful because you can on the level surface level of reality you can do things in time and become from being an ignorant person become a very knowledgeable person in time it takes time to acquire knowledge on that level and yet that's a good aspect of time but then there's something else aspect of time which you discover when you compare a photo of yourself taken at the age of 20 let's say you are now 40 or 50 or or whatever and you discover oh that's me 20 years ago and then you look in the mirror or 30 years ago what happened to me time who did this to me time oh my god and if you're young and beautiful or strong and healthy then you can still know that eventually time is going to erode your good looks no this is not tragic unless you're very much identified you derive your sense of identity from your physical body which might look good right now but won't in time it time will and then of course what ultimately time of course what time does it kills you so fast it enables you to do things and to become but then at the same time uh you begin to wilt like a flower it does the time does that to a flower too much more quickly than a human but very similar it does it to a fruit a piece of fruit if you want to observe the passing of time or the all you can do is to observe the effect that time has on things but you cannot observe time because it's never there it's a paradox one could go into this or make it into a huge philosophical thing which i won't do it's enough for you to see in your personal your immediate experience time is not something that you can ever experience directly it only leaves behind evidence it's been there a dead body for example or an apple that's that's that three two weeks ago was very fresh and now it's all wrinkled and has gone and two weeks before it was the apple looked and it's the same with young humans the strokes can be very radiant and then gradually now an interesting thing happens for those humans who are not totally identified with that level of form but to have access the being dimension as they grow older the being dimension as the physical vehicle gets gradually eroded by time the physical sorry the being dimension is actually able to shine through more as the body weakens and gets old there is a light the light of consciousness that can shine through and send then you find certain old people who as the body weakens the light increases of consciousness and the ego is completely gone and there's just a beautiful presence left let's see at the latest as you grow old that's still your last opportunity but if you've missed it for the first 75 years of your life because you were too concerned with doing all the time and acquiring and becoming whether i don't know whether you can still find it i think if you fall or something like that happens to you yes you can it's preferable not to wait until you're close to death to look for the being dimension because you might not find it anymore because you're so absorbed in the doing and in time you won't even look for it if you had no interest whatsoever throughout your life in any of this it's a bit late that's fine the universe is abundant and patient and every life has a purpose we'll talk about that some other time time you see can't get away from it so as i i believe i wrote in the new earth that time is like a on the like a criminal you can never catch this criminal but the criminal always leaves evidence behind but that he he's he's been he she who knows it's he's been there and the evidence is the dead bodies so the mastery of life is to reconcile and to balance in your life being acknowledging the present moment being appreciating what's here now and going within and finding the stillness and in being engaged in doing now for meditators many meditators can access many i don't know some can access the being dimension in during their meditation so they go maybe half an hour a day or twice or half an hour and that's beautiful it does not necessarily translate into however doesn't necessarily translate into continuing to have one foot in the being dimension while you're engaged in doing so sometimes these meditators who may be good it's a wonderful thing they can have that they may still got very much drawn into that they lose themselves like everybody else in in the doing they get losing yourself in the doing means you get upset with things you get stressed you get anxious because you need to arrive there but you're not there yet to a great thing to reconcile being and doing is to make sure that you only do things that you can actually enjoy doing or at least fully accept i wrote about that somewhere too at least fully accept that at this moment this is what needs you need to do so an acceptance of whatever you are doing at this moment a full acceptance so that your attention is fully in it or actually an enjoyment of what you're doing then the excessive focus on where you want to get to is removed it does not mean the focus is removed completely you still know that you want to achieve certain things so you need to get there this is why you're doing this but the there does not take up so much of your attention that the doing of this becomes just an unpleasant thing that you want to get it get it over with already that's how many people live their whole lives they would rather be somewhere else they want to i wish i didn't have to do this but i have to get there that's why i'm doing this and then you can the bumper sticker on your car then says i'd rather be fishing golfing surfing but this i'd rather be is a mindset that many humans have which basically says i'd rather be somewhere else and doing something else and it's an unconscious mindset and that brings a unhappiness into your doing which can express itself as stress and so on anxiety being upset easily with other people who are not doing what they should be doing to help you to do what you need to do to get where you need to get to so you get because others are not you might have noticed they often do not what they're supposed to do i don't know why that is why don't they they should know better and then you get upset because others are not doing what they're supposed to do and once you're upset with somebody you cannot relate to them fully as a human being because you relate to them as somebody who's not doing what they're supposed to do so it's hard to love a person or to have some human connection or empathy with somebody who is maybe their mind tells you it's not supposed what they're supposed to do now this doesn't mean you cannot ever tell anybody that they're supposed to do something or they fail to do something else if you're still connected with the being within yourself so that they can still still be connected with their being and then there's still a true human interaction and while there's a there's still some there's a an underlying sense of benevolence or goodwill towards that other human being that gets obscured if your focus is exclusively on doing if you lose being the benevolence the goodwill this is the same word one is of latin origin one is of germanic origin the benevolence or goodwill which is a vital thing for you to be really fully human as already confucius in china who i only started to read recently because it was never that attracted to confucius seemed very hard to get into but then i saw there's some fundamental truths that he expresses so after being confused by confucius for many years i saw that he talks about benevolence and goodwill as one of the most fundamental characteristics of a fully evolved human being so he says we are still basically paraphrasing we are not fully human yet or many humans are not fully human yet and a sign of being fully human one of the signs of being fully human is there is in your life continuously a benevolence or a goodwill flowing towards other humans whoever you come into contact with and that's the underlying current now it does not mean that in addition to the underlying current of benevolence you cannot tell a human being what you did was wrong or you forgot to do this you should have done this so maybe next time you try that again do that you can still function on the level of form and tell them that this wasn't right you made that mistake or you can say you've already i've told you 10 times and 10 times you've made the same mistake i may have to let you go if you employ this person or you'll arrange to meet somebody at a particular place and the person doesn't turn up and then you call and say oh i've completely forgot okay let's meet the next weekend okay next week person turns up one hour late okay the next week turn doesn't turn up again so eventually you tell this person i'd rather not meet you again because i don't want to wait around just i have other things to do and so i enjoyed your company when it's there but it's not not working for me although you say these things there can still be an under current of benevolence and that is the vital thing if that's not there then you get that person becomes an enemy to you virtually so to be a fully evolved human being one of the signs is goodwill which in some traditions is called love love your neighbor as yourself but love is a misleading term because it's used in many different ways that are not love at all egoic love and so on and romantic love and the clinging love i love you which means i need you and that's egoic love in spanish of course te quiero means i love you but it also means i want you so that's egoic love then you have as i wrote in a book somewhere there's another word in spanish which is more poetic rarely used because it's rarely practiced would mean i love you but the usual one is i want you i love you because i want you and if you leave me i'll hate you and that can happen from one second to the next you love this person suddenly this person says i found somebody else i love even more than you and then the story starts in the mind he she betrayed me plus long other words that go with that i was deceived etc etc and and that's a very satisfying story for the ego and it makes it creates a lot of suffering of course for yourself but the ego loves that kind of suffering because it can be can be so right and can make somebody else so wrong and the bare facts of the situation are he or she left she found somebody else is that it yeah is that so dreadful no not really if you are if you if the being dimension is there in your life so you're not totally focused on the on the outer and yes well there can be if if a relation relationship ends in that way there can be a period of emotional sadness that then passes because it's a little death especially if the relationship has lasted for a long several years there's a little death and then the emotional sadness is there and then it passes but what often happens the story that develops then that can become lodged in your mind for years to the rest of your life what he or she did to me and all it was that they left you so that's i'm sorry if i am removing from one or two of you a story that you have has been very important to you and i don't want to take anything away from you that you feel is actually valuable but you need to ask yourself perhaps i'm not saying let go of that story no i can't tell you what to do you have to look for yourself to see whether that story is a helpful one how it makes you feel what emotions it produces does it create happiness or unhappiness is the suffering that arises when somebody leaves you how much of that suffering or unhappiness comes from the fact that this person has left you and how much of the suffering or unhappiness comes from the continuous storytelling about it in your head and so as you as the story goes on on in your head years later he is still or she is still leaving you it's just happening right now story is still alive in the head terrible burden but that happens through unconscious thinking and that happens through a complete lack of presence and and the being dimension because without access to the being dimension here now you are dependent on the doing and on the level of form and on what forms are there around you you're not rooted in the source of life you're looking to forms of life to satisfy you possessions achievements appearance people appearance of the physical body all those things you're looking to those things to provide a sense of identity that's normal and that's the unbalanced life if you're looking to what you can do or what you have or what other people think of you what you own as a source of identity then it's frustrating so who am i is the vital question and you cannot know that that can find the true answer to who am i if you have no access to the being dimension because only from there arises your sense of beingness you have everybody has a sense of self a sense of identity for most people it's bound up with a story in the head so we just talked about short story little short stories about somebody did something to you but then there's a somewhat longer story which is your entire life history or at least those parts of it that you remember or interpret in a certain way because memories are already interpretations so you have a selection of memories in your head and those this bundle of memories is me now they're not as i said they're not really memories they are already every memory is already a way of interpreting something what happened but that becomes the me and that is not a satisfying or true sense of identity it's always something missing to that me that's why that me needs the future to complete itself and never does the sense the completion always happens briefly and then you say oh that wasn't it need something else the next thing so we're talking i'm talking simultaneously about unbalanced living so you see it and the possibility of mastery of life fulfilling the true purpose of your life which is bringing into balance the two dimensions of being and doing or being and becoming whether you call it doing becoming and one aspect of doing and becoming is thinking so all thinking is associated with the doing or becoming dimension because all thinking is doing you're doing the thinking well in most cases it's not really that you are doing the thinking but the thinking is done to you by your mind the thinking happens to you people don't people are at the mercy of their conditioned mind whatever thoughts want to arrive in your mind they just come and there's nothing you they think there's nothing they can do about it they don't even know that these thoughts just come into their heads because they are so taken over by every thought that comes into head they are it there's not a single there's not the slightest space between the thoughts and who they are they are the thoughts so these are very unconscious humans now what the percentage of humans on this planet is who are totally unconscious which is totally identified with every arising thought i don't know it varies also i do know that it varies from place to place there are certain pockets even within one country if it's a very large country where there are certain pockets where people tend to be more conscious and others where they tend to be less conscious and there are certain parts of the world where at the moment there's a continuous violence and conflict and those tend to be the areas where there is complete identification with mental structure collective ego and so on tribal egos religious egos ideological egos collective egos complete identification with that europe what the whole world went to the face in the 20th century in the first world war in second world war happens there was a wave of deep unconsciousness because it can come in waves taking over millions of people in germany in russia the so thinking is really the foundation or really of the doing dimension so to access being you need to access the space in you where thinking subsides and that is really if i had to reduce to one to just a few words to describe how to access the being dimension i would say stop thinking without going to sleep that's another way you can stop thinking but that's not this way we're not stopping thinking by falling below thought and eventually i would fall off the chair if i fell below thought here isn't that wonderful i'm not thinking anymore ah it is but you're moving below thinking yes it frees you too from the compulsive thinking that otherwise happens continuously in your head it frees you as can a couple of whiskies but it pulls you below thought do you really want to go below thought well if you're totally miserable perhaps you say yes i would really go if you can't go above thought at least let me go below thought but you can go above thought it's not that hard it's just that you don't know that that's possible talking generally you don't know that that is possible that there is another state of consciousness in addition to dreamless sleep dreaming and wakeful state there is the state of aware presence present moment awareness in which there's no thinking just a present space shh so that goes and as this this the present space is always the same space about we're using language let me call it spaces these spaces of aware presence need to first open up in your daily life as much as possible and that is your spiritual practice and you can start here well many of you are doing that already at some point you don't need to i say doing it's not a doing it's a relinquishment of doing but whenever you use language doing comes in so the space comes in the space of no thought doesn't matter how long five seconds ten seconds while you look at something you look at something all right now here and now as you sit here do you need to think to figure out what it is that i'm saying no you know what i'm saying you don't need to start thinking what's he really saying when he says stop thinking what do you really mean by stopping thinking i don't understand of course you don't understand because you can't understand what presence is through thinking about it so what opens up in you is a little space of aware presence like so to sometimes like to physically this symbolizes it so you're thinking thinking and then you remember aware presence for a while the thinking still happens here on the periphery and then it's ah you feel alive aliveness and then thinking comes back and then there's a next moment one conscious breath in and out and then you're working on your computer and then you're looking at a flower that's next to your computer for five seconds and then you're looking out of the window five minutes later for three seconds at the sky there's much you can't do much thinking about the sky either there are clouds or it's clear there's not much to think about so that's good you look at the sky and you can just look without thinking sky is a great thing for i'll say and again and then somebody comes into the room and starts talking to you about something and you suddenly realize you're able to listen without thinking so as you listen you go and then the person stops speaking at some point hopefully and then you need to answer something and you will find your ability to answer is still there so the thinking resumes but because you accessed the deeper dimension it is more likely that your answer will be just right for this person for this moment and be effective or come up with some effective solution whatever it is that needs to be talked about so in other words the thinking becomes more productive and powerful when you access the deeper dimension of not thinking because in the deeper image of not thinking there resides true intelligence not conceptual intelligence which is a small expression of a much vaster intelligence whatever can measured be measured through iq tests it's a very small section of fragment of intelligence tiny some people are good at it some are not but i've looked at simple iq tests and most of them i can't do so i probably my iq probably would be quite low but in the eyes of the world maybe that would be called low intelligence but there are other intelligence is much vaster than certain abilities to manipulate numbers or concepts so if it's not just that you there is a an aliveness and that comes into your life and a peace an alive peace as you access the being dimension but it also means the doing dimension becomes more intelligent when you are in touch with the being when there is that balance in your life whatever you do is now more helpful to the world and to yourself because it is no longer completely run by the ego and its needs so you become an expression in your doing of a greater intelligence so it's not just balancing the doing and the being as you balance doing and being it changes the nature of the doing so it's not it's not just that and so you become a more effective doer and not a compulsive doer quite a bit of the doing may fall away and what remains is the essential doing if you're not in touch with the being a lot of the doing is unnecessary superfluous and quite often harmful as the doing is informed by the being then it becomes more intelligent and that includes speaking what you say to a person it includes the arising of ideas that are fresh and new it includes even yes a spontaneous insight a fresh way of looking at something all those things are there as you reconcile or bring into balance doing and being and so your spiritual practice is to as much as possible have little spaces of no thought all that remains is an enlarged presence then you will find your daily life becomes interspersed with spaces this could be compared to a sky that is when there are no spaces is totally cloudy because every cloud represents a thought and every thought leads to another thought and they're so linked together that there's no can't see the spacious blue sky behind it there's just and that's the person who's totally trapped in their self-talk in the mind and as you bring in little moments little spaces of presence the clouds there's little gaps in the clouds here and there start to happen clouds oh and then they come back and then as that becomes more second nature to you you find actually sometimes the spaces become actually larger and you might spend a certain period of time in just aware presence which may not necessarily mean that not a single thought arises but no longer these vast streams of thought occasional thoughts come in just little puffy clouds go and then they drift past and another cloud comes and you more or less you feel yourself to be the sky the vast the empty you are the empty sky and you are the space where these clouds arise but before you were the clouds and as i just said it affects also the nature of the doing it also affects being in balance it also affects the nature of your thinking one thing that occurs is that thinking which is still there loses its capacity to make you unhappy and that's an amazing thing because if you look closely you'll see that a large percentage of unhappiness in whatever form whether it comes in as grievances regrets anxiety remorse blaming whatever a lot of a large percentage of unhappiness in your life it comes not from the situation in your life but from the story that you're telling yourself about it that was already discovered by certain greek philosophers they said epictetus not very well-known philosopher said that what makes you unhappy is not the situation but your thoughts about the situation so this example i just gave a mile ago he betrayed me that thought is very unhappy makes you very unhappy because a terrible thing to betray somebody now if you simplify that story and just give the bare facts of the situation he left me okay that's a very difference it's not really a story it's simple fact or i'm ruined or or i have zero balance in my bank account one is an unhappy story and one is just the fact the world's just reflecting the fact so the thinking as you bring balance being and doing into balance tends to just reflect bare facts it's no longer some unhappy story around them so you go you shift as you bring balance being and doing not thinking and thinking it changes the nature of your thinking so he betrayed me becomes he left me i'm ruined becomes at the moment there's zero in my bank statement okay or i have that amount of dollars in my pocket okay and then you see what is anything i can do now but the story i'm ruined already prevents you from taking intelligent action it becomes a burden and this is just one example of and could give countless examples of stories that are so heavy that they prevent you from taking intelligent action and that does not happen anymore as the your ability to access the being through not thinking little spaces of not thinking your ability to access that increases so i talked about the sky just now this is another little if you want some external reflection of what the being dimension is and this is been talked about for thousands of years in spiritual traditions you can look at the sky and here the sky continuously changes it's wonderful every few minutes there are clouds and suddenly totally blue then it totally overcast for 20 minutes and then some clouds in the blue sky continues so if you look up at the sky there's a vast space in the sky in a way the only forms that are in the sky is the clouds there's the clouds and this formless spaciousness of the sky so here you have the world of form so if you want an external representation of the formless you can look at this the sky and especially the the clear sky in where the clouds beyond the clouds there's the clear sky and you look at that and see yourself feel yourself to be the clear sky it's the reflect external reflection of an inner spaciousness and this is why both in china heavens is a term frequently used in chinese spiritual ancient spiritual books the heavens the jesus talks about the heavens the kingdom of heaven and in most language in many languages sky and heaven are the same word in french in spanish in german ciel cielo himmel sky and heaven are the same word so jesus really was saying the kingdom of the sky so why does he say the kingdom of the sky kingdom means in modern terminology the dimension so he was saying the dimension of the sky kingdom of heaven is the original translation so if we now substitute sky for heaven kingdom of dimension of the sky and what is the sky formlessness spaciousness so if we then translate even change the word sky what jesus was saying is the dimension of formlessness the formless dimension the spaciousness that's what he was talking about and that kingdom of heaven is within you and it is here and now that's what's the teaching is that do they understand that in the churches mostly not so he was talking about that dimension that dimension of consciousness that is possible for you and he was trying to put it into words that people at that time within that cultural context could understand he was trying to get them to see something to realize something and what did the buddha say when they asked him about the ultimate nature of life or existence the ultimate nature of realization well jesus said the kingdom of heaven is within you that's and buddha said um emptiness what is emptiness that stops the mind kingdom of heaven doesn't necessarily stop the mind because you can start thinking about what happens in the kingdom of heaven or what happens when i get there who will i find there who will be waiting for me there different religions have different ideas about it but when the buddha said emptiness that really stops the mind so that was perhaps the most effective pointer ever to that dimension because it denies everything in the world of form emptiness so and i'm sure when he taught at the time 2 500 years ago when he said emptiness he would look at you and as he said emptiness you could suddenly realize the emptiness emptiness spaciousness formlessness no thought so the same thing kingdom of heaven this is the dimension of spaciousness emptiness the fourth dimension of consciousness it's here and now it's and the only reason why people don't know that is they and this is how we started today they overlook it you cannot if you try to achieve it you get lost in the doing again because it's already your innermost reality you overlook the nature of consciousness itself because the world of objects is so noisy so to speak it's so hypnotic and it's every object that arises give me attention but more than objects thoughts every thought that arises which is a mental formation which is an energy form wants to draw all your attention to itself it wants to grow it wants to have little children other thoughts it wants to produce more children it wants and for a thought to be able to produce little children which then grow into big thoughts it needs it absorbs your consciousness it's it's for more let me suggest that you look at thoughts in your mind as as little entities because in a way they are they are energy forms we don't scientists by the way if any scientist tells you that they know the nature of thought they don't scientists who have studied the brain it's only the ego in scientists that prevents them from admitting that they have no idea what a thought is what is a memory how is it that i can suddenly remember something that happened 30 years ago and i hadn't thought about since then and suddenly that memory is back where was that memory was that certain molecules in my mind that were waiting to be able to to come some back into balance we just don't know is thought matter-based let's not even go there because this is more practical so i've forgotten what i was going to say but as we started earlier when i started at the beginning say it's overlooked that's overlooking in the same way that a fish would overlook the presence of water where is it i need to achieve water no it's already here you basically are water well the fish so what is it what is overlooked is the simple fact that you are conscious and let me correct that you are consciousness the essence of who you are is consciousness and you can sense the essence of who you are at this very moment because without thinking about your past right now you can get a very clear and powerful sense of beingness right here and now and you know that without any doubt you are conscious and you are consciousness here and now then that is your identity your sense of i who am i is a question that is sometimes used in as a meditation subject ask yourself ramana maharshi in india who lived in the 20th century first half mainly of the 20th century recommended that when you meditate you ask yourself the question who am i but you cannot find the answer by thinking about it so who am i is a pointer to finding that which had been continuously overlooked and that point is who am i now what is the answer if if the answer is not a thought if the answer is not found in the realm of thinking who am i after you ask the question there's a space and that's the answer ah so what then happens the being dimension is present in your life continuously in the background and sometimes in the foreground it's in the foreground if thinking completely stops and you just you might even close your eyes and be completely just as what's left is just a sense of being as our presence and then you open again and then thinking starts and the awareness of being recedes somewhat into the background and then you can now this is the real mastery where even while you think you can still feel the spaciousness behind the thinking and in between the thoughts that is the fulfillment of your of your destiny and if you can live your life like that and you can then whatever you do in your life the other dimension of your purpose your life purpose will be wonderful and fruitful because it will flow from that dimension of connectedness with being and what you do what you will no longer create suffering for yourself and others what you do in fact will no longer be karmic it comes from a deeper level it's not karmic action anymore there can be action that is not karmic and that flows from it's that deeper benevolence towards others so it's a wonderful thing to be practicing thoughtlessness thoughtless is a negative term in conventional usage but we use it in a different way here it means presence so this is what we practice here as you sit here of course and as you in between our sessions and while you do your movement sessions with kim but very helpful is to realize that the doing which is movement and the being don't need to be separate and that's a way of practicing bringing the doing and being together and that can start with physical movement and then whenever you are not totally focused on the goal that you want to achieve once unless your attention is in the doing in fact there's more attention in the doing than there is in the mental mentally projected goal you still have a goal a life goal let's say you want to become a writer my goal is to become a writer okay that's fine so how do you achieve your goal of becoming a writer well the main thing is yes you have to start reading some books if you haven't if that helps and then the next thing is to write anybody wants to become a writer so let's presume that you have already read quite a few books otherwise if you love books and writing the next step is you need to write now if you are excessively focused on becoming a writer or producing books or even becoming well known as a writer or all those things then your fullest attention will not be on the writing and your enjoyment of it if there's any enjoyment at all will become diminished because you want to arrive there there's always some attention is taken away by this goal but if you have the goal and yet you give your fullest attention while the goal some of your attention yes is on the goal but most of it is on the act of writing which you can actually enjoy then you enjoy the writing you might not enjoy it all the time because every writer occasionally has writer's blocks so then you just have to wait and left and sometimes or just pick up the pen well i i write with a pen but most people these days don't they have a computer enjoy what you're doing even if you never get published you enjoyed and you're enjoying the writing what's wrong with that and if you are enjoying the writing the possibility that somebody will enjoy reading your writing is greater the possibility that people will enjoy reading it so and so whatever it is you might have a course of study i want to become this or that yes but are you enjoying this moment while you are studying if not there's something not right and you lose yourself in doing so always make sure that there's an enjoyment of the present moment of whatever you're doing in the present moment if you can enjoy what you're doing in the present moment then the being dimension is present in the doing and if you absolutely cannot enjoy it for certain things that you may have to do this moment demands that you do that at least you can accept this moment fully that you accept that you have to do that at this moment and then also the being dimension is still present and when the being dimension is present there's a piece in the background of the doing that's the sign that the being dimension is present when you get completely upset with external doings then the being dimension is not present when there's a piece in the background the likelihood also that you're doing will be effective and lead to quick and effective results is much greater and that's slightly miraculous almost so when the then all the negativities that otherwise are associated with doing when you're not connected with being if they fall away there's just clear doing this either enjoyment of what you're doing or there is an acceptance of what you have to do right now but there's never there's not anymore that entity that complains incessantly about what it's doing but doesn't want to be doing it and as I've quoted before Ramana Maharshi the spiritual teacher from India who lived in the 20th century first part of the 20th century wonderful teacher when he was asked how do we know whether somebody asked him how do I know whether I'm making progress on the spiritual path how do I know that well if he could have said of course a Zen teacher might have said there is no progress on the spiritual path for example uh or he might have said let go of your idea of progress on the spiritual path it's all nonsense maybe a Zen teacher might have said that but Ramana Maharshi said oh yeah that's it's easy you can know how how you're making progress on the spiritual path how well the degree of absence of thinking is the criterion or the measure for progress on the spiritual path that's what he said the degree of absence of thinking or thoughts is the measure of progress on the spiritual path and he was not talking about falling below thought no he was talking about rising above thought if you fall below thought you become a fool as it's traditionally called and if you rise above thought you become a sage but the fool and the sage have certain things in common they are both connected to being more than the ordinary man or woman and that's why in ancient mythology the fool is an important figure even in lord of the rings where the hobbit is a little bit of a fool but he is the only one who can do the great job not the more evolved people so the fool and the sage and sometimes they are mistaken too you can mistake the sage for a fool and you can mistake the fool for a sage a lovely movie that's quite old now that where a fool is mistaken for a sage is with peter sellers it's an old movie and it's called being there being there whereas there's a man who lives below thought but people think he's so evolved that he's he's a sage and it's happened in the past that certain spiritual teachers were not recognized and taken to be fools that's not uncommon so sufi masters some zen teachers another one of course as i mentioned before where the fool is the fool is more than a fool is forrest gump that movie where forrest gump is below thought has no ego and yet he's so connected that life all always brings to him what he needs and he does good without claiming any ownership or so he does he does heroic things in the war but never even realizes that he did on something heroic in the war he's not evolved enough to have an ego and so that's a lovely another lovely illustration of fool and sage it's having certain similarities now this does not we are not going back to the fool stage so as you know we will have many opportunities for asking questions and so on either today or tomorrow or the day after or the day after that or the day after that it's all the present moment anyway so in the meantime your practice is gaps of no thought being the presence rather than being the person so welcome or perhaps i should thank you for welcoming me since about 75 percent of you are from australia so thank you for welcoming me myself and kim and the whole team back here and it's been maybe six years since we were here at the at this very place the last time it had a different name then and since then there have been many improvements here the most notable one the addition of dinosaurs i knew six years ago that there was something missing here but i wasn't sure what it was so this is a retreat you've been taken out of your usual surroundings and put here for some of you who have come from more distant places this is a very exotic environment tropical with wonderfully exotic birds and animals and kangaroos and australian gigantic lizards and all kinds of wonderful things and trees that if you're not familiar with this part of the world that you've never seen before so all this is wonderful and helpful it can be a helpful thing to be in unusual surroundings because it's easier to be more present in unusual surroundings that's the advantage of traveling and that's why as i've written somewhere uh many people feel more alive when they travel and when they are at home their surroundings are so familiar that they lose presence completely they don't see things anymore they go from where they live to their office or wherever it is gone done it so many times they don't see it anymore and you would be surprised even at home your usual surroundings you might have a painting on your walls and haven't looked at it in the past three years might be very beautiful or your garden or the plants in there so this is the familiarity can lead to a kind of semi sleep-like state and when you're traveling you go oh and you the good thing is you might not even have a name for all the new things you see at home you know what everything is called but here you see things you might see a weird animal the mind stops because you can't name it and that's a wonderful thing or you see it trees that you haven't seen before and you go ah or you might say to your friend look at that and you might notice in the moment of looking at that you're not naming it in your mind because you don't know what it's called so there's a moment a few seconds of just being present just being the presence rather than the naming person and so let's hope you're here we're here for a few days let's hope that by the last day this place will not have become so familiar to you that you're not looking anymore so it helps to be wide awake to your sense perceptions because that is one way of coming into the present moment which is why we are here because there is more to the present moment than we realize most of the time there's more to it it's the access point to the deeper dimension within yourself so as a general theme underlying theme for our retreat i recommend surprisingly that you practice being in the present moment so we have this helpful thing that you are in unusual surroundings unless you live just a few miles from here then it may be a harder job or you might even live next door however although you've been taken out of your usual surroundings you have carried with you something else and of course that's your mind that travels with you wherever you go that is perhaps the meaning of the book that somebody wrote i believe the title is wherever you go there you are so wherever you go you carry your mind and the conditioning of your mind with you so that is the challenge here on our retreat to transcend the conditioning of your mind the habitual way of interpreting the habitual way of reacting to things habitual mind patterns if a mind pattern in you is that you frequently and very quickly become discontent with where you are if that's a pattern in you then that pattern will arise here also if your mind pattern is one that loves complaining and finding fault with things then it's very likely that very quickly this mind pattern will appear here also despite the fact that you are in these wonderful unusual surroundings the first thing you might complain about is the dinosaurs and the mind says i'd rather see a big buddha or something like that or the mind says we've come here on a spiritual retreat isn't there supposed to be a buddha somewhere so you get surprising things things that your expectations are not met in various ways and that is a challenge to the mind to the conditioned mind because the conditioned mind wants its expectations met and if they're not met it gets uneasy restless irritated angry starts talking about what's wrong either silently in your mind or to others and if others can agree with you then it's even better or you can go on the internet and then you get 1 000 people agreeing with you so you always find those in some of you but maybe one or two of you that have that complain pattern i'm not saying if there's something really wrong you shouldn't do something to rectify it so if if something is leaking in your room you say no i'm not going to say anything because you're not supposed to complain no of course you go to reception say there's something there that needs to be rectified it's not a complaint it's just information complaint means there is an emotion behind it and the emotion says this should not be happening then it becomes a complaint or it's your fault then it becomes a complaint if it's simply presenting information it's not a complaint it's just a fact and then the question is is can anything be done about it if yes good or if they say there's nothing we can do do you go on insisting that this is very bad and create suffering for yourself or do you simply then accept this is what is and there is no situation ever including at a retreat in a wonderful almost perfect place except for the dinosaurs for some of you almost perfect place as far as the natural environment is concerned it's you can't imagine anything more the profusion of of vegetation and aliveness that surrounds you you cannot imagine anything more wonderful and yet it's not perfect and not just because of the dinosaurs there will be other things too that are not perfect you cannot find a place where you go everything is just so perfect it doesn't exist if it did exist you would become incredibly unbearably bored with saying it's so perfect what am i going to do now but of course you're lucky there is no such place so there's always something that goes wrong and that's a wonderful thing you can not only anywhere as you might know in life i believe i'm not the only person who can say that since i was born life has been challenging ever since then and very rarely do you get a little bit of moment of freedom from challenges and then suddenly something drops behind you or falls on your head metaphorically speaking so something you can practice here is to have an expectation that things should should be in a certain way and nothing should go wrong and that reality external reality should conform to exactly the expectations of the conditioned mind that creates ultimately unhappiness because a lot of the time reality does not conform to the expectations of your mind in some ways it does in other ways it doesn't and not only in a retreat but also daily life as you might have noticed one damn thing after another one damn thing after another and then the mind says i can't take anymore of course that's just another thought completely untrue you can take anything if you drop the thought this is what is so you practice here letting go of the expectations of your mind and live in alignment with what is internal alignment with what is rather than demanding that something should be otherwise the exception is conveying information so that something can be changed if it can be changed that's understood or doing it yourself clean it up do this do that that's fine but other than that see if here make it your spiritual practice to live in alignment with the isness of the present moment and honor the present moment and bring a kind of appreciation to the present moment appreciate while you're here appreciate whatever the present moment presents to you another word for it is you welcome the present moment and that's not this is actually a relatively easy place to do that it's not one nothing is perfect we know that but this is a you're in a protected setting and it's relatively easy here to welcome the present moment it might be easier here than to be at a crowded airport and the flights have been canceled or to be stuck anywhere or to be in the hospital then things big things small things happen wherever you go welcoming the present moment is the practice that gives you access to the spiritual dimension to that which is beyond the person in yourself it seems too simple almost but let that be your practice here you may remember i mentioned it once or twice before there was a zen teacher and a disciple came to him and said i'm going away now on a journey for several years and since i haven't made it i've been in this monastery for five years and i still haven't got it can you give me some practice for my journey and the zen master said okay here's your spiritual practice for your journey come back in five years and let me know how it how it went wherever you are whatever situation you find yourself in whoever you are with whatever happens say thanks for everything i have no complaint whatsoever is that it one imagines spiritual practice some complicated meditation method that takes years to master but no he said make it your spiritual practice to say thanks for everything i have no complaint whatsoever no matter what happens so if you miss whether you catch the bus or you miss the bus you catch the bus say thanks for everything i have no complaint whatsoever you miss the bus thanks for everything i have no complaint whatsoever you you're in a in a lovely hotel room in a warm bed thanks for everything i have no complaint whatsoever or you're out in the cold with nowhere to sleep oh then it not only gets more challenging to say that but if you say it and you mean it saying it is just words but if you say it and mean it when instead of being in a luxury hotel you find yourself penniless in the street if you then say it and mean it that will take you much deeper than being in a luxury hotel bed and saying thanks for everything i have no complaint whatsoever that's relatively easy although you might say the pillow is not quite the way i wanted but it is it's relatively easy to say but say it where it's when you're out in the out in the cold and you can't get a hotel because you don't have the money or whatever yours there are no hotels nowhere to sleep cold wet thanks for everything thanks thanks that's a sarcastic thank you thanks god it's just what i needed that's not the thanks that's not it it's if you say thanks which means a total acceptance of this moment not a total acceptance of the okay i might as well accept it for the rest of tonight i'm going to be out in the cold you don't know maybe a minute from now something will happen and you'll find somewhere or somebody will offer you a place to sleep it's just this moment thanks for everything which is thanks for this moment so and thanks really here means a complete acceptance of this moment and if you accept a moment that seems difficult to accept that takes you much deeper than accepting a moment that's easy to accept if you have a nice meal you have a here you're drinking a cocktail and then you've ordered the starter which is whatever let's say oysters half of what if some people love them some don't but it's that's a general thing that people think oh that's okay and they can thanks for these oysters thanks for everything i have no complaint whatsoever thanks for everything and then you go home and suddenly you feel sick in your stomach so when you were eating the oyster you had thanks for everything i have no complaint right but what about now because you ate too many oysters so it's bringing your inner self into alignment with the present moment a very powerful spiritual practice why is it so powerful especially when it's when the situation is challenging and you still say it and you mean it because everything that sustains the person the exclusively personal sense of self in that act of complete surrender to what is the personal sense of self gives way to a deeper transcendent sense of self which the buddhists call no self a deeper consciousness suddenly shines through though really it's a kind of denying your form identity it doesn't mean you don't have it anymore but you are no longer trapped exclusively in your form identity the form identity is strengthened the more you can be in opposition to what is the stronger your form identity me the person the me the more you are in opposition to what is the stronger the the me becomes your form identity and if you can have enemies lots of enemies it loves that gets even stronger they all against me or us make if it's a collective ego the collective ego loves its enemies can't actually survive without them every collector even needs the others who are not us this is us and that's the others so that's the the wonderful thing that the person the exclusively personal sense of self becomes weakened subsides and another something else emerges when you're no longer habitually oppose what is something emerges that is deeper than the personal sense of self the transcendent dimension presence whatever we want to call it some people call it your higher self or you could call it your deeper self words doesn't matter but something emerges that is from beyond the person and that is a place of great power and aliveness and possibility and that is where you are connected with a vastness and with everybody else too so it's when you feel when you when that transcendent dimension arises you feel a greater sense of connectedness no longer the separation with not only with nature but also with other humans you no longer feel the otherness of the other it's just yourself in another disguise that's really becomes your experience whoever you meet there's yourself in another disguise isn't that a wonderful way of being with other humans that essentially you can sense not only your connectedness but you can also sense your inherent oneness with others so that is why this presence practice honoring the present moment welcoming the isness that's why that's so such a powerful practice so here we it is helpful to be here because it's a bit like a gym here in the gym you practice you can run on a treadmill lift weights eventually you're strong enough and then you go outside and do whatever you have to do the so this is a spiritual gym and it's easier here not only because there these humans here have come together with this common purpose of transcending the merely personal even though you might not have put it like that when you came here so it helps to be engaged in this with others don't become dependent on on others no but in here in this environment a protected setting where you can practice that new way of being in the world this new way of living that is what the ancient sages have pointed to using different words for thousands of years it's all they've said it not many people got it but now more people are getting it for the first time more than just a few and that's wonderful and that's why you're here don't believe that our sessions are the main thing and the rest is just waiting for the next session no then you would be wasting a valuable opportunity the retreat is every moment you are here is the retreat is not just our sessions here every moment you should incorporate into your presence practice so walking from here back to your room brushing your teeth wherever you are whatever you do be present that's your spiritual practice be aligned with the present moment rather than carry in your head this huge amount of mental content about your past and your future because the mind is primarily concerned with past and future so while you're walking here you're already thinking about in a week's time i'll be home again and then what then i'll have to do that and have those four calls to make and then i'll have to do that then those problems will be i shouldn't have come here because i've got so much on my plate at home why did i come here i should have dealt with my things there i should have waited gone to next year's retreat i said that's the self-talk in the head you will may encounter it here too as you walk from here to there you will encounter the self-talk in the head so how do you get out of the self-talk in the head one you need to know that that's self-talk in the head if you don't know it's self-talk in the head you become the self-talk in your head you become the voice in your head you don't know it you are it so you have to the the vital step and i cannot tell you how to do that and that minimum of awareness needs to be there where you know that there's self-talk happening in my head and it's telling you some kind of story it could be the briefest of stories like i shouldn't have come here or i don't fit in here all these people are too spiritual for me or i'm so spiritual these people are not spiritual at all it's all little stories in the head every every even every fragment of self-talk is a little story in the head that goes around and then you look at reality through the lens of the little story it's not just one story of course it comes another one and another and in some little some stories are not little they may be big stories about yourself and your life and what's gone wrong with it or what's gone right with it so even that's a story more pleasant than if it's gone wrong so you you need to know when the self self-talk happens in the head the knowing is not part of the self-talk the knowing is just an awareness that there is self-talk the moment there is an awareness that there is self-talk the possibility of freedom from the self-talk opens up if that awareness is not there there's nothing you can do you have to wait until life knocks you over the head so that finally some awareness comes in and you go so you might have to sleep on a banana skin or something because you're self-taught and suddenly you go oh life told you to wake up and awakening which is a term that's been used for thousands of years in the spiritual context not in the conventional context to awaken means to come out of sleep in conventional language terminology but in spiritual terminology to wake to awaken means to awaken one could say basically to awaken out of the self-talk in the head because the self-talk in the head is a form of hypnosis self-hypnosis you are hypnotized have been hypnotized by society your surroundings the surrounding culture you the even the language that you were taught to use that becomes a large part of the self-talk although some of the self-talk is also accompanied by images but a lot of it is language and all that you've been conditioned and this is you are possessed by that which is an energy formation and humans are possessed by that and mistake that conditioned entity which consists of thoughts they're so trapped in it they're so identified with it they believe in every thought that comes into your head it's absurd but normal well another word rather than absurd i could say it's mad but it's normal it creates incredible amount of suffering unnecessary suffering that humans create for themselves and for others you can't create suffering for yourself without making others suffer who are close to you and whoever comes into contact with you an enormous amount of suffering is created by not realizing that large percentage of your problems consist of self-talk in the head that's amazing and and once you see that you say okay and then you can have a little bit of awareness and say who am i am i that story or am i the one who sees that who recognizes that there's self-talk and in order to recognize that there's self-talk going on in you that's not a thought there's just an aware presence that and then the compulsive nature of self-talk lessens somewhat because some awareness has come in the light of awareness has come in and then you realize you are that light of awareness you are the awareness and there's a shift the the you the head may not immediately stop it'll want to carry on the self-talk wants to carry on there's a momentum to it you you can observe that momentum if you can't do it in yourself you can observe it in others once they have a story and they're telling you their story they can't stop they want to go on they don't and they and they don't want an end if they're talking about their problems they don't want an end to their problems they want a continuation of the story which is the problem they don't know that that's why we call it unconscious they don't know that their primary thing is they want the continuation of the story because that's the continuation of the fictitious person that cannot live without its story its storyline and so do so those people do they want an end to their problems of course they will probably tell you yeah i'd love no they don't they don't want an end to their problems because that would be an end to their story which is their identity they don't want an end to their sense of identity i need my story all the things that my i've been telling myself in my mind about myself and other people and my parents and my relatives and my co-workers and my ex-wife and my ex-husband and what people did to me and on what or what i did and shouldn't have done or failed to do who am i without i can't let go of that i need to think about this more so it becomes a habitual place the habitual place of the of the mental noise where you feel that's me and so every therapist knows that you always reach a point with your clients patients whatever depending on the school of therapy depends whatever you call your clients your patients whatever there comes a point when you hit that resistance they don't want to be free of their problems and that the big challenge is there is this person going to overcome that barrier because that barrier is not just becoming free of my problems but also becoming free of a very limited and ultimately fictitious sense of identity the me so that is what i've described is the next step one could say in the evolution of human consciousness is stepping out of self-talk which is the conditioned mind and realizing there is much more to who i am than this conditioned content of my mind and that is the beginning of awakening it's not it's not those words not not that you need to believe that there is much more to who i am than the self-talk in my head because that is still self-talk in the head i believe there's more to who i am and you better believe it too no that that needs to be and most of you are here because you already have had or not only had a glimpse many of you have already deeply been able to transcend the person because the person the exclusive personal sense of self wouldn't want to be here it would feel threatened by being sitting here it either would feel threatened or it would feel extremely restless and irritated i need to get out of here or suddenly your legs start twitching this is quite normal by the way many humans have twitching in their legs all the time or they go so if there's somebody here who is going like this when you you know their person the the personal self what is becoming uncomfortable with being here doesn't know it but goes stretching and that kind of twitching is very normal for humans but if it happened to your dog would take you would take your dog to the vet there's nothing if if you have been twitching and now suddenly you stop that's good so you've realized because a lot of that is unconscious and suddenly it's oh if you make it conscious it stops and if you really make the self-talk conscious it also stops and suddenly you go and your attention is suddenly in the present moment the self-talk is never in the present moment and suddenly your attention is in the present moment and you go and the whole person at that right now is not there anymore when you go you're not a person at that moment anymore you are an aware presence so that that shift in consciousness can happen very easily whether it stays with you for a few seconds or a few minutes or an hour or a day or longer doesn't matter that much the important thing is that it arises it arises and suddenly the unhappy self-talk entity is disappearing and what has taken its place just a sense of presence and that sense of presence is first of all aware of sense perceptions so you look more consciously you listen more consciously and this is a wonderful environment here for looking and listening because there's so much to look at and so much to listen to and it's not only looking and listening it's also feeling the breeze on your skin the air especially if you come from northern parts of our planet where it's beginning of winter and suddenly you come here and you feel the warmth of the air and and you there might be a scent in the air because there's so many plants and you become conscious of that but feeling the air the movement of air on your skin requires a considerable degree of awareness a person who is immersed in the self-talk in the head they cannot feel this light the breeze touching their skin they can't feel that it's a very subtle thing and to to feel subtle things you need to have that awareness aware presence that alert aware presence you cannot be immersed in the self-talk to really honor and appreciate deeply the present moment which is life we could call it we could say honor appreciate deeply life because present moment and life are synonymous there is no life away from the present moment if you cannot appreciate the present moment means you are away from life instead of life you have a substitute in your head just abstractions in the form of thoughts so to notice the breeze on their skin you need to be quite alert and basically still inside and then you can see and to notice big things requires less awareness than to notice small things so if there's a big if there's a kangaroo jumping right in front of you which may happen it's a wonderful thing of course there of course it's easy to for that moment to be present especially if you're not familiar with them and for a moment even if you were immersed in the self-talk in the head for a moment you're free of that as the kangaroo is jumping for the moment the unhappy person is subsided but then the kangaroo is gone and then there's nothing big to attract your attention and then your attention is reabsorbed again by thinking until the next kangaroo comes but after a few kangaroos you become so familiar with kangaroos that even a jumping kangaroo is not going to get you out of your self-talk anymore but to be to notice little things like a little beetle crawling there or a very subtle noise you need more awareness so it's very important as you are here in our retreat place don't just look for the big things because while you're looking for the kangaroo you might be missing many other things in the meantime pay attention to the little things a quivering leaf on a tree and for a moment you give it attention it's all miraculous it's a miraculous expression of life and the multiplicity of the profusion of life in millions of life forms on this planet life expressing itself and to go through life ignoring the miraculous nature of life is a terrible pity terrible to have to miss that rather than to love it of course that's the sense-perceived life there is deeper life too that is not sense-perceived but we start with the sense-perceived life and as we go deeper deeper during our retreat we will see that the sense-perceived life although beautiful is only the surface of reality but you have to start with that and it's beautiful and if you give it your fullest attention even then you already begin to go deeper than the surface because then you sense an aliveness in everything you can sense that the life in this flower i'm just making sure it's not plastic even if it were plastic there is some life in plastic too but not as intense life as in the natural flower the life that is expressive that expresses itself through this flower is the life that expresses itself through this form this body this mind and millions of other other forms and so you go around in a state of astonishment because there's so much that you had not really acknowledged before it's easier to be astonished here at the multiplicity of life perhaps than if you were in what's a boring place well there are many boring places i'm not going to name any it's easier but even if you're in a so-called boring place a suburb somewhere there's beauty there too you might have to look more and even if you were in a street without any vegetation there will still be beauty there too and there comes a moment when you actually see beauty in everything even in a simple pavement or a window the surface of a table how light gets reflected of objects the colors and when for i also suggest so look for be aware of the little things because that requires that brings your alertness up big things are fine that's nice to be aware of the little things and go go when you walk around here in between sessions you go a bit like a little bit like as if you had as if you had just arrived on this planet in some sense you have because the surroundings here may be so unusual to you if you live somewhere very different it's almost as if you had arrived on a new planet and how would you be if you arrived on a new planet you don't you go and you don't you don't do a lot of thinking you just you're just there as an aware presence perceiving like a child before a child learns the names of things but you're not regressing you're transcending that level of conceptualization that which most that most humans are trapped in you're not regressing to the child stage you are transcending but as you transcend the conceptualization level there is there certain things that are similar to a child or that's deeper than the child perceives because you've been through that growth you have transcended conceptualization there's a deeper knowing that the child does not have but in other ways there are certain similarities with how a child perceives the world and it's not for nothing that Jesus said truly i tell you if you want to enter the kingdom of heaven you must be like a little child that's a very important pointer and how is a little child before the child can name things when a child does not happen to be crying the child is going he takes everything in without naming it and there's a clarity of perception and then the naming stage comes and then the problems start another thing need to mention for to be aware of here i highly recommend that you do not switch on your television if you have one in your room and if you find that difficult it means you're addicted and so if you find yourself going to the tv or the remote and you go i can't swap myself oh that's a good way of realizing that you're addicted and even more addictive these days are the little gadgets well from laptops to to pads ipads and similar devices phones which are much more than phones these days which absorb many people's attention a lot of the time so much that for many humans their interaction with reality 50 percent or more of their interaction with reality is through a little screen that they hold in front of their eyes and they live for it they live for the next facebook post so you may find that you are addicted to some extent to that also i would recommend to keep to a minimum the devices if you absolutely have to set aside 10 minutes 15 minutes a day when you actually do interact or you look at your emails or facebook posts just to see what other people are eating or what they're wearing and you can say oh that looks great or you may compulsively take a selfie of yourself here look where i am and then hopefully everybody will feel jealous about you we may talk about those things a little bit more at a later time but in the meantime i would recommend that you break the habitual if for many of you what is habitual interaction with these devices while you're here in order to fully benefit from being here so that your attention is not absorbed by that because that really amplifies the mind unless you have something that you're looking there that promotes presence you might see a present moment reminder oh i have to remember to put in a present moment reminder it needs to come up on the screen says put away your phone we'll have to write that down for the next one stop looking at the screen look at the sky oh what else oh alcohol i believe you can buy alcohol here and there's nothing wrong with a glass of wine or beer occasionally but at least how i see it but it can easily pull you out of presence into unconsciousness especially if after one glass of wine you cannot stop if you feel you need one glass wine to enjoy your meal fine fine but if you're one of those many you cannot after one they need to have a second because and then they don't realize that before but when they started drinking their one first glass of wine they were totally determined determined only to have one glass of wine but by the end they get by the time they get to the end of the first glass of wine they forgot that they were totally determined to only have one glass of wine say oh i might as well have another and then you're gone so if you are one of those don't don't have the first one or beer if you cannot enjoy the meal without a beer you must have your beer before the meal okay but if you if you cannot stop you must have another one after that this is not this is would prevent you from benefiting from being here if you can avoid alcohol altogether it would be preferable while you're here so that is only there no this is not a boot camp retreat there are spreadsheets like that where you get strict instructions no alcohol you're not watching television you're not going to talk to anybody you're not going to look at anybody and we're going to meditate for 10 hours a day some of you may have been on that retreat now sit and close your eyes there's a place for that kind of retreat too if it's right for you if it's right for you you've already been to it or you're going to go to it so i'm not mentioning other drugs because i don't think i need to here i don't think you will indulge in those things here there's something much better than acid or pot and that's called presence it's not a drug it's true that some of these drugs can give you a little glimpse of of what it is to perceive the world without the intrusion of the habitual mind and this is why people who take some of these drugs have an experience that goes a wow experience and you look at something you look at a simple object and suddenly see its beauty and aliveness and you go wow wow look at that look at that glass of water i can't believe it and the truth is it is miraculous and the truth is we don't see it because of the habitual nature of the mind if you if you suspend thinking and look at this glass of water water is an amazing substance it's a miracle and what is a glass it's a solid thing and the light shines through it it's amazing it's completely solid but the light travels through it and yes you can go wow without any drug if you're real if you're present really present so and you again do this occasionally you can do it here people won't think you're mad if you do it out in the world they would think oh he must have taken something or she but if you go to really appreciate an object any object a natural object or even a man-made object pick it up give it your fullest attention feel it see it and then after a little while you can sense something else something that takes you beyond the sense perception a little bit first of all you you've sent you see it you give it fullest attention you feel it you might smell it or taste it and then as the mind becomes quite still you can sense there is a presence in that object let's say this for example there is a certain that there's a certain presence it has every object also has a presence that transcends the sense perception so you feel the presence of that thing as some artists did and then they were able to paint it this is why some artists painted extremely simple objects or some artists of impressionists for example painted landscapes that nobody would have looked at twice not remarkable landscapes ordinary landscapes and they became great works of art because those artists were able to look at an ordinary landscape through these unconditioned eyes unconditioned ways of perceiving they actually went and they saw something extraordinary in the ordinary and then they were able to paint and give expression something that nobody can define but many humans can sense that there is something there that they cannot define when they look at that painting and the painting is not of anything extraordinary it might be a simple landscape or like van Gogh an old chair nobody would look at this chair twice but that was a chair in his room and he looked at it and he went oh and he saw something extraordinary in the ordinary and then he was able to convey that and put it on canvas so some of the realization of those artists of seeing the extraordinary in the ordinary God is reflected still in what they produced and this is why we call it a great work of art the miraculous thing is that many humans can actually recognize there's something there that is great but they can't say what it is they can sense it so there's a there's a general agreement that these are great works of art I think the prices they pay for these things is absurd of course these days you can if you can have a painting like that that costs 50 million dollars so a person buys this painting for 50 million dollars and they never look when they go out they don't look at the landscapes that they look at their painting and say this is mine it's worth 50 million dollars the painting is supposed to show you how to look and see the extraordinary in the ordinary so instead of you don't have to spend 50 million dollars go out into a walk and there it is and it's not necessary to create a work of art unless you feel compelled or something arises from within you and then you produce something that could happen but the work of art is your your life is the work of art what becomes your reality is the work of art that's our so that is a little summary that was of our retreat here of how to be here oh yes one more thing I think it's one maybe more uh some of you may want to be in silence I don't know yet usually we have some tables reserved I don't know if that's going to work here for people who don't want to engage in social interactions and that's fine that's good others may prefer to engage in social

[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 9:49)

Reserved, I don't know if that's going to work here for people who don't want to engage in social interactions and that's fine, that's good. Others may prefer to engage in social interaction. Who knows, you might meet somebody, but be careful with the habitual patterns of your mind that can become stimulated when you engage in conversation and then you can easily lose presence, especially when you start discussing things or expressing your opinions, where very quickly an identification with viewpoints can come into your mind, which is ego.

A viewpoint is a thought pattern or a thought. And as you talk to other people, you may find that their view or opinion is different from yours. And then you get into, you notice the energy arising and you defend your opinion, not knowing that it's just an opinion.

You think you're defending your very identity, that's unconscious. So be careful when you discuss things so that you don't lose presence. The wonderful practice is to look at another human when he or she is talking.

And while you listen, feel your inner body. We all are to some extent familiar with that. Feel your inner, the aliveness inside your body as you look at that other person and as you listen to the other person so that you don't need to comment mentally on what the other person is saying.

Allow the other person to fully express his or her viewpoint or opinion or whatever they have to say and be there as a presence. So be alert and still and listen. See if you can listen from that place of alert stillness.

So you look at them and you listen. They talk and you're still and alert. It's beautiful.

And then at first, it may be a little strange because you might think I won't be able to know what to say, but you do, you will find. Words too will come afterwards, but be careful that you don't get drawn back into your habitual patterns. So that's a presence practice while you interact with people.

Opinions are amazing. Amazing things can be huge obstacles if you're identified with them. Identified means your identity is bound up with your opinions.

And if you look on the internet, how worked up these people get, and so angry and irritated, and what's happened to them, they're completely identified with their viewpoints or opinions. Their whole sense of self is in it. And anybody who disagrees is the enemy.

And they love complaining. So we watch out for opinions. The Buddha already talked, there's a sutra of the Buddha about the beware of opinions, the thicket of opinions, the jungle of opinions.

Now, does that mean you can't have an opinion anymore? No, of course you can still have your viewpoints, perfectly fine, about politics, about social issues, about psychological things, whatever. You can have opinions, but is your identity bound up with them, or is it simply do you recognize it as a viewpoint, an opinion, without having to defend it as if it were your very life?

It's not your life. It's an abstraction in the head. Also, I recommend that from time to time, you take, even if you have come with a friend or a family member, that you spend certain periods of time by yourself where you're not with anybody.

Take some time away from other people where you just walk to the beach, walk around here, walk along the beach, a magnificent beach. You can walk for miles. I wouldn't say go swimming because it looks quite, the currents are probably quite strong, so we don't want that.

But walk along the beach and, or up the little mountain here, or walk around here by yourself. And as you walk by yourself, be the observing presence, be alert, and you go. And so sometimes you stop, you might sit somewhere and look around, notice the little things, the sky, and after a while, and we'll be going more deeply into this later, just a brief mention here.

After a while, you notice, you notice not only what you are noticing, you notice also your noticing. So you not only notice the things that you notice, you notice the noticing, which means you have become aware that you are aware. You can feel the awareness without which you wouldn't be able to see or perceive anything.

And that's the, that is the new consciousness when you can feel, sense yourself as the awareness. You're aware that you are aware. And as I'm saying this now, don't wait for it to happen.

Right now, can you be aware at this moment of the fact that you are aware? It has no shape or form. Awareness has no shape or form.

It's formless, but it is an enormous presence that gives rise to the entire world, the experience of the world, that is prior to the experience of the world. And from there, you look around. So you're now, you've gone deeper than the surface reality and still appreciate the surface reality.

That's who you are. You are the consciousness that underlies phenomenal existence You're not a person. You're temporarily, that consciousness takes on the form of a person, physical and psychological form.

It's a temporary formation. And it, that temporary formation may not even end or will not end when the physical body goes. That formation may have a life that continues for a while, but it is a formation, a form identity.

The essence of who you are is formless. It's consciousness. And what is consciousness?

You could ask. And all I can say right now is a little metaphor or analogy, rather, consciousness is the, it's like the light that comes from the sun. And then you may ask, what's the sun?

But I won't answer that. You will find that for yourself.

[Speaker 8] (12:37 - 13:52)

Thank you. Hello. I want to ask, I work with people and I notice, I work with people and talk about lifestyle change quite a lot and how it will relate to health.

And I notice in myself, as well as in those people that I work with, that sometimes in the face of really clear experience that making a certain health choice will make them better. And in sometimes serious situations, like say they've got diabetes or something. And I just want to make this distinct from things that we know that are addictions like smoking.

So I'm not talking about that, cause that's an addiction and that's got a different force. But sometimes people, for example, they'll go on a gluten-free diet, say, and they'll be much better for three months and then they'll come back and then they've started to lose that momentum, lose motivation and they're drifting back into the diet that doesn't suit so well. What is that force?

What is that in us, in me too, where I know that, for example, if I go to bed earlier, I'll feel better in the next day, but something in me sort of says, no, I don't want to go to bed early.

[Speaker 1] (13:53 - 13:53)

No.

[Speaker 8] (13:55 - 13:56)

What is that?

[Speaker 1] (13:57 - 24:55)

Yes. So there is a, these are forms of conditioning that has inertia and a certain momentum in certain ways in which people live that have been there for many, many years. They could also almost be seen as energy streams inside you and they have a certain momentum.

And some of these are sluggish energies, the inertia, the pull of gravity, gravitational force of deep seated habits that are associated with the person. It's part of conditioning, mental, emotional conditioning. So then the motivation goes away again.

And sometimes it's only in a crisis situation that people are able to break out of it. And sometimes not even then. If they really realize it's a crisis situation, then sometimes that can be the trigger that pushes people out of that, the gravitational pull of deep seated conditioned habits.

So there's also a reluctance because these things are associated with the egoic sense of identity. There's also reluctance sometimes to abandon these habits because it's almost as if you were abandoning a part of yourself and people don't want to die. The ego doesn't want to die.

So often the ego is stuck in unhealthy habits, but it's become so much of their sense of self that they can't do anything about it and they don't want to. So all you can do is explain what it is that they are doing and what there's only that much that you can do for somebody else. You cannot force them to evolve.

You can only provide the triggers for their evolution. So, and there are humans who don't want to evolve. They're not ready yet.

It's like an apple that's on the tree and it might be close to getting ripe, but it doesn't, or it might be, it doesn't want to fall. It was just clinged. Or let's say another example, the caterpillar says, no, I don't want to become a butterfly.

I know who I am and I'm comfortable with who I am. Why do you want me to become a butterfly? I don't fly around in the air, I belong here.

And then it munches, this is where I belong. And no matter how much you talk to the caterpillar, you have to wait until finally the caterpillars, when it gets close to the transformation or metamorphosis, then the caterpillar experiences life becoming quite unpleasant. He cannot be a caterpillar anymore and he can't even crawl anymore and something is very wrong suddenly.

And it's only when life becomes totally unbearable for the caterpillar, then finally he gives in and says, okay, I can't stand this anymore. I'd rather be a butterfly. And so humans are a bit like that.

And some are ready. Some need more suffering before they are ready. That's the unfortunate truth.

And not all not necessarily physical suffering. It can also be self-generated mental and emotional suffering. Some people are not ready to give up their self-generated mental, emotional suffering.

They're just not ready. They may come to you and say, help me, help me. But when it comes to the moment where they could be free, as happened to me years ago when I was still working with individual people, I was pointing out to a lady who came who had a terrible irritation with her husband.

For years, the very presence of her husband caused intense irritation. And everything her husband said and did, everything, the way he moved, the way he sat, the way he ate his food, I can't stand him. And so I explained or attempted to explain these in the early stages of, before any books were written, the early stages of the teachings when I sometimes surprised myself when I gave answers, things I didn't know beforehand.

They just came. So I explained to her the mechanism behind the suffering and the possibility of, of course, she could leave him or she could discover that this is self-generated suffering and she could be free of that. And then suddenly she began to see it and she began to see the possibility of letting go of all that self-generated suffering.

And then she suddenly said, if I let go of it, what have I got left? So she was so identified with her suffering, it was like not only a close friend, the suffering was an essential part of, had become over the years an essential part of her sense of identity, of her sense of self. She did not want to let go.

And soon after she didn't want to come and see me anymore. So, but I do know that some of the things I said to her, later I put in the power of now. So she's in there somewhere.

And hopefully she lived long enough so that she could read the book and perhaps saw herself in there. And then perhaps at that stage, perhaps she was ready. We don't know.

We just have to accept some people are not yet ready, but do all you can not to force them to change, but to provide that to them that triggers, has to come from within them. The readiness to let go or to change has to come from within them. So how you do it will vary from person to person.

Use your intuition, go to the place of not knowing so that the intuitive, you can say helpful things that come from that deeper level that might make a difference to them. What that is, I cannot tell you because you can only know that you in that situation with that person. So go to the place of not knowing when you are with people, not continuously, but be there sometimes.

And then it's possible that what they need that can trigger an awakening, you might say to them or do to them, well, do, what would you do? Like be the Zen master and hit them sometimes, but you don't want to do that, but life does that if they don't change. Thanks.

Can you sue in court, suing court case, can you sue in court consciously over a breach of contract if you are not attached to the outcome or is one promoting conflict by doing this? So whether to sue or not to sue, that's the question. Well, on a practical level, I would do, well, also on a spiritual level, I would do everything possible to avoid suing, whatever you can.

There may be some cases where you cannot avoid it. And then your challenge will be, as the questioner mentions, not being attached to the outcome. And so how can you not be attached to the outcome?

Well, the only way is by being fully present in whatever action you need to take at this moment, go see the lawyer, talk to the lawyer, what are the possibilities? And all that implies in order not to be attached to the outcome, you need to be, you need to have one foot in the realm of being or presence where you're already fulfilled. This moment is actually fine as it is, whether or not you've win that case or not is not that important.

And whether you lose the, whatever you're fighting about, whether you lose the money or you don't lose the money is not as important as the mind tells you it is. The primary thing is, are you connected to the essence of who you are? If you're connected while you talk to the lawyer, can you be present talking to the lawyer?

Just the facts of it. This is that, that, that, what can we do? I suggest you do that, that, bring presence to it.

It's just that, and you're continuously just in the here and now. And once you go to court, you still, you sit there, present your case without the drama around it, or the huge amount of drama that people create around it.

[Speaker 12] (24:55 - 25:00)

Ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah.

[Speaker 1] (25:00 - 55:14)

And drama when they talk to others, drama in their head at night when they can't sleep. Ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah. That is unnecessary baggage.

So it can be a spiritual challenge too. If you absolutely have to go to court because somebody did something to you that needs to be rectified, then make it a spiritual practice. And otherwise you create a lot of karma for yourself and others.

Present moment, one step at a time, one thing at a time. This, this, this. It's the same thing as chopping wood carrying water, really.

Same, just one, yes. What do you think about Facebook? Is it a healthy format?

It seems a bit egoic. Not a whole lot of transmission of connection, love, et cetera. Posting pictures of yourself and quantifying friends, likes, et cetera, seems like enhancing the ego.

Are we going down the wrong path with social media? Well, the questioner has a point. As even before the advent of Facebook and similar things for hundreds of years or thousands of years, people constructed for themselves an identity in their head.

That's me, me and my story, as I sometimes call it. And that was partly inherited from what your culture tells you you are, or your family and your culture, and partly by choice, certain things you choose to identify with and then incorporate into your sense of self. Certain possessions, certain achievements, or the lack of certain possessions and achievements can all be incorporated.

They become mind forms or thought forms, which you identify with. So there's a mental image that forms, and that's the essence of ego, a mental image that's me. So that's been going on for a long time.

And then people live through that mental image of me. They seek out things or people that can improve the mental image of me and try to keep away things or people that could weaken or threaten the mental image of me. It all means not being in touch with who you are beyond any mental image, which is why we are here, to go deep into that.

And now we got the technology of Facebook where you can externalize the image and you can create on the Facebook page, you can create the image of me and show it to the whole world. And so many young people, and maybe not so young, I believe the oldest Facebook user, I saw a video clip in the States, the world's oldest Facebook user is 105 years old. And it is often used unconsciously in enhancing the image one has of oneself and the image one wants to show to the world.

And then you read other people's images on their Facebook page, and you think that's who they are. And then you try to compete with that image and you try to polish up your image and compete with them. Most people want to show off, it seems, I'm not that familiar with it, but most people want to show the good things.

I'm having this great meal, here's a picture of it. Why would anybody want to see what you're eating right now? But they do, it seems.

Or I just bought this thing, do you want to see it? And then you can connect people to a place where you bought it, it's another thing. And all kinds of things that I don't understand.

So you can, in many cases, it becomes an artificial construct that you add to every day and everybody else has their artificial construct. And it can actually strengthens the delusion of the false self. Doesn't have to, but often it does.

Facebook can also be used in conveying interesting information and to connect with people at a deeper level or bringing about some spiritual knowledge. So that's not impossible. I used to post occasionally things, I don't do it myself, but I would send it to Steve and he would post it.

But I haven't, I must admit, I haven't done it in a while. Although some things do get posted, quotes and so on, that's fine. Twitter is another one that is a, there's a Twitter message coming in.

The last time I tweeted was when a few months ago in February, the Oprah Channel in the States, I don't know if you can get it here, it's called the OWN Channel, Oprah Winfrey Network. They showed a repeat of our webinar that we did a few years ago that I did with Oprah. They did a slightly shortened edited version of a period of 10 weeks, 10 Sundays.

The new earth was shown again on this time, not on the internet, but well, also on the internet, but on TV on, and Oprah sometimes is an active tweeter. And she said, it would be great if we could tweet at the same time while this program is being shown. And so I said, okay, I'll see what I can do.

So I was on the phone with Steve while the program was running and then I was watching it. And then people sent in these questions and they have to be answered immediately. So I was attempting to dictate answers to Steve and his assistant to put in the answers.

And my mind was quite, well, I felt almost dizzy afterwards. And because I tried to watch the program and at the same time watch the incoming tweets and think of an answer. But Oprah must have realized it wasn't from me because she said, Twitter is the exact opposite of how you operate.

And before Oprah said it, Kim said exactly the same thing to me. And that's true. So I was glad when it was over, but while it was happening, I was surrendered to it.

Although I did feel dizzy afterwards. So if you can avoid constructing some pseudo identity for yourself on Facebook and be more real, then you can avoid that trap of just the Facebook amplifying the human ego, which it does in many, many cases, especially for youngsters who have no idea what they're doing. Based on your teachings, the real me is the presence in me.

Also, there is the fake self, the ego in me, too. Most of the time I follow the ego and rarely I become the presence. So what is in me that follows or chooses from the two?

Or is there a third thing in me that does the following or the choosing? Okay. I think I understand the question.

There's a presence in me, the real me. There's a fake self, the ego. Most of the time I follow the ego and rarely I become the presence.

So what is it in me that chooses from the two? Or is there a third thing that does the choosing? It's a little complicated, but, well, the answer is there's neither the third nor the second, but only the one, only the one, the one consciousness.

The one consciousness, and again, it's a little bit, when I speak of it, it's a little bit of an analogy. It's not quite like that, but it is like that, but not, it's not it. The ego is really, one could say, consciousness dreaming, a dreamlike state.

It's an identification with form, mental, physical form. And consciousness is dreaming the dream of form. And when presence arises, consciousness awakens out of the dream of form.

And you suddenly recognize who you are is not the physical form, and who you are is not the psychological form, you and your story. You and who you are is the presence. And that's the awakening of consciousness through the human form.

So it's just a, the ego state is just consciousness dreaming, and presence is the awakened consciousness, but it's only one consciousness. So many, many philosophers and spiritual teachers, not surprisingly, have compared ordinary human existence with a dreamlike state. And they have also used the terminology, the awakening terminology, to describe the state of stepping out of the dream.

You can, when you observe a very unconscious human being, you can actually experience at firsthand what it means to live in a dreamlike state, because there's no awareness in them apart from the conditioned mind and the reactive patterns of the conditioned mind. So they go, they're just totally conditioned, and there's no freedom, there's no choice possible because the awareness isn't there that makes choice possible. So observing, or you can even observe entire collective entities of humans who are very unconscious, like a huge crowd of humans.

And a crowd of humans very often means that every individual in that crowd of humans, even though they may already be relatively unconscious, they become even more unconscious when they are part of a crowd, of a collective. So a crowd can perpetrate violence that the individual member of the crowd may not. They may not be that unconscious, but the moment a massive number of individuals come together, the level of consciousness is pulled lower of each individual.

And then the crowd become capable of inflicting terrible suffering on other humans. And the crowd can even be an entire machinery of a state or a government. They can be overtaken by deep unconsciousness and then inflict terrible.

We were a few months ago in Cambodia where they had this insane regime 20 or 25 years ago. The leader was called Pol Pot and the regime was called the Khmer Rouge. And they killed close to 50% of the population of their own country, totally deluded.

And we visited the killing fields where they keep thousands of skulls of people that were exterminated for no particular reason, just because in some cases they were educated. In some cases, because they looked at people's hands. Do you work manually with your hands?

No colors on your hands? Kill them because you're an exploiter. You don't work, you're not a peasant.

You work manually. They had a weird theory of the only good people are those who are peasants who work on the land, exterminate everybody else. You wore glasses, immediately they would kill you because it means you could read.

And the people who came up with that were actually intellectuals. Pol Pot was quite intellectual, totally, totally deluded. And the whole country was in the grip of enormous unconsciousness.

So babies were killed. They were unspeakable. You go there, and the same of course happens, you can go to other places, Nazi concentration camps.

I don't believe you can visit the gulags in Russia yet, but they had similar things, labor camps, people, millions died. So the unconsciousness of a collective can be incredibly deep, far greater than the unconsciousness of the individuals that make up the collective. If you took an individual out of the collective, he would still be a relatively unconscious person, but many of them would not be capable of perpetrating those acts of violence that they perpetrated when they are part of the collective.

I don't know why I'm talking about this because the question is, is there a third thing in me that chooses? Is that still the question? There is no third thing, and there is no second thing.

Yes, that's it. The consciousness can be asleep, and when consciousness is asleep, it sometimes dreams a nightmare. Life becomes a nightmare, just as a human, and a human is asleep, sometimes your dreams turn into terrible nightmares.

And sometimes it's a nightmare that awakens you because you can't stand it anymore. It becomes so dreadful that you go, ah, ah, ah, ah. And that's a little bit applies to the collective too.

When it becomes so dreadful, sometimes it leads to some form of awakening. So I also mentioned looking at, when you look at a very unconscious human, I think you will see what I mean when I say they are dreaming. Also a human who is totally in their mind, they're not really present with anybody.

When you meet them, they go, you see that 90% of their attention is absorbed by thought processes continuously. They, bzzz. So they just have enough left for outside so that they don't bump into furniture.

So there's a little bit of attention left for the outside. They still know there's something there, there's something there, but they don't really see anything. They don't look at the sky ever or the trees.

It's just nothing because it's not connected to my self-interest. What does the sky do for me? What does a tree do for me?

Well, if I can cut it down and use it here, then that's good. So, and so their attention is absorbed by, and so they have this, you know there's nobody there or the person, the being that's there is so behind their veil of thinking that it's hard to find. And so there's just a, and sometimes there's an emotional level in addition to that.

And the emotional level may be looking for some kind of reaction from you. Sometimes people are in a state of latent anger all the time. There's some humans who have this latent anger, which means they're just waiting for an excuse to be angry again at something.

That's how their ego functions. So they look at you and they try to get some emotion from you or may say something to provoke something and they get frustrated if they don't get a reaction. So this is being totally in a dreamlike state.

Many of you are experiencing or have experienced the shift from drifting back into dreamlike identification with mind and emotion into awakening. And some of you probably still fall back into the dreamlike state from time to time. And you talk to yourself.

And then what, you know what he did? He did, he never apologized for what he, and then I said to him, and you know what he said? And then I said, how dare you?

And he said, and of course you are always right. You're always the one who says the thing that is absolutely right. And he never even acknowledged me.

No gratitude whatsoever, didn't show any gratitude. What's story after story, after story. I have always felt a deep connection with animals and nature.

I feel drawn to them. This connection seems to be absent with most human beings. Why is this?

And this is the case with quite a few people have that. They feel a stronger connection to an animal or nature than they do with other human beings. As somebody said to me not long ago, she said, she was quite honest with me.

She said, I cried more when my dog died than when my mother died. Oh, so why is it that many humans find a deeper connection with the animal? Simply because the animal is being, is not as far removed through development of the mind from being as humans are.

The animal is in deeper connectedness with the origin of life, the source of life, of God, being, not obstructed by the human mind. So when you look at a dog, the dog, you can immediately sense the beingness of the dog because the beingness of the dog is not obscured by mental concepts. The dog has no concepts about you.

The dog just looks at you. And in most cases, the tail wags and you feel good suddenly. And when you look at a human, often there's a veil of, already a veil of judgments and interpretations because the being of the human is veiled by the mind.

And with some humans more than with others. You can sometimes just look at a human and you can see how thick or how thin the veil of mind and emotions is. It's a mental, emotional veil.

And that's there. And in that veil, that veil, they judge you. They might be looking at you, but they're already judging you.

So you can't sense the being of that human as easily as you can in the dog because the dog has no opinion about you. Isn't that amazing? The dog can sense, of course, your energy, but it doesn't have an opinion about you.

And that's so liberating. And that is why if you meet, if you become somebody who is no longer compulsively judging others, which all implies that you are no longer completely identified with the mind, with the stream of thinking, you become a very likable person, a person that everybody wants to be with and stay with. And they don't know why.

But the reason is they can sense that they are not being judged. And when you don't judge another, that's the real liking. That's where immediately the goodwill is there.

The goodwill is your natural state. Your natural state gets obscured by the mind. At the moment that the space opens up, the goodwill is there.

And then people will love you in the same way they love a dog or more. You know the prayer, please, dog, let me be the person my dog thinks I am. Now, of course, the dog doesn't think.

That's why the dog loves you. So anything natural can be a great help in when you look at it or you approach it or you touch it, whether it's a dog or a tree or flower, has that rootedness in being still. I don't know whether that, when I say that, whether that means anything to you, but I think it does.

It can only mean something to you if you can sense your rootedness in being. Otherwise it will be meaningless words. So anything natural has still that rootedness in being.

And that is so beautiful because it reflects back to you your own being. And not only that, when you go into nature and you go around, ultimately what's happening, because ultimately you are not separate from the rest of the world. You only seem to be encapsulated in a body, but really you become the consciousness through which nature recognizes its own beauty.

So when you look at a flower and you go, oh, because there's ultimately no separation between you and the flower, the flower through you becomes conscious of its own beauty. And then nature loves you for that. That is almost every, it welcomes you.

Oh, because you can contribute something that they want and need. The natural things want and need the consciousness which the human brings. Because without the human consciousness, the world is in a kind of, it's a, there's a beauty there, but the beauty isn't recognized.

And then the human consciousness comes in and it recognizes the beauty. It acknowledges the beauty. And that's an enormous step forward.

It's almost, as I believe I might have written that somewhere, it's almost as if nature had been waiting for humans to arrive, not to cut down the trees, no, to bring consciousness to it. And when you bring consciousness, you can sense how deeply rooted in being everything natural is. And when you can sense how deeply rooted in being it is, you can no longer want to destroy it or use it for egoic purposes or profit.

Then you actually know that that is, that nature is sacred and needs to be treated with great respect. This isn't something that you can, it's not something you need to learn. I need to treat nature with respect.

No, it's that arises spontaneously from within you. So nature loves you if you fully become conscious of it and bring your consciousness to the beauty of nature. It's only at that moment that it becomes beautiful.

The tree doesn't know it's beautiful, it just is. What the consciousness of the tree is, we can't even fathom. There is a consciousness there, but it's quite very different from the human consciousness, but it wants also the human.

That's my intuitive insight. And dogs and cats, of course, are drawn to humans. They love human interaction.

So it's enormously beneficial for both, for the dog and the human, or the cat and the human, to be together.

[Speaker 6] (55:39 - 58:23)

Thanks for the opportunity. I wrote it down, but it's not a fashion question. Over a period of six months or so, sickness or illness saw my dog get gradually sicker and sicker to the point where he was in much, much pain.

The x-rays and pills and probing did not find a cause that was treatable. We had a family meeting and collectively, we decided to have the vet end his life to ease his pain by injection. And you made a comment about a lady who felt more grief when she lost her dog than when her mother died.

And although it sounds mean, I had the same uncontrolled times of tears for many weeks afterwards, the death of my little buddy. I've considered the notion of ego and suffering and pain when remembering my companion in the now. I feel that in the final moments, that I betrayed our companionship.

My wife points out that it was a collective family decision based on the love of our missing, or of our family, pup. I was little to be in Spaniel. So my question, how do I remove the ego side of not having my buddy or companion around, whilst not removing and dismissing the love I continue to hold for him?

I realize that he's physically gone, but like in a recent interview with a quantum scientist author, I wondered about the connection. I met a nice chap here who lost a partner and he said that your talks help. And of course, I'm not comparing that loss, but I'm hoping you might find, or might contemplate and give pointers again to perhaps how I can let go of the form and then still remember the love part without getting sadder and getting attached.

Yes. Hope that makes sense.

[Speaker 1] (58:23 - 1:00:10)

Yes, thank you. I understand. And the same question would apply also to if somebody close to you dies.

People who have not had a close connection with an animal like a dog may not understand you. Only people who have had that will understand that it can be as painful as losing a human. And we had the same experience when our dog passed away under similar circumstances.

And in the end, because she was suffering too much, we had to ask the vet to come and she died peacefully. And she had a wonderful life, was loved and gave love for nine years. And her consciousness, she was a female, benefited greatly from being together with us, with humans and with us in particular.

And we benefited from her unconditional, continuously loving presence. She loved almost everybody.

[Speaker 6] (1:00:13 - 1:00:14)

Same.

[Speaker 1] (1:00:14 - 1:08:14)

She loved almost every other dog or animal and almost every other human with very few exceptions. And whenever somebody, whether it's an animal that you are very close to or a human, the moment a person dies or an animal dies, you realize what you loved was not the physical form or the physical form may be beautiful and part of the loving experience. But the moment the life is gone, that which you loved is not there anymore.

Something inhabits the physical form that is the essence, the organizing principle, the intelligence, whatever you want to call it behind that keeps the molecules and atoms of the physical form together and organizes, holds them together. Science has not, doesn't know about that yet. It only life, it equates life with matter, but life is beyond that.

And ultimately life is consciousness. And the dog is an expression of the one consciousness, different from a human. The human is an expression of the one consciousness or any non-physical entity can only also be an expression of the one consciousness.

The one consciousness expressing itself at different levels of evolution, so it's like a, you could say a ray of sunlight. You are a ray of sunlight and I am, and the dog is, and the flower is, all consciousness incarnating in form. So that does not die.

The essence doesn't die. And the dog, it's not a dog. I mean, we think we know what we are talking about when we say a dog.

No, it is a being, an energy field, a being, an expression of the one consciousness. It's not, we think we know when we label things and call it something, we think we know what it is. We don't know what a dog is.

And just by calling it dog, it's still, it's just pseudo knowledge. We don't know what a human is. Just the fact that somebody has a name, we think you know what that is.

No, it's an unknown phenomenon. It's through the language gives us illusion that we know, but we don't really know. And so here you have the dog, this wonderful presence closed in matter temporarily.

And something happened because consciousness evolves throughout the universe and evolves in billions of ways and forms, in and through billions of ways and forms. It's a magnificent, ultimately totally incomprehensible miracle, totally incomprehensible to the human mind. But consciousness is engaged in this evolutionary process, the one consciousness.

And whatever suffers is the one consciousness. It's not a coincidence that there's a religion on this planet where the main image is a suffering God. Isn't that strange?

I mean, we have some explanation for it. We say, well, that was Jesus who died for this. Let go of that explanation and just remain with the fact that here the main image of that religion is a suffering, basically, or that you call son of God or God, doesn't matter, a suffering God.

And there's a deep significance to that. You don't have to be a Christian. In fact, if you're a Christian, you probably don't want to go there where I'm going now.

There's a deep significance there because this suffering God is everybody. It is the fundamental human archetype. It's the suffering that every human and every life form, but in this case, a human, he represents the human, that every life form goes through when this life form assumes the form of the material form, the seemingly separate material, physical vehicle, and is then defined in form.

There were ancient teachings. They are quite close to the truth that say that consciousness fell into matter as if it were a mistake. But I don't think, I think it's a good image to say that consciousness, there was a kind of fall of consciousness into matter, but it wasn't a mistake.

There is no, there are no mistakes in the universe. So, and if there is a mistake, it has a higher purpose for learning, and so it's not a mistake anymore. So that, for those years that you lived together, you both, your consciousness and the dog's consciousness, which are not really separate, although we just call them that, benefited greatly and grew, evolved through being together.

So it helped the dog and it helped you. It added something to your consciousness, that being together with that entity, with that being. And that is not lost.

I cannot tell you in what way this, that which animated that entity that we call dog continues on its journey back to the source, but it continues on its journey as you continue on it, not as a person, not as a personal identity that survives, but an underlying energy field, the underlying consciousness that gives rise to this form, of course, continues on its journey and ultimately is never separate from its source.

It just believes itself to be separate. So it's an evolutionary journey. It's not, and every form will eventually die.

The form dissolves. So you keep the love in your heart and that's how you stay connected with that being. And don't go to where the ego wants to take you.

That is, have some kind of recrimination that you shouldn't have allowed the dog to die and all that kind of egoic stuff. The ego loves to go there. Of course, you know very well that you did and the family did what you felt was the right choice and you did.

So don't allow the mind to take you that road.

[Speaker 13] (1:08:15 - 1:08:18)

Thank you very much.

[Speaker 6] (1:08:18 - 1:08:18)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (1:08:36 - 1:21:40)

Here's a person who has a somewhat more interesting challenge than chopping wood, carrying water. I have always felt like most people hate me, that they wished I wasn't there. I felt as if I repulsed them, that they were all talking together about me and that I must be a very bad person.

I felt enormous pain from this and it has caused a lot of problems in my relationships. Can you help me? I have always felt like most people hate me, that they wished I wasn't there.

I felt as if I was repulsed, as if I repulsed them, that they were all talking together about me. It's likely that that goes back to certain childhood experiences. On the whole, to anybody who feels that people don't like them, my question would be, do you like people?

And it is virtually impossible that if you like people, that they do not like you. There may be certain individuals that don't like you, but on the whole, if you, if, and again, we come back to the word, benevolence or goodwill, if there is an outflow from you towards others of a basic underlying benevolence or goodwill, even though you might have arguments with them or discussions or whatever, or have to tell them this or that, if there isn't basic, that underlying emanation of benevolence or goodwill, that basically then in simplified terminology, that would mean you like people. And if you like people, with a few exceptions that may happen here and there, you can't please everybody, and you're not liking people in order to please them, that's, we are not talking about that.

This is, we're talking about a true emanation of benevolence towards them, which you can only really do if you are sufficiently connected with the being within yourself. Then from there comes the outflow of benevolence because you recognize the same being or the same consciousness in the other. And that brings about the goodwill and benevolence that flows from you to the other.

And that then becomes, so you're not attempting to get these people to like you, that doesn't work, it has to be genuine. You can't say, I'm trying to like people, but they still don't like me. So it has to come at a true goodwill towards others, which is almost an energy that flows and that connects you with the other.

And no matter whether it's somebody that you know or somebody you meet briefly and casual encounter, and even there, it's important because these are all relationships and they all leave behind something in the other person. If you are rude to that person, that could be amplified in that person. If that person is already unstable, it could be amplified and then lead to further karmic action of that person towards somebody else.

And you can travel around the planet and become magnified. So there's enormous responsibility, really, if you see the repercussions of whatever behavior you manifest towards others are enormous. And it's easy to overlook that.

Whatever energy you put out does not stop there. It goes into another person and then it does what, if the other person, let's say you get angry with someone and then that energy resonates in the other and strengthens that vibration that was already there in the other and gets amplified in the next person, in the next, and then spreads. So that's all collective karma.

So when I say, if you like people, then you find that people generally, not in every case, generally like you. You cannot be liked by everybody. You have to, and especially if you become, if you write a book or something and then you expect everybody to like that book, then you're going to suffer because no matter what book you write, there will be 10% of people who say that's the worst thing they've ever read.

You can look at the, on anywhere on the internet or Amazon about people criticizing. If it's a book that has had large readership, there will be 10% who say dreadful, although 90% might say it's the greatest thing we've ever read. And those 10%, the number grows, the more people read it.

And suddenly you have 10,000 people who say it's awful. So you can't be liked or your, whatever you produce cannot be liked by everybody. But generally speaking, the energy that you put out comes back to you.

And that's the famous, I believe it's called the golden rule that was not voiced by Jesus and before Jesus by others. Whatever you do, don't, it can be phrased negatively. That was already Confucius.

Don't do to others what you don't want others to do to you or do unto others how you, treat others the way you want to be treated, basically. Treat others the way you want to be treated. So the energy you put out comes back to you.

If you like people, generally speaking, people like you. So this person has not discovered in herself the dimension of being and the fullness of life that is within. If she goes deeper within, it's only there she can become free of this conditioning that may go back to childhood and probably does, that not the feeling of not being liked by anybody.

And it is quite possible or probable that she was not liked as a child. So there was no love given to her as a child. So she experienced humans as unloving and as not liking her.

Once this pattern became lodged in her, it was very difficult to experience the world in any other way. And unfortunately, a conditioning of that kind actually becomes self-fulfilling because it generates its reflection in the other. If you are convinced that people don't like you, that becomes true in your experience.

So this is why the pattern reinforces itself every day. Every day this person encounters somebody, the pattern gets kind of acknowledged. You see, I knew it.

Nobody likes me. And again and again, because that's the underlying. So you need to become, I'm not saying you, I don't think this person probably is not here, but you need to become, you need to transcend this pattern and this belief that tells you people don't like me.

You need to become more present with every person you meet. And become still, even before you meet anybody, become still, become present, and sense the essence of who you are beyond the form, which is conscious presence. Then you are no longer a person.

You are a conscious presence. This person is still trapped in the image of me, the person, and not a likable person. It's a limiting image.

And then once there's a connection with that conscious presence, you can meet another person and you look into their eyes and you can feel the connection and you can feel a goodwill towards the other. You begin to like others. So you cannot not be liked, generally speaking, if you like other people, you become a likable person.

And if you don't like other people, you are not a likable person. But the liking, as I just said, goes deeper than just the superficial liking. And it can never be a means to an end.

You're not kind to somebody because you want to be liked. It's not really. So it's a really, it's a giving rather than expecting something from the other.

You give to the other the goodwill. You give to the other the benevolence rather than standing back and saying, how is he going to react towards me? Or what's his behavior towards me?

You become then a passive recipient and you're just waiting for your underlying patterns to be confirmed. And usually they are. Oh, you see, he doesn't like me.

Nobody likes me. So instead of that, you become the active agent rather than a passive agent waiting for the behavior of others towards you. And then all the behavior of others towards you does is confirm your patterns.

So instead, you bring the energy to the other. You approach the other. You give attention to the other.

This is already love. People love being given attention. Some suck it up.

They want to get, suck it out of you. It's a different thing. But people love being, if you give your fullest attention to another person, they show that they are really, oh, this person is really interested in me.

I love meeting people in hotels when they bring, there's a room service. It's always, it's an encounter. It lasts only two minutes, but it's an encounter of goodwill.

There's a human, primarily you're meeting a human being. Only secondary is the function of that human being is a waiter or a waitress or whatever. Temporary disguise, this human wears a temporary disguise of waiter.

It's meaningless, but there's a human being. You're meeting a human being. And are you valuing this human being as a human being or is it just a waiter to you?

But this could apply to anything, to any human. Is that human just a function that this human performs or is there something deeper in that human? And you always address the deeper human, not the function.

The function is on the surface, that's fine, but you're not meeting a waiter, you're meeting a being, a human being.

[Speaker 9] (1:21:59 - 1:22:14)

Hi. Hi. I don't know, I don't really know what to ask, but I know I need to ask.

Maybe there is no question.

[Speaker 1] (1:22:15 - 1:22:18)

How are you experiencing this retreat?

[Speaker 9] (1:22:23 - 1:23:07)

I think I'm really below thinking. Okay. And I fell very, very deep.

Yeah. And here it feels more safe. And sometimes it's, I feel a little bit of my, I can barely feel my feet again and sometimes my right hand.

But often when I try to feel more and more, it's like I try to catch it and then it's gone. Yeah. And I'm afraid that I will fall much deeper.

Then that I'm now.

[Speaker 1] (1:23:25 - 1:23:40)

How do you experience being here as you sit there, you listen, how do you feel about sitting here and listening, is that a pleasant experience?

[Speaker 9] (1:23:42 - 1:23:52)

I'm always like, I'm never really here. Okay. Always thinking and.

Okay. But I always think where is my mind? Right.

[Speaker 1] (1:23:54 - 1:27:29)

So I think you briefly mentioned body awareness. So we haven't spoken too much about it yet here a little bit. That is of course, especially for people who are very much in their head, it's a powerful anchor for being present in the now to feel the inner body.

And you can feel at least parts of the inner body. You can feel your hands as you sit there. Sometimes.

Sometimes. Okay. That's good enough.

It's a starting point and you can feel your hands and you can feel your feet as you sit here or stand there and then keep your attention there. And then the mind will take your attention away then bring your attention back. It's really very helpful for you.

The movement practice, you will be in one of the groups with Kim. Do you have any physical practice of any kind so far? No.

So for you to take up either Tai Chi, Qigong or yoga would be very helpful. You have to, you can try the three and choose the one that you resonate with. I have a feeling it'll be either Tai Chi or yoga.

You know Tai Chi is, Tai Chi is, I don't know if you're familiar with Tai Chi. Tai Chi is some of what Kim does incorporates Tai Chi. Tai Chi is slow bodily movement that originated in China thousands of years ago.

And this I feel would help you greatly to take your attention. You'll be forced to take your attention away from thinking and into your movements and into your body. It's not enough for you to sit here.

It's helpful. It sinks in more than you know, not only the words, but also the energy field of being here is helpful. And whether or not your mind knows that or not, the energy is going into you, but you do need a practice and it's not meditation for you, at least not yet, or maybe not at all.

Meditation is not for everybody and you can evolve without meditation. I'm talking about this formal meditation. It's a wonderful thing for many people, but not for everybody.

But movement meditation would be absolutely what you need. So you need to explore where you live, whether any good teachers or places where you can take that up. I highly recommend, and my feeling is it's probably going to be Tai Chi, but you may also try yoga.

And don't believe your mind when it says, no, well, there's not really any point. I don't know if I'm going to do that. You have to do it.

[Speaker 9] (1:27:36 - 1:27:39)

Where are you from?

[Speaker 9] (1:27:49 - 1:27:50)

Austria.

[Speaker 1] (1:27:51 - 1:27:54)

Okay. Austria. I'll be in Europe next year.

If I'm near Austria, I hope to see you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (1:28:27 - 2:15:38)

Well, welcome to our live meditation or meditative talk and a special welcome to all of you who are joining us today through the Huffington Post. There may be quite a few newcomers to meditation or mindfulness as it's often called. So let's start with some very basic things.

The first thing is to enter that meditative state of consciousness because that's what it is all about. Meditation is about a shift in consciousness away from concern with doing and thinking and becoming aware, really directly aware of the present moment. And that's perhaps the easiest and most accessible starting point for most people to enter the state of presence, which is the aim of meditation is to get you into that state of absolute presence in this moment.

And that's being, becoming aware of being. Most people are always engaged in doing. That includes thinking continuously.

And a lot of the thinking that people do is not very uplifting. A lot of the thinking that happens compulsively creates negative feelings. And a lot of the thinking is actually harmful and dysfunctional.

It doesn't serve any useful purpose, but you just can't stop it. Well, you think you can't, but you can. And that's of course what meditation is about, to realize there is in you a deeper dimension of consciousness, deeper or higher, you could call it, depending from where you look at it, deeper or higher than thinking.

And that is the state of presence in the now. So it's an amazing realization for most people that they can actually easily access that state of presence by bringing their attention into the present moment, like now. So I'm kind of, although I'm talking, my aim is to talk you, so to speak, into that state of meditation.

And it helps if while I talk, you can become conscious or aware of the small gaps between words as I talk. So you're just aware, not only of the words, of course you hear the words, you take them in, but you're also aware that there are little spaces between the words. You just acknowledge that.

These are little meditative gaps, so to speak. And in order to be really aware of the meditative gaps, you can't be thinking. You are just aware of that space.

There is, what does that mean, aware? There is a presence in that awareness. You know in that awareness, like now, you know that you are here as a conscious presence without any thought telling you that.

And in other words, you become aware of yourself, not as a person, because to be a person, you need to be thinking about you and your life and your problems and so on. But there's a deeper dimension in you, deeper than the person. And this is what we are here to access.

So you become aware that really on the surface of your life, there is the person with a past and a future and all the thinking and the emotions that keep the person going, of course. And so you're happy one day, unhappy the next. Happy one day, unhappy.

The fluctuations of the person, it's quite normal. And the person is always concerned with doing and thinking and the next thing or the past, the future. The past is never really present.

When you become present, like now, you realize that there is a deeper part in you. There is a deeper dimension to who you are. Where you are more than a person, where you are a presence, a conscious presence.

The question is, can you sense, feel, or be aware of yourself at this moment as a conscious presence, without which there couldn't even be a person? So it's almost like saying, the person is the surface of the ocean or the ripples or the waves on the surface of the ocean, but you are not just the ripples or waves on the surface of the ocean, you are the ocean. So there's a deeper presence in you.

And to access that and to sense that in yourself, to sense yourself as the presence, a presence, that is what liberates you from being completely trapped and limited in an exclusively personal identity. In other words, there is more to you than meets the eye. You are deeper than you ever knew by thinking about yourself.

And it's not difficult to access that dimension in yourself. Can one describe it? Well, one can give a few pointers.

Let's see if that makes sense. The pointers I'm giving you now, let's see if they make sense in your own experience at this moment, sensing yourself as a presence. There is a peacefulness there.

There is a, that is really the essence of what is sometimes called inner peace. The person, the surface of the ocean, the waves and the ripples of the ocean cannot be at peace for long, it fluctuates. Occasionally if things happen to go well, yeah, I'm happy, it never lasts for very long.

And then the storm comes and big waves come or little, little irritated waves, whatever. Then you're unhappy, but there's a deeper, if let's say you are a ripple on the surface of the ocean with a name and a date of birth and a past and a future and problems. And suddenly the ripple realizes there's more to me and realizes, oh, I'm actually much deeper and faster.

I'm the ocean manifesting as the ripple. And so you are the universe or the consciousness that underlies the sense-perceived universe manifesting temporarily as a person. You are the universe becoming conscious of itself at this moment in your life as a person.

You are not separate from the totality of the universe. You are the universe. The universe has, or the consciousness that underlies the universe has given form to who you are temporarily in order to experience itself as a person.

It's an amazing thing. And the universe here is in the process of becoming more conscious. That's what the entire evolution of the universe is about.

It's consciousness. So you, your life is part of the evolutionary impulse towards greater consciousness. And if your life is not primarily about greater consciousness, which actually you can build into whatever you do, it doesn't mean you stop doing it, just say, all I'm interested in is consciousness.

No, it needs to flow into what you do. If that, if your life purpose is not aligned with the conscious, the evolving consciousness of the universe, then what is the point of it all? And then sooner or later, you get very frustrated and things become pointless.

So you are here to become more conscious because that's what the universe has put you here for. Instead of universe, you can use other terms. You're more comfortable with them.

The universal intelligence, God. So right now, in addition to being a person, which right now is not important, it becomes important again when we finish our meditation, I'm sure. But right now, something else is more important.

That's realizing yourself as the presence. Coming into the present moment and feeling, just being aware right now that you are conscious. If you were not conscious, you wouldn't be able to hear, see, perceive anything.

The fact that you can perceive things, the fact that you can think, the fact that you can have emotions, all implies that you are conscious. The meditative state is becoming aware directly of that consciousness. Sometimes the word that is used also is stillness.

Right now, you become still. You become aware of just being, of being that presence and that feels energizing. You don't go to sleep.

You're actually alert and still at the same time. And now you access an intelligence that is deeper than the thinking mind by entering that state of alert presence. And then when you think again, you are connected with a, with the source of all intelligence, with creativity.

You are, you become empowered. Your thinking and your doing and your actions are then aligned with a deeper purpose of the universe, not just little egoic desires. So all this is so terribly important.

Aligning your life with that presence. So you need to, during your normal day, I'll give you a few hints of how to invite that presence into your life, which by invite, I mean, direct your attention to it because it's always there. That really is what supports you in life.

And if you can be aware of that, fear, anxiety, happen less and less in your life because you can feel supported by that vast presence, which is not just your, it's not your own presence. It is the universal presence of consciousness. You connect with that.

You are that. So on a day, normal day, you go to work or whatever you do, as much as you can, become aware of just brief moments of yourself as the presence in addition to being a person. So one of the things I recommend is, it sounds almost too simple, but from time to time, look at the sky for a few seconds.

You look up, it doesn't matter whether it's blue or cloudy. Today here is the early afternoon, happens to be a sunny day. Look at the sky for a moment.

You're looking, but not thinking. You could do that with anything, but the sky is easier because there's this vast expanse that has some correlation with the presence of stillness within you. So you look, and for a moment, there's just, there's the sky, and you can sense yourself as the presence that is perceiving, and you're not thinking.

So there's a brief moment of not thinking, but not going to sleep. Alertness without thinking, that's the key. To bring that into your life more often.

And don't believe when your mind tells you that you need to think and think and think all the time. Bring in gaps of just alert presence. That's the being.

The rest is the doing. The two need to be, there needs to be a balance in your life between being and doing, otherwise you go mad. A civilization that completely loses touch with the being dimension is going to self-destruct.

And a person who completely loses touch with the being dimension is going to be very unhappy, unfulfilled, always anxious or depressed, or always stressed. What does, some, many people live in continuous stress. What does that mean?

They're always focused on the next thing, and the next thing pulls them away from where they are here and now. And always there's the promise, when I reach that point, I'll be okay. But of course, the reaching that point is always very brief.

And then they realize, oh, I'm not okay. I need to reach another point. It's a great thing, of course, to have goals in life.

But if the goal takes up so much of your attention continuously, where you need to get to, that you continuously miss the present moment, which after all is all there ever is, then your life is completely out of balance. The balance is, yes, having goals. You know where you're going.

That's good. But you are aware of the step you're taking at this moment. And you're aware of the flowers, the sky, the trees, life that continuously unfolds around you.

You acknowledge, you honor the present moment. And on a deeper level, you are aware of yourself as the presence. So I also recommend that during your normal day, you become familiar with perceiving things that are around you.

Without thinking, you need to judge or label or interpret them or name them all the time. So for example, you can look at a tree or the sky or anything, a piece of furniture, an animal, without naming it. You're just, this is a lovely practice.

You can do it right now because you're looking at me. Well, to you, I am an image on the screen and the words that you're hearing. You can look at this image on the screen, me, without saying anything mentally about it.

What for? You can actually perceive it better, more clearly, without the interference of thinking. So you're just there as the alert presence in the background of your perceptions.

Like now, you're looking at me and you're aware of yourself, which is more important than me. You're aware of yourself as that, which makes the perception possible. Presence, conscious presence.

And the same thing you can do, looking at anything. You look at a chair, a table for a few seconds and you're not labeling it mentally. You're not interpreting it, just clear perception.

So then there are two dimensions to the sense perception. There's whatever is being perceived by the senses, hearing, seeing, perhaps touching, whatever. And the presence behind it, which is a deeper dimension of who you are.

And so in that way, you bypass the person when you perceive things. You can bypass the person because the person interprets according to his or her conditioning. But if you want to get, if you want to transcend the conditioning of your mind, you can perceive without interpretation unless an interpretation is necessary.

So you bring, if people may ask you something, then you have to speak, or sometimes things will come. That's fine, thoughts come. You cannot be totally free of labeling and interpreting and you need it sometimes.

Sometimes you need to figure things out. At other times, trying to figure something out adds nothing to the experience. It detracts from the experience.

So be aware also of beauty around you. And the more present you are perceiving in this clear, nonjudgmental way, the more you will see beauty and aliveness around you that before you had ignored because you were always going somewhere else or your attention was so absorbed by thinking that you were only sufficiently aware, peripherally aware of your surroundings, just preventing you from bumping into things, but otherwise totally in your head, thinking about your problems.

So you get out of that into presence and so the balance comes into your life. So make it a practice to perceive things in that state of alert presence. And another little, very helpful, I don't want to call it technique, but let's, perhaps it is a kind of technique to enable you to be present is, as I call it, to feel the aliveness inside your body.

That sounds perhaps a little strange if you are not, you haven't heard this before. What do you mean, feel the aliveness in your body? Well, for those of you who have not had a glimpse of that yet, I suggest the following little practice right now.

If you hold your, let's say your right or your left hand, just hold it and close your eyes for a moment. And so your hand is kind of just floating there. Close your eyes for a moment and ask yourself, without opening my eyes, without moving my hand and without touching anything, is there any way I can know whether my right hand is still there?

So you're not moving your hand, you're not touching anything. You're not looking at it because your eyes are closed. Is there any way you can know whether, it's a weird question, it's true, but it gets you somewhere.

Is there any way you can know whether your right hand is still there? How can you know that without looking or moving your hand or touching anything? Okay, let's see now.

Is your right hand still there? And now you will notice, you can feel it. You can feel it, you can feel its presence from the inside.

At first it's very subtle, and then you feel it more strongly. And if you now open your eyes, you will notice that you can still feel your right hand, even though other perceptions have come in, you're looking again. But even as you're looking, you can still feel the aliveness inside your hand.

That takes some of your attention away from continuous thinking. And that, I would now recommend that you expand that a little. And even without closing your eyes now, see if you can feel the energy in both your hands at the same time.

Or if you like, close your eyes for a few seconds. And then you might notice it gets a little stronger, that feeling. Undoubtedly, your hands are alive.

There is an aliveness in there. Of course there is, because that's what keeps the body going. If that aliveness leaves, the molecules and atoms that make up your hand would very quickly depart.

They would not be together anymore, and that would be the end of your body. So what holds your body together, there is an energy there that is the organizing principle behind the physical form of the body. It's invisible.

And scientists haven't found it yet. Because the only way you can find it is by not by looking outside, but by introspection, by looking within. So you can sense the energy in your hands.

That's okay, that's good. And that takes some of your attention away from thinking. It brings you a little bit more into the present moment.

And then you might want to experiment, see if, well, if I can feel my hands, perhaps I can also feel the energy in my feet. So your attention goes, you direct your attention there. It goes there.

Are my feet still there? Yes, perhaps not as strong a feeling as the hands, but yes, you can feel your feet too. So initially you can just play around with that a little bit and feel, hold that attention for a couple of minutes in your feet and your hands, and see if you can feel your feet and your hands simultaneously, like, hmm.

And it's quite pleasant. And you may notice right now, as you're aware of the energy in your feet and your hands, and you keep your attention there, there isn't that much attention left for thinking. So this is where the state of alert presence opens up.

And then you may notice a little bit the rest of the body. Also, you begin to feel, not as strongly as the hands or feet, but you begin to feel that a sense of aliveness pervades your entire body. And that is a lovely meditation in itself.

A wonderful time to practice it, for example, is at night, before going to sleep, you lie on your bed, on your back, stretch out your hands flat on your back. And instead of thinking about your problems or about all the obnoxious people in your life, you take your attention into the energy field of the body and feel the aliveness. You always usually start with the hands, then gradually bring in other parts, the arms.

And as I speak now, I hope that you can verify in your own experience right now what it is I'm talking about, which is feeling the aliveness in your body. That is an, and then at night you can do it beautifully and actually enjoy feeling alive. It is joyful to feel that your body is being pervaded by this energy, which is not separate from who you are, which is who you are, which is consciousness.

The organizing principle behind the hundreds and thousands of functions that keep the body alive, that need to be coordinated every second, that is of such vast complexity that even now with all the advances we've made in science, we only understand a tiny fraction of how the body actually works. There is an expression of vast intelligence behind it. That is the organizing principle behind the body.

And so to get in touch with that deeper intelligence is a wonderful thing. And then you realize when you enter the state of presence, you become present with your entire body. Every cell feels more alive and you become still.

You might've noticed that when you really feel the inner body, as I call it, you're not thinking anymore. You're just present. And the more you access being just present, it's almost paradoxical, the more effective, creative, powerful your thinking becomes when you do think.

And the less negative and destructive, self-destructive your thinking becomes. So we are talking about finding the intelligence, the deeper intelligence within you. You don't want to always having to go to some other source for the really important answers in your life.

Please tell me I need to know this or that. Yes, it's good to want to know. That's part of the evolution, the evolutionary impulse.

But any spiritual teacher, whether the spiritual teacher is in the physical form or you have some other teacher as a spirit guide or whatever it is, any true teacher will teach you, show you, demonstrate how to access the source of all knowledge and wisdom in yourself. So that's what this evolution is about. Let's see if you can still feel yourself right now as that alive presence.

Your entire body is this being. And it's not a question of necessarily either being or doing although sometimes it's good to just be. But also even while you do, you can be aware of being.

For example, you're driving, you're stopping at the lights. What is there to do now? Nothing, no matter how much you think that you want to be somewhere else, you're not.

Why not use that opportunity whenever there's a red light and you stop your car if you drive, or if you're a pedestrian, you stop at the stand, you stop walking at the light. Use that, those moments or that one moment and feel the aliveness in your body and feel the presence. Whenever you're waiting for something, and it's amazing how much time we actually spend waiting.

Oh, but I read the other day that they figured out in the average person's life who drives from between the age of 20 and 70 or whatever, that person spends several days of his or her life waiting in the car at the red light. If you add it all up, it makes up several days of this person's life. Mm-hmm.

And then you have many other occasions when you wait, you wait for the elevator. Why not use all these waiting times? You wait in line at the supermarket, you wait in line at the airport.

Instead of complaining in your head that you would rather not be waiting or how inefficient these people are, and this creates negative emotion, doesn't make your life more pleasant. Instead of that, just be aware of the aliveness in your body and bring your attention into just this moment. Be comfortable with this moment.

You feel alive inside and you can even, you can look around at the aliveness outside people doing this, doing that, traffic moving there, moving there. And you can actually enjoy the world. It's miraculous.

All these life forms that continuously appear and dance their dance for a little while to be replaced by other life forms. But it's all the expression of one underlying consciousness, one life taking on many forms. But your true identity is that one life.

Life is one. But there's no need to believe that because then it's only just another belief, which you can say, oh no, somebody else. It's not one, okay?

So it's not a belief. When you get still and present without losing alertness, in fact, gaining more alertness, then you are in touch with the oneness, the one. And that is the source of all life that has form because that is formless.

What you call that one life is up to you. Universal intelligence, the one, God, or as the Buddha called it, emptiness, which really means formlessness. That's what the Buddha pointed to as the essence.

Or as Jesus called it, the kingdom of heaven. It's the same as Buddhist term, emptiness. Heaven is vast spaciousness.

In many languages, heaven and sky are the same word. Vast spaciousness, formless, one life. That's who you are.

So it's really, this is all about knowing yourself. That's the journey you are on. It's the journey to yourself.

It's a journey without distance. And I thank you for joining us and I wish you well on your journey. It's a wonderful adventure.

Thank you.

[Speaker 2] (2:16:19 - 3:12:12)

The secret of dropping into this moment is really allowing this moment to be as it is. As Eckhart would say, and in the words of this person sitting here, it's really resist nothing, resist absolutely nothing. So whatever arises, you surrender to.

Even if there's resistance, you surrender to the resistance, allowing it to be here fully and completely. And what does that mean? What does that look like?

That means, say for example, if the pain body comes up, surrendering, accepting it, resisting nothing of what arises physically, mentally. But what it means is that you accept it so much so that you are willing to feel it and be with it forever. Because the moment that you have even the slightest bit of, I want it to go away, you're not allowing it to be as it is.

You're not accepting it. That slightest bit. And we all know that when that slightest bit comes, it's like, oh no, I want it to be different.

No, I want it to change. Oh no, please. Okay, I'll accept it, I'll accept it, I'll accept it.

But oh no. It's letting go of time completely, a future of past and fully being here in this moment. Just as it is.

Pain body and all. Or even physical pain. Or even emotional.

Any emotion. Sadness, grief, anger, doesn't matter. Just allowing it to be.

Being this space because you are that space. But the moment that you begin to resist what arises in that space, we've become identified with that form of whatever is arising. So by allowing it to be as it is, it's like we separate ourselves from the form.

Realizing that this space in which the form arises, this space is who we are. And all we are is that witness to what arises. But of course, it's more than just witnessing.

Because we are feeling human beings, we have to feel what arises. And feel it completely. Non-resistant to the present moment.

Demanding nothing. Accepting everything just as it is. And the moment that you accept it, it's like the space opens up.

And you can sense into that stillness. The stillness of who you really are. And realize, ah, okay, this is pretty cool.

I am this space. And all this, the form, the play of consciousness, is really nothing at all. It's not that important.

What's important is that we are this space. That recognition of that space. Then we don't lose consciousness.

In other words, become unconscious, identified with whatever is arising, thought, emotion, opinion, judgment. And believing that that is real. Of course, the miracles, their introduction, where it says, nothing real can be threatened.

Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God. So it's not about getting rid of what's out here, what's playing.

It's about sensing into and realizing that you are the space in which the play happens. And then when that happens, it's like, you recognize, it's like the two become one. And not forgetting that you are the space, even though the play is all dancing around.

There's ups and downs and all forms being impermanent. And recognizing the impermanence of form. And that, then nothing becomes a real problem.

It doesn't mean that you won't ever feel emotions. You will. And that's all part of it.

Part of the play. But there isn't that resistance to the emotion. And here in the West, it's strongly ingrained in us that emotions are somehow not so good.

Eckhart and I will kind of quite often joke, because I'm this Asian woman. Lots of emotion, fire, you know. And when you hear Chinese people talk and they're speaking in their native language, and it looks like they're yelling at each other.

I mean, seriously, it does. It looks like they're yelling at each other. And Eckhart would say, well, actually, you know what they're saying?

They're saying, I love you, I love you, I love you. And you know, but here, you know, we're more conservative, more, you know. So it's actually quite interesting because I was born in Canada in this Asian body with the Asian cultural ancestry.

And even though I was born in Canada, I could still feel very, very much Asian and Chinese in the way that I just interact. And it's interesting because when I was younger, I felt like, because in Vancouver where I grew up, I think at that time, there were only maybe like three Chinese families at our school. So I was one of those kids who went through a lot of suffering and was teased a lot, get teased even walking home from school and such, to the point where I just said, I don't wanna be Chinese anymore.

And I stopped talking Chinese. I just stopped. I didn't wanna do it.

And none of us kids, I come from a family of four siblings, and it's interesting, but all of us went through the same thing. We all decided at a very young age to stop. And it's like, wow, you know, now that I'm older and it's like, wow, I can't even speak to my mother.

My mother was born in China and she was, and she speaks Chinese. In fact, she speaks very little English. That's how come we got along so well when growing up.

We couldn't talk to each other, we couldn't fight. We couldn't understand each other. But what I'm pointing to is that all of us, no matter where we have come from, we have somehow came to this point where all of us, for some reason or another, decided that we can't really be.

I mean, yes, it may be some part of cultural conditioning and the way that expressions come out, but we've all learned to somehow kind of hide ourselves. And we've all reaching that point where it's like, I can't hide myself any longer. Now, I don't mean the self as in the egoic sense of self.

But I mean our true self, the true identity of who we really are, which is really no identity at all. No identification with who we think we are, because we are not any thought. I am not Chinese.

Even though quite often, many people may look, and this is what happens, is that we begin to place labels. We become so identified with the thought process, with words, labels, that we actually can't see past them. Which the first lesson in the Course in Miracles is being able to look around the room or look wherever you are outside your window, and you look at things and you say, this table does not mean anything.

This room does not mean anything. And see how we label things and begin to view our perception through this filter of labels, of judgments, of ideas, opinions, whatever they are. And that's how we see it.

So when I was younger and being teased, that's all that people could see. And we even do this probably daily, especially if you've been married for a long time. You may come to your partner and you're viewing them through all the experiences that you've had with your partner, all maybe the hurts, all the ups and downs, and you no longer see the being that he or she is.

Yes. And we do this all the time, and it's beginning then to recognize when we do that. Can we let it go?

Can we just drop the veil? Drop all thoughts. I mean, thoughts are useful.

They bring in a form of communication, but that's all it is. It's a pointer. Can we let go of every thought and see that it's not real?

No thought can possibly be real. The only reason why you can understand me is because we have agreed that certain sounds make up a meaning. See how we give it meaning?

If you were in another country, you wouldn't understand at all. One of the best talks that I have been to with Eckhart was in Germany, the very first time we went to Germany, and he didn't think he could do a talk in German, although he spoke Deutsch. He didn't think he could use words to, like consciousness and all that sort of stuff in German.

So they had a translator to translate, and he did one talk, but it really felt like it just wasn't working. Translation wasn't working, because you know when Eckhart gets on a roll, I mean, he can get on a roll and it's hard to stop. When he stops, it's like the flow stops, the energy stops, so the second talk, which would have been a three-hour talk, he says, I have to do it in English.

I think enough German people understand English, and I'm just gonna have to do it in English. I can't have the translation. So anyway, so he started the talk off speaking German just to tell them that he was going to do the talk in English.

There was not gonna be any translation. So anyways, 20 minutes into the talk, he realized, I'm still talking German. So I'm gonna continue speaking German until I just can't do it anymore.

He did a three-hour talk in German, and at first I was like, oh boy, I'm disappointed. Like I can't understand anything, but then there's that surrender that happened, and all I can do is just be still. And I realized, I thought, oh my gosh, how often I've sat there listening to him, listening to the words, when really I just needed to listen and be in that stillness, listen to the space, the silence between the words.

It's just like in music. Music is half sound and half silence, and that's what makes it so great is that stillness. Well, that was the best talk I had ever been to.

Really, sincerely, just feeling that stillness. I walked out of there so high. It was just like, wow, okay, you can speak any language you want.

It doesn't matter. And we do this even in our everyday lives. We will put more of our attention, in fact, 100% of our attention on words, on what the other person is saying, or what is externally happening outside, or even in our thinking.

It doesn't even have to be coming at us, the words. We can be thinking it. 100% of our attention goes outward.

When really, if we could just take a breath and tap into that source of who we are, that stillness, which is always right there, and that was the great discovery for me in that talk was that, wow, that stillness, it's always here, but my attention with the form of this moment, how much attention I give to the form is what covers that stillness up. So can we then practice keeping some of our attention on that still, small place within as we go about our daily lives? And trust that if there's really anything important that's happening out there, you'll end up giving more attention to it, but really, most of it, probably, I don't know, 97% of it, I mean, I've heard that 97% of all humans are dysfunctional, so I guess it must be 97% of everything out there must be pretty well dysfunctional, so why give it all of our attention and place our importance out there and forget about who we are in here and that this is the most important, that vital connection, that communion with the divine essence of who we are, and then when that connection happens, then perhaps the outer world begins to change, because we have changed, and I don't mean changed in the sense of stillness change, but that who we think we are dissolves into the nothingness, the nothingness of who we are.

Then absolute stillness remains, and then our perception of the world shifts, changes, and when we begin to look out there or hear and listen to what is out there, we also begin to perceive and listen to the space, to see the space. So we begin to see through what we've given meaning to, what we've labeled, so it's like seeing through the person. You're saying, I feel like he sees right through me.

He's seen beyond the person. So then we begin to play in this world, yes, in this form, yes, with our cultural conditioning, which is fine. It's not a problem.

It only becomes a problem when you become truly identified with it and you believe that it's true about yourself or true about the other person, and then the beauty of the uniqueness of the form shines through. So we have all different colors popping up, just like the flowers and the human beings, and you go, wow, isn't that beautiful? Instead of, well, that's different.

I'm not so sure, so I'm a little frightened about that. But we begin to interact, seeing past the meaning and into the light of consciousness, of who we are. I am no different than you are, and you are no different than I am at the deepest level.

Only in the world of form are we different, and that's what is so beautiful as well. If we didn't have any mirrors to see ourselves in, we wouldn't be able to see our own face, but what I see is your face, and I would think that you are me. So resist nothing.

Feel everything completely, demanding nothing to be different than what is here now. Because quite often, it's really not so bad out there. It's more in here that makes it bad.

Nothing is neither good or bad, but thinking makes it so. So wherever and whatever you are feeling in this moment, you feel, you fully accept. And we'll do a little meditation of resist nothing.

The new CD that's out by Sounds True, and it's called Resist Nothing, and on that are several different meditations just to assist you, help you just to be present with whatever is that's going on for you in your life, situation, and we all have something going on sometime or another. And what's interesting is that after I, did this CD, my life has been pretty kind of even, not much up, not much down. There's some like this.

And it's easy to kind of be with something that goes like this, isn't it? It's quite easy. Oh, I could ride this wave.

It's quite easy. Very, and then suddenly, it was just like right after the CD, it was just like something just peaked, and it's like, whoa, my rollercoaster went right up. And it's like, wow, okay.

All right, I can do this. But it gave me another appreciation that, wow, when the rollercoaster is really high, so when things, something that happens in your life to bring up, to intensify that emotion or intensify whatever is going on that brings about some emotions, to really have to be with that, I began to appreciate, again, just how challenging it can be just to be present with something that is so intense and not expect it to dissolve so quickly. So if you listen to that CD, there's this thing where I say, and it can still happen. Believe me, it still can, because I have done this, was that oftentimes, if emotion is felt fully and completely, it can dissolve in 30 seconds.

And, you know, it was pretty good. I was getting pretty good at that until. That something happened where I had to really begin to say, okay, wow, wow, okay, I've got to, this is not taking 30 seconds.

I've got to be with this more and longer for whatever reason, and without going into the head about it, about why is this not changing, because as soon as I did that, realizing that, wow, okay, no, I have to listen to my own teaching and accept this moment fully, like as if I were going to experience this for eternity. And that's the moment that it begins to dissolve or change in that full acceptance. So when you do that, you just, something arises, step back just for a moment.

Close your eyes if you wish, and just drop into whatever it is that you feel. In this moment, you can try it now. Now, just observing, feeling what it is that you are feeling.

Take a breath into your body, into the sensations. Become aware of your breathing. Become aware of the sensations.

Just notice how you are feeling, and perhaps a label comes up of what you're feeling. Agitation, sadness, happiness. The label isn't so important.

So once the label arises, you just let that go and just feel, resisting nothing. Notice how you're holding your body. Are you holding?

Can you relax? If thoughts arise, just notice and let them go. Don't give any meaning to what is arising, to what is in you, but simply feel.

What does this emotion feel like? Be with the sensation of the emotion. Be with the sensation of this moment.

Judge nothing, labeling nothing, giving meaning to nothing. So no meaning to anything. Simply be, experience this moment.

And once you feel, experience what it is that you are feeling, sense into that space, the stillness in which the sensations arise, in which the thoughts arise. Just watching, feeling. There's nothing to do, nothing to get, but simply be, resisting nothing.

And if you notice that there's resistance there, then you be with that, dropping the label of resistance and feel the sensation. What does resistance feel like? What does it do to my body?

Brings tension and contraction. Can I even be with that tension and contraction? And the moment that's fully accepted, something in you shifts.

For all forms are impermanent. Breathing, neither running to or running away from what is, but simply be with what is. Any movement towards it, any movement away from it is resistance.

Can you feel that space? Can you feel that emotion, that sensation? The two are really inseparable, but only one is real.

If you're wondering how long this meditation is gonna go on for, you're in your thinking mind. If you're wondering how long you're gonna feel this sensation or feel an emotion, you're in your thinking mind. To be fully present in this moment requires the acceptance of whatever it is that shows up for you in this moment.

Neither past or future are real. What's real? What's real?

And tapping into that stillness, staying with that stillness, when you're ready, you can gently open your eyes, yet keeping some attention inward. And with that attention inward, and yet the outer form exists, is the true union, the true marriage, where the two become one. So the marriage is not out there between people.

It's between you as the form and God as that inner stillness within. That's the true marriage. That's the true merging.

So then we move about the world as this one singular movement. We have form and we have the stillness together in this world. And then we can dance this way.

In the dance, it's much more fluid, flowing. And still, we bring stillness then into this world. Rather than the separation, the separation is forgetting about the stillness.

It no longer exists, and all you are is this thinking entity, a body and mind. Instead of the trinity of bringing in that stillness. So then we live in this world and not be of this world.

As you can imagine Christ on the cross, and the world is the horizontal plane. And yet the connection is the divine essence of who you are, is the vertical dimension of that cross. And here you are in this world.

We're hidden there, all right? We can't go anywhere. I mean, we're in this body.

The temple, the church is your body. And we are the body of Christ. Christ consciousness, the divine consciousness.

So our connection still is that, is here, vertically. And yet we are in this world. Yes, pinned there on the cross.

Can't go anywhere. No way out. Can't.

Absolutely no way out. But then is there a way out? And that is through the dimension of Christ consciousness.

Of your connection, your marriage, your communion with the stillness within you. God is not outside, but God is within. It's the only place.

So it doesn't matter about these temples and churches. Yes, they're beautiful. And yes, there could be a space, which that's all it is, is a space to go so where you can go and commune.

But really, that space, if all those churches and temples were just blown to bits, all you have is yourself, which you are the temple. You are the body of Christ. And we embody Christ.

Or we're gonna embody the ego. You cannot have both. You cannot serve two gods.

God the Father or the God of the world. Can't have it both ways. We think we can for a while, but it only leads to suffering.

And all paths, whether you do the path of suffering, the path of devotion, the path of knowledge, all lead to the divine essence of who we are. And we'll see what happens. Will it be boring?

I doubt it. Only when you get bored is when you know that you're in the mind. We need to get to that place where there's this little sort of, I don't know if you call it a joke, but I've said this before, I've used this before, was that there's this famous English writer who was at a cocktail party.

And somebody came up to him and said, are you enjoying yourself here? And the famous English writer says, it's the only thing that I'm enjoying here. So, are you enjoying yourself here?

I don't hear anything, oh no. It's the only thing that you should be enjoying here. And that's yourself.

The true joy comes from within. Anything that makes you happy or laugh that's outside you, it's temporary, but what can bubble inside you continuously comes from within. Even in the midst of sadness or grief or loss of a loved one, there can be peace.

You can feel that sadness yet feel peace. And when your commitment is to this divine essence of who you are, then you use every single opportunity as a spiritual awakening, as a deepening. I'm faced with that, this moment, these days, with probably two potential beings that I love so dearly, whose lifespan in their bodies will be soon, will be coming to an end.

And that's my father, who's 88 years old. And he's ready. He says, I'm ready.

I'm ready to go. And our beloved Maya, who has a heart condition and we know that she will sooner or later leave body. And using this opportunity as a deepening spiritually, contemplating death, as we all have to sooner or later contemplate our own deaths, and feeling the beauty and the essence being with that essence.

And really the form passes away, but who we are at the core is eternal. We are eternity. Oh, I have to tell you guys this.

We drove from Vancouver to here and we were like stopped overnight in Red Bluff. And we went to a restaurant to have dinner. And somehow we got to talking about Eckhart's father who left body, I think about five years ago.

And Eckhart said, he mentioned about his father's ego. Because he had, even though he was very spiritual in a sense, he still had this big ego at times. And when he said that, the glass of water that was full of water and ice, burst.

It literally just, poof, burst. And we went, okay. We kind of forgot about what we were talking about.

We wondered what, wow, what was that? We didn't even touch it. And everyone was coming over that work there and they're like, oh yeah, well if you put it down maybe too hard.

And we go, we didn't touch it. It was nothing, we didn't do anything. It just burst.

And then I said, what were we talking about just before that happened? And we realized we were talking about his father and his ego. So he didn't like that.

So he may have left body, but he was definitely with us. And that, the experience of, of just feeling that energy, because it's energy. It's like water.

You boil water, yet all it does is change form. So the essence of who we are is of the one life. Is eternal.

Is stillness. With no limitations, no borders, nothing. The space.

So if you can imagine this universe, this space, we are at that space. And we would not recognize who we are as space consciousness if we were not in form. And we wouldn't know that space existed if there was no forms.

It'd be, what name could we give it? There'd be no even dimension to it. So we are awakening consciousness through the form.

We're recognizing ourselves. But from the moment we are born, we are taught to forget about ourself and begin to identify with our name. Oh, they keep calling me Johnny or Alice.

Oh, and they're looking at me. That must be me. Because they say I'm supposed to call them mommy and daddy.

That's who they are, is mommy and daddy. No, it's not. So we're coming back home to recognize and be in that space.

And that's the flowering. That's the purpose of our life. And there's no other purpose.

And I still have to even remind myself about that. There's no other purpose but just to recognize that space. There's nothing for me to do.

Sometimes I still wonder what I'm gonna do when I grow up. Honestly. I'm just like, well, what am I supposed to do?

Wow, I've got, you know, because contemplating now with my father being ill and with Maya being ill, it's like this contemplation of, geez, I've only got so many maybe years or minutes left on this planet in this form. What do I wanna do? And then it's like, oh, come on.

Just be, just be, just be still and move from that. And whatever it is that I'm supposed to be doing, it's only in this moment that I'm doing it. So what's the quality that you will bring to this moment?

Am I going to infuse this moment and what I'm doing in this moment in my thinking mind? Or am I going to create and infuse whatever I'm doing with presence? With just finding that inner stillness in this moment with whatever it is I am doing.

That's our work. That's our realization. That's our creation.

That's our creation is in this moment now. Not what I'm going to do in the future, but how am I bringing this moment into creation? Stillness or with thinking about it?

[Speaker 4] (3:12:34 - 3:12:54)

Today at Cartoli on Super Soul Sunday, it was one of the most exciting, eye-opening and meaningful moments of my career. Right now, you all are online with me from every corner on our planet. They say we practically crashed the internet when more than a million people logged on to watch.

[Speaker 11] (3:12:55 - 3:12:56)

Hi Oprah, hi Eckhart.

[Speaker 4] (3:12:56 - 3:16:36)

Learn and study with one of the great spiritual thinkers of our time, Eckhart Tolle. The world can't make you happy. Things cannot give you happiness.

It still thrills me to think about it. I just love that. I loved it so much, I wrote, wow.

Now Eckhart is back, and today you're going to see him in a whole new light. That's the first time anybody has said that. So get ready.

This was fun. Yes. Because Super Soul Sunday with Eckhart Tolle starts now.

I wanted a place for people to go every Sunday to wake up, thought provoking. Oh, you couldn't have said that better. Eye-opening and inspiring.

This is my favorite thing to talk about. This will lift you right on up. It's food for your soul.

Every single Sunday. This is Super Soul Sunday. The weekly webcast that Eckhart Tolle and I did together back in 2008, I describe as my first life class, teaching one of my favorite books of all time, A New Earth, chapter by chapter.

Millions of people got to know Eckhart during those 10 weeks, but not everyone knows his remarkable spiritual journey. At 29, this German-born author had become a research scholar in comparative literature at the University of Cambridge in England. Despite his academic success, it wasn't enough to halt bouts of anxiety and depression so severe that at one time he considered ending his life.

In his darkest hour, Eckhart says, he experienced an awakening that transformed his life. We'll hear more about that later. And he chose to walk away from his promising career to explore his newly discovered inner peace.

Eckhart's profound yet simple spiritual teachings are the basis for his best-selling books, The Power of Now and A New Earth. Too much time had passed since Eckhart and I sat down together, so I invited him back to Chicago to catch up, to reflect, and to have a Super Soul Sunday conversation. Ah, how fantastic is this?

So much has changed since we did A New Earth webcast. It was just four years ago, 2008. That was considered for me and our industry groundbreaking when we were broadcasting live around the world in our first webcast.

Remember that first night and people were Skyping in? We're like, oh, there's Brazil. Yes.

That first webcast was one of the, really, I think it was a seminal day for me because it said that our ability to, for me, doing this kind of work, using your voice to let people come closer to the one that is their own, that that was transmittable in a way around the world, in a way that we had never done before, but not only transmittable, but could actually be both physically, emotionally, and spiritually received. Yes.

Right now, we're on OWN, on the platform of the cable network. We're also streaming on Facebook. We're also on Oprah.com.

We're also on Oprah Radio, all at the same time, simulcasting as we speak what was cutting edge back then is now just normal. Yes. This is how we do it.

[Speaker 1] (3:16:36 - 3:16:36)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:16:36 - 3:16:44)

This is how we do it. Do you think technology is accelerating our consciousness or the opposite?

[Speaker 1] (3:16:45 - 3:17:25)

I think both are happening at the moment. I can see the negative effects of technology that it has, can have, and has on many, especially young people who get addicted to their devices, the computer, and the smartphones, and so on, so our mind can get totally filled up with useless facts, and so that can prevent us from actually being able to pay attention to what is here in the present moment. The most important ability a human being can have is to direct his or her full attention to the present moment.

[Speaker 4] (3:17:25 - 3:17:59)

Absolutely, absolutely. So there are obviously wonderful things, the fact that we can communicate now, hello world, with everybody throughout the world who is seeking this information. That's a good thing, and obviously there are dangers, particularly for people raising children in this environment.

One of the things that you did after the New Earth seminars, you wrote a book called Oneness with All Life, a companion to a new Earth, which says many of the things that are in New Earth, but it's not like a summarized version of New Earth.

[Speaker 12] (3:17:59 - 3:17:59)

Yeah.

[Speaker 4] (3:18:00 - 3:18:54)

Okay, now this is what I loved from Oneness with All Life. This is also right next to my bed, my signed copy from you. You say through the present moment, you have access to the power of life itself, the power of life itself, that which has traditionally been called God, which I thought is such a beautiful definition of God, the power of life itself.

As soon as you turn away from it, God ceases to be a reality in your life, and all you're left with is the mental concept of God, the mental concept, which is what a lot of people talk about, the mental concept of God, their belief in God. And what you go on to say is, which some people believe in and others deny. Even belief in God is only a poor substitute for the living reality of God manifesting every moment of your life.

[Speaker 1] (3:18:55 - 3:18:55)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:18:55 - 3:18:59)

I think that is such a beautiful offering for Super Soul Sunday.

[Speaker 1] (3:19:00 - 3:19:23)

Yes, it's stepping from belief, which is fine, going to the deeper level where belief becomes an actual realization or a knowing. And that can start with a simple thing like, and anybody can verify that in their own experience. How?

When you take your attention into the present moment, which implies, of course, a certain alertness arises.

[Speaker 4] (3:19:23 - 3:19:24)

Yes, yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:19:24 - 3:19:50)

Which is different from thinking. Thinking compared to that is almost like a kind of dreamlike state. You're up here, not present here.

So a certain alertness arises, you become more conscious of what surrounds you. But also, strangely, it's hard to talk about it, but I will, of a sense of presence that is both within and without.

[Speaker 4] (3:19:50 - 3:19:50)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:19:50 - 3:19:55)

A presence. We could call that a divine presence.

[Speaker 4] (3:19:56 - 3:19:56)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:19:57 - 3:19:58)

There is something.

[Speaker 4] (3:19:59 - 3:20:05)

And that presence, what everybody needs to know, is the presence that you feel when you're able to silence your mind.

[Speaker 1] (3:20:05 - 3:20:06)

Silence your mind.

[Speaker 4] (3:20:07 - 3:20:13)

And be aware of the silence that's in your mind. You are that awareness.

[Speaker 1] (3:20:13 - 3:20:13)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:20:14 - 3:20:15)

Disguised as a person.

[Speaker 1] (3:20:15 - 3:20:42)

Yes. And when you become conscious of the gap between two thoughts, for example, or even now, sometimes I even recommend to people that they hold their hands like this, and they create this, let's say, past is there, future is there, you let them go, and now you bring your attention to just the present. It can be a little reminder to help you hold that sense of presence.

[Speaker 4] (3:20:42 - 3:20:48)

And to recognize that the past is here, and the future is here, and that the only moment that matters is right now.

[Speaker 1] (3:20:48 - 3:20:51)

The only thing you ever have is now.

[Speaker 4] (3:20:51 - 3:20:53)

The only thing that matters is now.

[Speaker 1] (3:20:53 - 3:20:53)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:20:54 - 3:21:13)

I mean, I learned so much from that experience with you, the 10 weeks. It was like, it was the original life class. It is from which all the other life classes have stemmed.

And one of the most important things that I learned is that we all have the ability to awaken, correct?

[Speaker 1] (3:21:13 - 3:21:14)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:21:14 - 3:21:19)

Yes. And that if we don't awaken as a species, that the species will eventually.

[Speaker 1] (3:21:20 - 3:21:41)

Yes, I see it as the next step in our evolution as a species is to embrace that state of consciousness that we call awakening. And if we don't, then the problems that the unawakened mind has created on the planet will only increase and multiply.

[Speaker 4] (3:21:42 - 3:22:03)

Coming up, Eckhart and I get to the heart of what an aha moment really is. Only spirit can recognize spirit. That's what an aha moment is, isn't it?

Super Soul Sunday. We'll be right back.

[Speaker 5] (3:22:21 - 3:23:37)

Meditation is a gift because you can do it anytime, anywhere, in any location, quieten your mind and get in touch with your soul. You can improve your health, you can manage stress, improve the quality of your sleep, your creative process, the way you deal with people, your personal relationships. In other words, you're on your way to a happier, healthier human being with more abundance in your consciousness than you were ever before because of meditation.

If your child is over 10 years, they can join in the 21-day challenge for meditation. If your child is five years, then just tell them to keep quiet for five minutes every day. Not say a word.

At six years, six minutes. Seven years, seven minutes. Eight years, eight minutes.

Nine years, nine minutes. 10 years, teach them proper meditation just like you and me. The best advice I can give to anyone who's starting the 21-day meditation challenge is just do it, spend the time.

And if you do it, all will be well. Don't worry about whether you're doing it right or not. Just spend the time.

Put in the time.

[Speaker 11] (3:23:40 - 3:24:34)

Let me see, strawberry lavender, big honey baby, Asian champere, raspberry habanero. I'm the jam lady. I was a punk rock drummer and then the band broke up and you have to reinvent yourself.

When I first moved to California, in the backyard was this really prosperous orange tree. So I started making marmalade and I would send it home to my friends. They're like, this is the best jam ever.

I'm really excited with all the rains because I'm like, oh my God, everybody's fruit trees are going to be blowing up. A lot of my flavor profiles are just things I see at the farmer's market. There'll be like a strawberry, but right next to it, it'll be lavender.

I started testing things. It takes a long time to cook jam. I really do have crazy jam fans.

Before, I would walk around Chicago. It was like, yeah, drummer lady. And now it's like, hey, it's the jam lady.

Who's not happy when they're eating jam?

[Speaker 3] (3:24:38 - 3:25:02)

Super Soul Sunday has got viewers raving. Dawn posted, Super Soul Sunday has given birth to a new and peaceful way to watch television. Janie wrote, thank you so much for the best TV I've ever watched.

And Raven tweeted, this is how I refresh my soul and get ready for another wonderfully busy week. Be a part of the global experience. Super Soul Sunday is simulcasting worldwide on OWN, Facebook, and Oprah.com.

[Speaker 4] (3:25:02 - 3:25:03)

This was fun!

[Speaker 3] (3:25:03 - 3:25:08)

Super Soul Sunday, every Sunday, 11 a.m. 10 central, only on OWN.

[Speaker 4] (3:26:10 - 3:26:32)

One of the things that you say is that stress is wanting something to be the way that it isn't. So how do you know the difference between something isn't the way that I want it to be and I need to accept it, because you say what you resist persists. How do you know whether you're supposed to accept it or try to bring about change for whatever it is that you want to change?

[Speaker 1] (3:26:32 - 3:27:00)

First, you accept, even if change is possible, and you may need to focus some attention on the situation to realize what kind of steps you can take to change the situation. But in the meantime, the basis for effective action is to come into an inner alignment with the is-ness of this moment. This is how it is.

Let's say I gave the example in The Power of Now, I'm stuck in the mud, just as an example. This is the situation right now.

[Speaker 4] (3:27:00 - 3:27:05)

I'm so pissed off, I'm stuck in the mud. Damn this mud, how'd I get in this mud?

[Speaker 1] (3:27:05 - 3:27:10)

Oh, yes, or you become a victim in your own mind. Why did this happen?

[Speaker 4] (3:27:10 - 3:27:10)

There's always mud.

[Speaker 1] (3:27:10 - 3:27:16)

Why is there mud here? Why is this happening to me, always to me, and so on. Victim identity, complaining.

[Speaker 4] (3:27:17 - 3:27:20)

Yeah, what is the mud in your life? So you're just saying, using that as a metaphor.

[Speaker 1] (3:27:20 - 3:27:41)

Yes, but just look at the situation without labeling it. This is where I am right now, and you accept that this is how it is, the is-ness of life at this moment. And now, I will begin to think about how to change it.

And then you become, actually, a greater intelligence arises, because you become present with what is.

[Speaker 4] (3:27:42 - 3:27:54)

So if you're stuck in the mud, and you're angry about being stuck in the mud, and you're trying to resolve being stuck in the mud, from that point of anger, you will always remain stuck in the mud. Yes, yes. You gotta remove yourself from the mud.

[Speaker 1] (3:27:54 - 3:27:55)

That's right.

[Speaker 4] (3:27:55 - 3:28:14)

I got that. Okay, one of the things that you write in the very beginning of the book is that if you come across passages in this book that you feel are powerful, I want you to realize that what you're feeling is your own spiritual power. That is to say, who you are in your essence.

Only spirit can recognize spirit. That's what an aha moment is, isn't it?

[Speaker 1] (3:28:14 - 3:28:43)

Yes, it's always a recognition. The real truths of life are never entirely new to you or to anybody, because there is a level deep down within you where you already know all the things, all those spiritual truths that you read or hear, and then recognize them. I say recognize, because you're not, it's not new, ultimately, it's not new information.

You're very so- It's a resonation. Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:28:43 - 3:28:49)

It's a resonation. It's a resonating with what is somehow buried or suppressed.

[Speaker 1] (3:28:49 - 3:28:49)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:28:49 - 3:28:50)

That's what an aha is.

[Speaker 1] (3:28:51 - 3:28:51)

That's right.

[Speaker 4] (3:28:51 - 3:29:08)

So when you do hear something, like from what we're talking about this Sunday morning, and you want to tweet-tweet it, the reason it resonates with you, the reason it is an aha, because that is spirit recognizing spirit. Yes. Your consciousness recognizing the consciousness of whatever that message is.

[Speaker 1] (3:29:08 - 3:29:08)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:29:09 - 3:29:09)

That's great.

[Speaker 1] (3:29:09 - 3:29:10)

And that's an awakening.

[Speaker 4] (3:29:11 - 3:29:12)

That's an awakening, yeah.

[Speaker 1] (3:29:12 - 3:29:37)

And it also, it awakens that faculty in you. When there's a glimpse of recognition, then that knowing in you awakens, and then it grows. It comes to the surface more.

And the more it grows, the more open you are to hearing spiritual truths, and then you begin to live it in your life.

[Speaker 4] (3:29:37 - 3:30:09)

Absolutely. I think if the most important, if there was only one message, because I don't want to, you know, in the short time that we have this morning, to go over everything. It's impossible that we learn from new earth.

But if the essence of it, that if you wanted people to understand what the reason why you sat down and wrote that book, or that book wrote you, you said that book was burning inside you, right? The reason why you wanted to do it is because you want it to cause an awakening. Is that it?

[Speaker 1] (3:30:09 - 3:31:16)

Yes. Or one could say that it was kind of coming through me, so I just became the kind of almost the channel for it. So there was something in me that needed to write that book.

And I feel the essence of a new earth and of the power of now is the arising of the state of presence. And now for the first time, it is possible on a more widespread level for humans to undergo that shift in consciousness where they're no longer totally dominated by the continuous compulsive thinking in their heads, the voice that never stops talking. They're no longer totally in the grip of that because that's the old conditioned consciousness.

Something new arises, an inner spaciousness, a presence. And that presence transcends who you are as a person.

[Speaker 4] (3:31:17 - 3:31:21)

That's right. And it's what you call in the books going beyond thought.

[Speaker 1] (3:31:21 - 3:31:21)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:31:22 - 3:32:03)

All right, you say on page 13, see if you can catch, that is to say, notice the voice in the head. Whenever you notice that voice, you will also realize that you are not the voice, but the one who is aware of it. It's what you say in Stillness Speaks.

You are that awareness disguised as a person. Yes, yes. Wow, that's big.

I think, is that, would you say, is that, I know it's hard to measure your own words and your own work, but would you say that that is in terms of awakening and realization of your personal power, that that's really one of the most important things?

[Speaker 1] (3:32:03 - 3:32:08)

Yes, that is the most important thing. Feeling it for yourself, sensing it.

[Speaker 4] (3:32:08 - 3:32:09)

Yes, what one needs to know.

[Speaker 1] (3:32:10 - 3:32:27)

So the moment you become aware that you have certain kinds of thoughts in your head, there's already that awareness arising. There's still many people in this world who are so identified with every thought that arises in their head, there's not the slightest space of awareness there.

[Speaker 4] (3:32:27 - 3:32:27)

That's right.

[Speaker 1] (3:32:27 - 3:32:32)

And they may not even be ready to hear what we are saying. It would be totally meaningless to them.

[Speaker 4] (3:32:32 - 3:32:46)

Yes, so you have to be ready to hear it. That's why you were saying, why I was saying earlier, quoting from the book, that if you hear something that connects to you, it means you're already awakening enough to be able to hear it, because it's only spirit that recognizes spirit.

[Speaker 1] (3:32:46 - 3:32:46)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:32:46 - 3:32:49)

Truth recognizes truth. Yes. There you are.

[Speaker 1] (3:32:49 - 3:33:12)

Yes, it's the deepest sense of beingness. I sometimes ask people, can you be aware of your own presence? Not thinking, not the thoughts that you're having, not the emotions that you're having, but the very presence of your very being.

You become aware of your own presence by sensing the entire energy field in your body that is alive.

[Speaker 8] (3:33:12 - 3:33:12)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:33:12 - 3:33:14)

And that is the totality of your presence.

[Speaker 4] (3:33:14 - 3:33:36)

Because you know that no matter what's going on, all the trials and difficulties and challenges and whatever, that all of us have from time to time in our life, if you live past five years old, that there is a space that you can go to. Yes. That really is the ultimate connection to all there is, or God.

[Speaker 1] (3:33:37 - 3:33:37)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:33:37 - 3:33:38)

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (3:33:38 - 3:33:48)

Yes. That's where you and God merge. So then you recognize your oneness with a source of life.

[Speaker 4] (3:33:48 - 3:33:49)

Of source of life.

[Speaker 1] (3:33:49 - 3:33:49)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:33:49 - 3:34:50)

What I find is, if you can go to that space, that's where your strength, that's where your true strength lies. Yes. That's where your true creativity, your power, your ability to be authentically yourself, everything comes from that space.

And you wanna be able to bring that space to everything that you do. Yes. Yes.

And bring that space forward to inhabit who you are. Yes. To be conscious of that.

Yes. Yeah, I got that. I got that.

Coming up, Eckhart answers your Facebook questions. Good questions. Thanks, Laura.

Many people will be thankful for that question. Yes. And later, what do you do for fun?

Eckhart's answer may surprise you. For those of you watching on OWN, around the world and on the web, let me know how you stay present and in the moment. Facebook me or tweet, tweet.

We'll be back in a moment.

[Speaker 5] (3:35:01 - 3:36:42)

People who say I have no time to meditate are just the ones who should be meditating because they're basically making excuses to ruin their life. If you can brush your teeth, if you can take a shower, you can meditate. It's part of your daily routine.

And the fact is you will be accomplishing a lot more by doing less. So meditation is the ultimate law of least effort. If people get interrupted a lot, then at least if they're interrupted by adults, they can set aside the time to go to a room, put a sign outside, meditating for the next 20 minutes.

Please don't interrupt. If your mind doesn't quiet, don't try to quieten it. Just sit there going through the procedure, which I'll be guiding you through.

And you'll find that soon it'll quieten by itself. If you're a fidgeter in meditation, then you can fidget. If you fall asleep in meditation, that means you are not getting enough sleep, so you should get more sleep.

If you're stuck in traffic or in a situation where you can't actually close your eyes and meditate, just stop and observe the sensations in your body and then feel your body, smile inside, everywhere in your body. Observe your breath and you're practicing some kind of meditation right there.

[Speaker 8] (3:36:52 - 3:36:57)

Dance is creating art to music using your body.

[Speaker 7] (3:37:01 - 3:37:03)

Dance is an expression of your soul.

[Speaker 9] (3:37:08 - 3:37:14)

When you perform, you just completely forget about everything. You're in that moment.

[Speaker 2] (3:37:19 - 3:37:27)

Going into a world that no one else is in. It's a time to be free.

[Speaker 7] (3:37:37 - 3:37:54)

I am a ballet dancer. That's me.

[Speaker 4] (3:38:28 - 3:38:53)

When we told you Eckhart would be coming on Super Soul Sunday, we heard the collective digital cheer online. You told us you had questions for Eckhart and he happily agreed to take a few. Laura, one of our Facebook followers, wanted to know how to calm the voice in her head.

She writes, I feel like my mind is racing at enormous speed and at night it's even worse. How can I stop the constant stream of consciousness in my mind? Yeah, good question.

[Speaker 12] (3:38:54 - 3:38:54)

Thanks, Laura.

[Speaker 1] (3:38:54 - 3:39:04)

Many people will be thankful for that question. Yes. So, first of all, the question implies that you know that your mind won't stop.

[Speaker 4] (3:39:04 - 3:39:05)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:39:05 - 3:39:13)

If you are totally immersed, you're so identified with your mind, even the thought that your mind won't stop doesn't even occur to you because you become your mind.

[Speaker 4] (3:39:13 - 3:39:15)

You don't know that it is your mind that won't stop.

[Speaker 1] (3:39:15 - 3:39:15)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:39:15 - 3:39:18)

So, Laura, that's a big, that's, you're ahead of the game.

[Speaker 1] (3:39:18 - 3:39:18)

Okay.

[Speaker 4] (3:39:18 - 3:39:21)

The fact that Laura knows that her mind won't stop is a good thing.

[Speaker 1] (3:39:21 - 3:40:15)

It's a good start. So, when you hear the thought, why can't I stop my mind? Don't believe it because you can stop your mind.

How? You can choose to take your attention away from thinking. And the first thing you do as you lie there in bed, you ask yourself, can I feel the energy inside my hands?

Yeah. In other words, can I feel that my hands are there without touching anything? Yes.

Can I feel that there's an energy inside my hands? And after a little while, most people can. There's a slight tingling or liveness that you can feel when the energy goes in there.

And that's an enormous step that you've already taken because immediately thinking will slow down because it no longer has your whole attention. Got it. And then, see, can you incorporate the whole body?

[Speaker 4] (3:40:16 - 3:40:16)

The whole body.

[Speaker 1] (3:40:16 - 3:40:17)

Can you sense your legs and arms?

[Speaker 4] (3:40:17 - 3:40:22)

Yes. So why does that work and not just Laura saying to herself, let me think about something else?

[Speaker 1] (3:40:23 - 3:40:30)

There's no anchor then for presence and the mind has such momentum that you won't be able to stop it.

[Speaker 4] (3:40:31 - 3:40:31)

Got it.

[Speaker 1] (3:40:31 - 3:40:38)

You need an anchor for presence. And the inner body, as I call this, is a wonderful anchor for the state of presence.

[Speaker 4] (3:40:38 - 3:40:43)

Laura, I hope you got that too. That's why you just can't say, okay, I'm going to think about something else.

[Speaker 1] (3:40:43 - 3:40:43)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:40:43 - 3:40:45)

And then the wonderful... You have to actively...

[Speaker 1] (3:40:46 - 3:41:10)

Choose. Choose. Not about something else.

Just go into the body and then thinking slows down. You might even stop completely for a while. And the amazing thing is what before was an unpleasant, dreadful, sleepless night, within a few minutes can actually be transformed into a very pleasant experience of feeling the inherent aliveness in your whole body and you lie there.

[Speaker 4] (3:41:10 - 3:41:13)

Because and then you recognize, oh, I have slowed down.

[Speaker 1] (3:41:13 - 3:41:20)

You have slowed down and the mind will do very little. When you're really in the body, there's not much thinking anymore.

[Speaker 4] (3:41:20 - 3:41:30)

So another Facebooker wanted to know, this is closely related to what Laura said. How does one clear one's mind of bad memories? Can you clear your mind of bad memories?

[Speaker 1] (3:41:30 - 3:41:52)

Well, not as such, but you can recognize that bad memories are thoughts that are arising in your mind. And when you recognize that these are thoughts arising in your mind, you don't need to identify with the thoughts any longer. So memories, for example, of something bad that happened to you.

[Speaker 4] (3:41:52 - 3:41:52)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:41:53 - 3:41:55)

It's not happening here and now.

[Speaker 4] (3:41:55 - 3:41:57)

It's already happened. Yes. It's done.

[Speaker 1] (3:41:57 - 3:42:23)

Yes. So memories are thoughts that arise. They're not reality.

It's only when you believe that they are real, then they have the power over you. But when you realize it's just another thought arising about the past, then you find a space, a spacious relationship with thought. So thought no longer has you in its grip.

I call it sometimes...

[Speaker 4] (3:42:23 - 3:42:25)

I hope people really get that.

[Speaker 1] (3:42:25 - 3:42:25)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:42:25 - 3:42:28)

That would be a gift for somebody who's tortured by the past.

[Speaker 1] (3:42:28 - 3:42:59)

Yes. Another aspect of that, of course, is guilt, which has to do with something one did to someone or something that they failed to do but should have done. And so guilt arises.

But of course, who you were then, no human being can act beyond their level of consciousness. At that time, you acted like that. The awareness was not there to act differently.

Now the awareness is there and the awareness is who you truly are.

[Speaker 4] (3:43:00 - 3:43:19)

Well, I think a lot of the reasons, any time I've ever felt guilty, it's because I kind of knew better. I knew better and didn't do it. There's nothing worse, I think, than being upset with yourself.

And you're upset with yourself not when you make a mistake, for me, I'm upset with myself when I make a mistake that I could have prevented.

[Speaker 1] (3:43:19 - 3:43:22)

Yes. Yes. But you didn't.

[Speaker 4] (3:43:22 - 3:43:23)

But I didn't.

[Speaker 12] (3:43:26 - 3:43:29)

But the ego...

[Speaker 4] (3:43:29 - 3:43:30)

But you didn't, so live with it.

[Speaker 1] (3:43:30 - 3:44:24)

Guilt is a strong way for the ego to strengthen itself because when you feel guilty about something, you identify, again, with certain thoughts in your mind, which is ego. And the thoughts say, I should have done better, I didn't do it, I, I, I. And every I thought that judges you, you identify with it, it becomes part of ego.

The ego loves guilt. It loves not only blaming others, that strengthens it too, if that doesn't work, you can blame yourself. But, of course, every human being has done things in the past that they now regret.

That's, I've done things that I regret, they were silly and stupid. And so, realizing the essence of who you are is, does not lie in the past, or thoughts about the past.

[Speaker 4] (3:44:24 - 3:44:26)

What matters is what you are willing to do now.

[Speaker 1] (3:44:26 - 3:44:28)

Oh, and you are the presence.

[Speaker 4] (3:44:28 - 3:44:30)

You are the presence.

[Speaker 1] (3:44:30 - 3:44:34)

You are the presence. Not any, no thought is who you are.

[Speaker 4] (3:44:34 - 3:44:49)

Yeah. Coming up, get ready to rethink your thoughts. Tell that thought, be gone with you, you have no power here.

You don't have to believe every thought that comes into your head. You don't. Super Soul Sunday, we'll be right back.

[Speaker 5] (3:44:55 - 3:45:27)

My shoes are made by a woman called Madison Steiner. She's a young woman in her 20s, she's a student. And she actually has a foundation, and she works to help children who are struggling with disabling problems, chronic illnesses, and including brain cancer.

And her effort is called Neat Peach. These are neat, and they're peachy.

[Speaker 7] (3:45:43 - 3:46:10)

We're on a mission to tackle life's big questions. I'm Golriz. And I'm Devin.

And this is SoulPancake. It can be all too easy to stress out over things we can't control. So, SoulPancake headed to a park with a giant balloon to give people an unusual way to just let go.

[Speaker 2] (3:46:48 - 3:46:54)

I wrote about anxiety, like pressure and things like that. Financial issues, money problems.

[Speaker 4] (3:46:55 - 3:46:57)

Student loans. I've been backed up for years on these.

[Speaker 2] (3:46:57 - 3:46:59)

I wrote menopause.

[Speaker 11] (3:46:59 - 3:47:02)

Writing about women. Hopefully find one that matches with me.

[Speaker 2] (3:47:02 - 3:47:08)

It's been a pretty tough journey having cancer, but I need it to be gone. Out of my life.

[Speaker 7] (3:47:42 - 3:47:49)

The physical act of writing it down and then watching it fly away, it was pretty cool. It made me feel really good.

[Speaker 11] (3:47:49 - 3:47:53)

To see them go away and just to reflect on a deeper level what it meant, it felt good.

[Speaker 8] (3:47:53 - 3:47:58)

It was nice to be able to get it off my chest and let it go and see it pop and fly away.

[Speaker 4] (3:48:07 - 3:48:27)

This is one of my favorite quotes from page 64. You do not become good by trying to be good, but by finding the goodness that is already within you and allowing that goodness to emerge. Again, we're talking about going to presence, the divine within you, and bringing that forth to whatever it is you do.

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:48:27 - 3:48:33)

Because trying to be good is often to improve one's self-image.

[Speaker 4] (3:48:33 - 3:48:35)

Right. That's ego-driven.

[Speaker 1] (3:48:35 - 3:49:10)

Ultimately, it's ego. Some people, for example, have been trying for centuries to love their neighbor as themselves. Right.

But most of them have been finding it very difficult. Because love your neighbor as yourself really means, first of all, you need to be in touch with yourself, the self that you are beyond the form, the consciousness that you are. Then you can love your neighbor as yourself because you recognize your oneness with your neighbor.

[Speaker 4] (3:49:10 - 3:49:21)

Yes. What you're saying is, that's so beautiful. I get it.

Lots of bing-bing-aha's here. Love your neighbor as yourself, as you're interpreting it, is not as yourself the personality.

[Speaker 12] (3:49:22 - 3:49:22)

No.

[Speaker 4] (3:49:22 - 3:49:35)

Not as yourself who's out there mowing the lawn. Not as yourself. It doesn't mean if you go to the theater, give your neighbor tickets to the theater, or whatever.

It means the deeper always. Yes. Inner self.

Yes. Higher self.

[Speaker 1] (3:49:36 - 3:50:18)

Yes. So love, I call love the recognizing yourself in the other. And yourself, your essential self, is consciousness.

Got it. Then I begin, when I then meet people and interact with people, I see them on two levels, or feel them on two levels. On one level, they are the form.

Yes. Which is the body and their psychological makeup. Correct.

On another level, they are the consciousness that I also am. Because underlying the body and the mind is the consciousness out of which the body and the mind have come. And that is still there.

That pure essence.

[Speaker 4] (3:50:18 - 3:50:20)

You see that in every person that you encounter.

[Speaker 1] (3:50:20 - 3:50:31)

Yes. Yeah. And that makes it much easier to interact with people and much more pleasant because sometimes the personality, the psychological makeup, is not that wonderful.

[Speaker 4] (3:50:32 - 3:50:32)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:50:33 - 3:50:42)

And then one is able to let that be because you can sense that beyond that, there is an essence to that human being.

[Speaker 4] (3:50:42 - 3:50:54)

That's what I mean when I am going into interviews, particularly that I think might be, you know, challenging. I will consciously meditate on the thought of the presence in me, speak to the presence in you.

[Speaker 1] (3:50:54 - 3:50:54)

Oh, yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:50:54 - 3:51:00)

That's wonderful. Yeah. Yes.

Because that's what I'm really looking for. Yes. That underlying thing.

[Speaker 1] (3:51:00 - 3:51:01)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:51:01 - 3:51:07)

That we all have. That oneness that we all have. That's right.

Which, as you know, that's when you get the best conversation.

[Speaker 1] (3:51:07 - 3:51:07)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:51:08 - 3:51:13)

What is your own personal spiritual practice? Do you have one?

[Speaker 1] (3:51:13 - 3:51:16)

I don't have a practice as such.

[Speaker 4] (3:51:16 - 3:51:17)

Do you meditate?

[Speaker 1] (3:51:19 - 3:51:27)

Not in a formal sense, but sometimes I sit and just be without doing anything.

[Speaker 4] (3:51:27 - 3:51:29)

I want everybody to know that you can just do that.

[Speaker 1] (3:51:29 - 3:51:30)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:51:30 - 3:51:43)

There was a wonderful line in the book, I can't remember where you said it, that stillness, I think it is stillness is the voice of God or stillness is how God speaks to us. Does anybody know where that quote is? 140.

140.

Stillness is the language God speaks. Everything else is a bad translation.

[Speaker 4] (3:51:49 - 3:51:55)

Oh, that's right. You wrote the book. Why not?

Say it again.

[Speaker 1] (3:51:56 - 3:52:14)

Stillness is the language God speaks. Everything else is a bad translation. And of course, in stillness you get closest to the source of life, which is God and which is essentially yourself.

[Speaker 4] (3:52:14 - 3:52:15)

Which is the one.

[Speaker 1] (3:52:15 - 3:52:16)

The one.

[Speaker 4] (3:52:16 - 3:52:37)

I love calling God the one now. The one. Yes.

I know you told my producers that it's wonderful to meditate. You have meditated. Sometimes you do meditate.

But meditation isn't the end all be all because there are a lot of people who go in and meditate and there's 20 minutes of let me connect to presence.

[Speaker 12] (3:52:37 - 3:52:37)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:52:37 - 3:52:43)

Then they get up from that 20 minutes and they are unconscious the rest of the 2340, right?

[Speaker 1] (3:52:44 - 3:52:50)

So their daily life is not interspersed with presence and space.

[Speaker 4] (3:52:50 - 3:52:56)

That's like people who go to church on Sunday and then leave church and come home and kick the dog.

[Speaker 1] (3:52:56 - 3:52:56)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:52:57 - 3:52:57)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:52:57 - 3:53:03)

That's why I often say meditation is, of course, wonderful. It's not for everybody.

[Speaker 4] (3:53:03 - 3:53:04)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:53:04 - 3:53:55)

But for many people it will be very helpful. But even more important than meditation, and especially those people who don't meditate and don't want to meditate, bring in little spaces of aware presence into everyday life. Choose a few things that you use as vehicles for bringing in presence.

For example, when you get into your car, you close the door. Why not spend 30 seconds just, for example, being aware of your breathing, which is another beautiful way of bringing that inner space, that presence into your life. Yes.

30 seconds is not that much. Even the busiest person can do that. Yes.

If they believe their minds, which their mind might say, I have no time for this now, but you don't have to believe every thought that comes into your head.

[Speaker 4] (3:53:55 - 3:53:56)

It's just a thought.

[Speaker 1] (3:53:56 - 3:53:56)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:53:57 - 3:54:00)

Tell that thought, be gone with you. You have no power here.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:00 - 3:54:03)

You don't have to believe every thought that comes into your head.

[Speaker 4] (3:54:03 - 3:54:04)

You don't. Because it's just a thought.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:05 - 3:54:05)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:54:05 - 3:54:06)

That's right.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:06 - 3:54:15)

For many people, no sense of spaciousness, presence inside at all. It's like living in a room that's crammed full with furniture. Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:54:15 - 3:54:35)

And I think of people who live their whole lives and hopefully this opportunity to join us on Super Soul Sunday starts to give a little crack of the space for people. That's my whole heart's desire is to do that for people. Yes.

Coming up. They all thought Eckhart has lost his mind. Yes.

[Speaker 1] (3:54:36 - 3:54:37)

And in a way you did. They were right.

[Speaker 4] (3:54:38 - 3:54:43)

We'll talk about the moment Eckhart says changed his life back in a moment.

[Speaker 7] (3:55:03 - 3:55:22)

We're on a mission. To tackle life's big questions. I'm Golriz.

And I'm Devin. And this is SoulPancake. It can be really hard to find a sense of calm, especially when life gets chaotic.

[Speaker 9] (3:55:30 - 3:55:39)

So, SoulPancake headed to one of the busiest streets in Hollywood to create an unusual space where people could find a few minutes of calm amidst the chaos.

[Speaker 7] (3:55:40 - 3:56:57)

We've got these little diagrams here and we're trying to put all of this pipe together and we've got X's and O's and little things. So, let's see how it goes. We called it the Zen Den and invited people in.

We're here. We're here. We're here.

We're here. We're here. We're here.

We're here. We're here. We're here.

We're here. We're here. We're here.

[Speaker 12] (3:57:00 - 3:57:00)

We're here.

[Speaker 11] (3:58:04 - 3:58:08)

Well, you're centered, ready to go. I wish I could do this every day.

[Speaker 6] (3:58:08 - 3:58:11)

I was weird enough to be a good situation.

[Speaker 4] (3:58:17 - 3:58:30)

Today was a very stressful day because I'm job searching and I was feeling a little down, a little weak, and then I got asked to do this. So just gave me some more hope that I'm not finished yet. I keep going.

[Speaker 3] (3:58:42 - 3:58:54)

What is the soul?

[Speaker 1] (3:58:56 - 3:59:14)

The soul is one of the words one can use to talk about your innermost being, the presence that you are beyond form, that which underlies the personality and the mind, the essence of who you are.

[Speaker 4] (3:59:14 - 3:59:21)

Have you always considered yourself a spiritual person or did you have an aha moment when you recognized your connection to something bigger than yourself?

[Speaker 1] (3:59:21 - 3:59:49)

I had a big aha moment where I disidentified from my mind and disidentified from the unhappy self that I was. You were suicidal. Yes.

So there was a mind created, unhappy sense of self, and somehow I separated from it. It happened, just happened, and realized that that is not who I am.

[Speaker 4] (3:59:49 - 3:59:51)

Was that what people call a nervous breakdown?

[Speaker 1] (3:59:52 - 4:00:03)

No, it was a state of acute anxiety which could have become a nervous breakdown or could have become suicide. So it was moving in that direction.

[Speaker 4] (4:00:03 - 4:00:08)

It was moving in that direction, where you literally separated. Tell the story one more time.

[Speaker 1] (4:00:09 - 4:01:04)

Well, the thought, I was in bed at night again, where a lot of the mental suffering happens for many people at night. Couldn't sleep and plagued by dreadful thoughts, and the thought arose, I can't live with myself any longer. I can't live with myself any longer.

And then there must have come some awareness, although I didn't know what it was at the time, and the awareness looked at the thought and said, what does that mean, I can't live with myself? Are there two? Who is the I and who is the self that I cannot live with?

That question came up. The answer didn't come on the level of words. The answer came as a separation suddenly of the self that I couldn't live with and the I, and the I was consciousness.

[Speaker 4] (4:01:04 - 4:01:05)

The awareness.

[Speaker 1] (4:01:05 - 4:01:08)

And the self was created by thoughts and emotions.

[Speaker 4] (4:01:09 - 4:01:10)

Yes, all those thoughts in the head.

[Speaker 1] (4:01:11 - 4:01:52)

And so then I recognized myself as consciousness, and so the self began to dissolve. The false sense of self, the unhappy me, the unhappy sense of self kind of crumbled. And all I knew suddenly, the next day I woke up, everything is so peaceful.

It took me years to understand what that actually was, that I had disidentified from the unhappy self, and I was simply there as a perceiving presence, which is a deeply peaceful way of being. So it was in London, England. So I walked around the streets going, wow, everything is so beautiful.

And there was just perceiving and peace underneath it.

[Speaker 4] (4:01:52 - 4:01:53)

Did your friends think you were nuts?

[Speaker 1] (4:01:55 - 4:02:04)

Some did. My mother did, especially when I then later walked out of my normal life.

[Speaker 4] (4:02:04 - 4:02:07)

So they all thought, Eckhart has lost his mind.

[Speaker 1] (4:02:07 - 4:02:09)

Yes. And in a way, you did, you did.

[Speaker 4] (4:02:10 - 4:02:17)

They were right, they were right. You did. How do you define spirituality versus religion?

What's the difference?

[Speaker 1] (4:02:18 - 4:02:38)

You can have religion with spirituality. You can also have religion without spirituality. Some people are so closely identified with their belief structure, they're really completely trapped in thinking.

And so there's no spaciousness. What we are doing here can actually be part of any religion.

[Speaker 4] (4:02:38 - 4:02:39)

Any religion, absolutely.

[Speaker 1] (4:02:40 - 4:02:41)

So as long as...

[Speaker 4] (4:02:41 - 4:02:44)

It can enhance the religion that you currently follow.

[Speaker 1] (4:02:44 - 4:02:44)

Yes, deepen it.

[Speaker 4] (4:02:45 - 4:02:45)

Deepen it.

[Speaker 1] (4:02:45 - 4:03:00)

Yes. For example, in Christianity, any Christian who wants to go deeper into their own religion and does not want to abandon their religion, there is enormous depth in Christian teaching in the words of Christ.

[Speaker 4] (4:03:02 - 4:03:07)

Absolutely. Everything that Christ came to teach is spirituality.

[Speaker 1] (4:03:07 - 4:03:08)

That's right.

[Speaker 4] (4:03:08 - 4:03:16)

That's what it is. Yes. Christ came to make manifest spirituality on earth.

What does prayer mean to you? Do you pray?

[Speaker 1] (4:03:17 - 4:03:29)

There's a saying that goes, if you talk to God, you pray. If God talks to you, you're insane. So it's very unlikely that God will speak to you in words, but...

[Speaker 4] (4:03:29 - 4:03:32)

Because God speaks through stillness.

[Speaker 12] (4:03:32 - 4:03:32)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:03:33 - 4:03:39)

That's where you find God. Yes. The Bible says, be still and know that I am God.

[Speaker 12] (4:03:39 - 4:03:39)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:03:39 - 4:03:40)

Yeah.

[Speaker 1] (4:03:40 - 4:03:48)

I think prayer to me could be called, I'm often in a state of listening, which really is an aspect of presence when you're just receptive.

[Speaker 4] (4:03:48 - 4:03:49)

That is your prayer.

[Speaker 1] (4:03:49 - 4:04:14)

Yes, like that. I could be like, it's wonderful just enjoying the presence that is there when you're not thinking and just being, just like this. And then when you become present, you become aware of a presence, a divine presence, both within and without.

[Speaker 4] (4:04:14 - 4:04:15)

Yes, in all things.

[Speaker 1] (4:04:15 - 4:04:18)

And that's why this is, I call it also prayer.

[Speaker 4] (4:04:18 - 4:04:22)

Prayer. So what do you do for fun?

[Speaker 1] (4:04:23 - 4:04:38)

Fun is every moment. I don't look for, where can I find some fun? Sometimes people ask me that and I cannot answer that question because I enjoy the present moment wherever I am.

And that's fun enough for me.

[Speaker 4] (4:04:40 - 4:04:42)

So you're having fun right now.

[Speaker 1] (4:04:42 - 4:04:43)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:04:43 - 4:04:43)

This is fun.

[Speaker 1] (4:04:44 - 4:04:44)

You are too.

[Speaker 4] (4:04:45 - 4:04:46)

I am too. You know I am.

[Speaker 1] (4:04:47 - 4:04:48)

I can see it.

[Speaker 4] (4:04:48 - 4:05:08)

You know I am. I know. That's what I feel too all the time.

Okay. That's really good. Coming up.

That cracks me up. That is an LOLer. I had no idea Eckhart could make me laugh so much.

And later, we find some breathing space at the dog beach. Back in a moment.

[Speaker 7] (4:05:16 - 4:06:10)

We're on a mission to tackle life's big questions. I'm Golriz. And I'm Devin.

And this is Soul Pancake. And now we gotta jump, jump. And now we gotta duck.

You go left. Go right. Made it.

Good job. All right. Ready?

It seems like every time we turn on the news, we're bombarded by negativity. And it can be hard not to let all that bad news drag us down. So Soul Pancake decided to switch it up and focus on all the good news in people's lives.

And this is good news. And now, over to you, Devin. Thanks, Devin.

I'm here with... My name is Tim Dunn. I'm from West Hartford, Connecticut.

[Speaker 12] (4:06:10 - 4:06:12)

Hello. Hi. How are you?

[Speaker 7] (4:06:12 - 4:06:13)

I'm good. How are you?

[Speaker 12] (4:06:13 - 4:06:15)

I'm good. Nice shoes.

[Speaker 7] (4:06:15 - 4:06:25)

They look comfortable and breathable. And what's your name? Ramsey.

What is one bit of good news that you've heard lately?

[Speaker 2] (4:06:25 - 4:06:29)

My grandson got a job. That was really good.

[Speaker 7] (4:06:29 - 4:06:37)

Actually, Ramsey's learning how to skateboard. And I think that's pretty, pretty tough business. Well, my sister, she actually got engaged to her boyfriend.

They've been together for like seven years.

[Speaker 4] (4:06:38 - 4:06:42)

My son got straight B's in school. It's great news. I was very proud of him.

[Speaker 2] (4:06:42 - 4:06:46)

My 16-year-old nephew, Eli, he's learning to sing. He's going to be on Broadway someday.

[Speaker 3] (4:06:50 - 4:06:59)

The best thing that happened to me this week was going to my sister's wedding in Las Vegas on Saturday. We had a 70s-themed wedding. So I actually got to have an afro again.

[Speaker 9] (4:07:00 - 4:07:05)

My friend, Yohan, was visiting from France. And he brought sausages on here.

[Speaker 2] (4:07:05 - 4:07:09)

I have a friend that I thought he was mad at me. And he said he wasn't. Now we're friends again.

[Speaker 9] (4:07:09 - 4:07:13)

That was really good. He kind of looks like a sausage. Hi.

[Speaker 3] (4:07:13 - 4:07:20)

Probably the thing that makes me the most happy is today, my daughter, my youngest daughter, just told me she's expecting a baby. So I'm going to be a grandfather for the first time.

[Speaker 2] (4:07:20 - 4:07:24)

In about two weeks, I am going to become a grandmother for the very first time.

[Speaker 8] (4:07:24 - 4:07:29)

The other good news is that I'm here with my best friend and husband of 52 years.

[Speaker 10] (4:07:30 - 4:07:36)

We were high school sweethearts. And now we just have reconnected, you know, after like 40 years. It's like being 16 again.

[Speaker 3] (4:07:37 - 4:07:42)

I got a lot of things to be happy about or positive about. And people are just positive with each other. And then I think it is contagious.

[Speaker 8] (4:07:42 - 4:07:53)

Just to breathe the air. Just to be alive. Just to be happy with who you are and what you do.

There's so much to just make your day perfect.

[Speaker 7] (4:07:54 - 4:08:01)

Oh, that's wonderful. Thank you for sharing that. Yeah, high five.

High five. High five? Yeah.

Yeah.

[Speaker 4] (4:08:13 - 4:08:20)

Where do you feel most at home or at peace?

[Speaker 1] (4:08:21 - 4:08:34)

Wherever I am in the stillness. That is wherever I go, the stillness is there. And that's my home.

I actually feel that being rooted in that as my home.

[Speaker 4] (4:08:34 - 4:08:36)

So are you always happy, Eckhart?

[Speaker 1] (4:08:36 - 4:08:46)

I don't call it happy, although I have used happy occasionally in the book. But it's more a state of peaceful aliveness.

[Speaker 4] (4:08:47 - 4:08:48)

Oh, I love that.

[Speaker 1] (4:08:48 - 4:08:48)

Yeah.

[Speaker 4] (4:08:49 - 4:08:51)

Yeah. Have you lost your ego?

[Speaker 1] (4:08:51 - 4:08:51)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:08:52 - 4:08:53)

You have completely?

[Speaker 1] (4:08:54 - 4:09:02)

Well, let's see. Who knows? Tomorrow it may suddenly appear again.

Let me know if it does. Because I wouldn't know it if it's really the ego.

[Speaker 4] (4:09:02 - 4:09:07)

Really? Because people, if you're acting in the ego, you don't even know it.

[Speaker 1] (4:09:07 - 4:09:09)

If you're really in the ego, you don't know it.

[Speaker 4] (4:09:12 - 4:09:30)

But how can that be so when what you teach us in A New Earth is that to be aware of it. And the more you're aware of it, you can say, because I've been able to see it. Oh, there's my ego.

There's my ego. There it is showing up again. I see it.

I see it. I see it. So there is an awareness.

[Speaker 1] (4:09:31 - 4:09:31)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:09:31 - 4:09:32)

Because mine's still alive.

[Speaker 1] (4:09:32 - 4:09:45)

But that's already, the shift is already happening. The awareness is there. You're not totally in the grip of it because the awareness arises also.

But there are many others who are still totally in the grip.

[Speaker 4] (4:09:45 - 4:09:51)

So if you're totally in the grip of it, you can't be aware that it has shown up. Finish this sentence. The world needs?

[Speaker 1] (4:09:52 - 4:09:53)

Spiritual awakening.

[Speaker 4] (4:09:54 - 4:09:57)

Awakening. I believe in?

[Speaker 1] (4:09:59 - 4:10:00)

Nothing in particular.

[Speaker 12] (4:10:07 - 4:10:13)

Oh, that cracks me up.

[Speaker 4] (4:10:14 - 4:10:22)

That is an LOLer. Okay. Love is.

Love is.

[Speaker 1] (4:10:23 - 4:10:32)

The recognition of yourself, the essence of yourself in the other. The recognition of the essence of who you are in the other.

[Speaker 4] (4:10:32 - 4:10:33)

In the other?

[Speaker 1] (4:10:33 - 4:10:39)

In the other. You recognize yourself in the other. As the other.

The oneness.

[Speaker 4] (4:10:39 - 4:10:41)

The oneness of all life.

[Speaker 1] (4:10:41 - 4:10:42)

The recognition of oneness.

[Speaker 4] (4:10:43 - 4:10:47)

Wow, that is love. That's a good definition. I'm grateful for?

[Speaker 1] (4:10:48 - 4:10:59)

I'm grateful for always this moment. The now. No matter what form it takes.

[Speaker 4] (4:10:59 - 4:11:04)

That's great. That is great. This was fun.

[Speaker 1] (4:11:04 - 4:11:04)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (4:11:06 - 4:12:20)

Wow, I believe in nothing in particular. That's the first time anybody is like that. I believe in nothing in particular.

That's great. In today's breathing space, I can't think of a more joyful place to be than here at a dog beach along the shores of Lake Michigan. As Eckhart Tolle wrote in the book, The Guardians of Being, just watching an animal closely can take you out of your mind and bring you into the present moment.

Which is where the animal lives all the time. Surrendered to life. That's probably one of the reasons we love our dogs as much as we do.

See you next Sunday.

[Speaker 12] (4:12:38 - 4:12:39)

Welcome.

[Speaker 1] (4:12:42 - 4:45:01)

It's time again to talk about, experience another book. And what I've chosen for today could be called one of the greatest spiritual treasures of humanity. It has also been called India's greatest contribution to the world.

The name of the book, which I have here, well, I have four books here, but it's just different translations of the one book. The name of this book is, of course, some of you will know it. Some may know it quite well and others may never have heard of it.

The Bhagavad Gita, which means translated something like the song of God or the divine song. The book dates back to very ancient times. Nobody knows exactly how old it is.

Some people say it's 2000 years old. Others say it's pre-Buddhistic. Which would date it older than 2,500 years.

And others say, as it's claimed on the back cover of one of the translations that I have here, says that this book is 5,000 years old. That doesn't really matter. It certainly is ancient.

But we are not looking at it from an analytical or academic point of view. So whether it's 2,000 or 5,000 years old doesn't really matter because a book of this kind is timeless. It has survived thousands of years because it goes far beyond the culture out of which it came.

It transcends the particular culture out of which it arose in the same way that the Tao Te Ching transcends culture. The language the book was written in is, of course, the ancient sacred language of India. It's called Sanskrit.

The author is unknown. And the book is presented as a dialogue between disciple and Krishna. Krishna was a spiritual teacher or an incarnation of the divine.

Krishna, we know very little about Krishna or whether an actual person once lived long before the Buddha whose name was Krishna. It probably is the case that there was such a being. It is also likely, by the way, that his name, Krishna, is related to the originally Greek term Christos, Christ, Krishna, Christos, referring to an enlightened being.

But in this book, Krishna is the mouthpiece of, verbalizes the teaching. The disciple is Arjuna. His name is Arjuna.

And he asks Krishna questions. And Krishna gives a spiritual teaching, which is the book, the Bhagavad Gita. If you haven't read it yet, I suggest that you do.

There's a wide choice of translations, all different. This book is the Penguin Classic. Whether the cover is still the same as here, I don't know.

And when I opened it the other day, I saw that I put the date in here when I bought this book, 1977. Miraculously, it survived. I lost most of my books because I moved around so much.

But this one miraculously stayed with me. And this is when I first read it and immediately realized how profound it is. And I still have many things underlined in it.

The translation is by somebody called Juan Mascaro, a Spanish person, but he was bilingual in English, Spanish, and he also was a scholar of Sanskrit. A good poetic translation, I recommend it. Another good translation is Stephen Mitchell's translation, the Bhagavad Gita.

Again, somewhat different, also very good. The translation that we are going to use here, it wasn't easy to decide which translation to use here. But I decided on this very unusual translation by Jack Hawley, the Bhagavad Gita, A Walkthrough for Westerners, it's called.

Translated by Jack Hawley, published by New World Library, who, by the way, also published The Power of Now and Stillness Speaks. And this is a highly unusual translation. It is a free translation.

It is not particularly poetic. So some of that poetry that is there, of course, much more strongly in the original than in any translation, some of the poetry is lost. However, what is gained is greater accessibility, especially for Western readers.

And purists might frown upon this translation, but I believe it's the one that is the easiest at least to start with. Once you have absorbed the content, you can have a look at a more poetic translation. This translation successfully, from time to time, incorporates what one could call almost an interpretation, a brief interpretation into the text, but it's so well incorporated that you don't actually notice it.

So sometimes when certain terms are mentioned that are not explained in the original or in any of the other translations, the translator builds into the translation a very brief explanation of the term, not as a separate footnote, but as part of the text, and that most of the time works quite well. When you begin reading the Bhagavad Gita, you will, of course, you start with chapter one, and there you encounter the one, the greatest stumbling block, chapter one. Now I have to explain why that is a stumbling block.

Many people start reading it and give up before they reach the end of chapter one, but that's not necessary. Chapter one is not particularly important as far as the whole of the Bhagavad Gita is concerned. The reason why it's there, chapter one concerns Arjuna's question to Krishna whether Arjuna is a warrior, whether he should fight this impending battle or not.

Now before I explain that further, one thing needs to be mentioned. This scripture, this sacred scripture, the Bhagavad Gita, was at some point incorporated, put into a huge epic, the world's longest religious, to some extent, epic called the Mahabharata. It's a long epic.

It's about warfare between, one could say, the good side, the evil side, but all the people who are engaged in this, the kings and the princes, are related. So it's the Mahabharata is a huge epic about struggle between good and evil. It's not particularly spiritual.

It's interesting, but not particularly spiritual. And then suddenly in the middle of that, as they're about to fight a huge battle, there's Arjuna in his chariot and Krishna, the charioteer. And suddenly in the middle of this, just before the battle starts, on the huge army on the left, another huge army on the right, Krishna, Arjuna asks Krishna, I don't want to fight this battle.

And Krishna says, but you should fight because that's your duty. And so many people have questioned that advice and said, why is the incarnation of God telling Krishna to engage in warfare? And that's a legitimate question.

The answer, you can choose which answer most appeals to you, could be that it is used metaphorically, which means carry on doing what you are doing, engage with life and don't withdraw from life, but engage with life. And you'll see that's part of the teaching is to engage with life, not to withdraw from action, but to be active. So it could also be seen metaphorically as the warfare against the false self.

The reason could also be that the first chapter provides a link between the rest of the epic and the Bhagavad Gita. The rest of the epic is about warfare. So that it doesn't look totally alien, the first chapter is a link between what happens in the epic and connects it to it.

It's a little bit like, let's say, give an analogy, you have soap operas. I hope Indian people are not offended if I compare the Mahabharata with a soap opera, but basically it's big egos fighting each other. So it's a soap opera.

Let's say you had a soap opera, like a long running, extremely long soap opera. In England, perhaps they have the longest running soap opera called Coronation Street on television. It's about a working class street where things happen all the time, dramas unfold, and so on.

And people meet in the pub every day. So imagine one of the, out of 500 episodes of Coronation Street, one episode suddenly starts like this. The people meet in the pub again, drinking their beer, and suddenly somebody walks in who is an incarnation of the divine and starts talking to the characters there who ask questions, say, well, what about our lives?

What do we do? And suddenly this character gives a spiritual teaching and that the entire episode of this Coronation Street is the spiritual teaching that is given in the pub there. And the next episode is the usual thing.

You carry on. So this, and of course, somehow you'd have to connect this with the rest of the episodes. So there would be an introductory remarks, perhaps by this person who walks in that connects it somehow to the rest of the episodes.

So here we have an analogy of how the Bhagavad Gita fits into the Mahabharata. And so the interesting thing happens then as this dialogue begins to unfold, the entire action, the army on the left, the army on the right gets frozen as if imagine suddenly everything, nothing moving anymore except the two characters in the middle, Arjuna and Krishna. So while the dialogue unfolds, the entire length of the book, the armies don't move.

Nothing moves. So everything gets frozen. So imagine visually huge army preparing for battle and suddenly everybody's, it's not mentioned as such, but that's how it is.

And while they talk, the armies just seem to disappear. They don't play a part in this anymore. So they're in the middle of the battlefield before the battle, but everything freezes.

And then the teaching is given. So the first chapter, you can just quickly read through knowing that it provides a link to the rest of this epic. And then it really starts with chapter two.

And occasionally even in chapter two, there's still occasional brief mentions of the battle, but mostly that's the actual beginning of the teaching. And most chapters, chapter two is no exception, already contain the entirety of the Bhagavad Gita. So the main themes occur again and again in every chapter.

So all we need to do today perhaps is look at chapter two, which already really contains the essence of it, especially one particular teaching. And perhaps we'll also look at one other segment in a later part of the Bhagavad Gita as before we finish our session today. And again, as is usually the case, when we talk about a book, it is ultimately not about the book.

It is ultimately about you. It's about consciousness. It's about spiritual awakening.

So it's a spiritual teaching seen through the eyes of this particular book. It's not something external to you ultimately. It's not an academic subject.

You can look at this as an academic subject too, but you can go to university and study it, but then it's no longer truly alive. And so Krishna begins to teach Arjuna about, begins already with a profound teaching about death and eternal life. And Krishna says, this is in chapter two, which I don't start from the very beginning, but a little bit into chapter two, there has never been a time when I, or you, or any of these kings and soldiers here did not exist.

And there will never be a time when we cease to exist. Physical bodies appear and disappear, but not the atma, which could be translated as the soul, the spirit, the life force, the formless. So physical bodies appear and disappear, but not the atma that lives within them.

This life force comes and dwells in a body for a while. While they're in, it experiences infancy, childhood, youth, and old age. And then upon death, passes eventually to a new body.

Changes such as death pertain to the body, not the atma. The wise person does not get caught up in the delusion that he or she is this body. This delusion is the very definition of ego.

So the importance, he points out the importance of not identifying with the physical form, because the physical form dissolves quickly. And if you've ever experienced, looked at a dead body, even a dead body of an animal, a pet, your dog, your cat, and even more so the dead body of a human being, then it's so obvious and so clear that that is just a shell, that that being never was the body. It's never more clear than in the moment when the spirit has departed, the animating presence is no longer animating that physical form, after which very quickly, of course, it dissolves.

It's no longer, it's so clear, even beyond, you don't need to think about it, that that person never was the body. That this is just an empty shell that's left. And if you wait for long enough, you can see the empty shell dissolving very quickly.

Just a few days and it's unrecognizable. And so this doesn't require a lot of thought to see, to realize something that's so obvious. Because something that was there is no longer there animating this form.

And therefore, the true being was never that physical form. Now, you might have mistaken it, but now it's totally, if you didn't know it before, and once you realize that, then you can look at all the people in your life, whether they're close to you or anybody, but particularly, perhaps, people who are close to you and see that the essence of who they are is not their body, their physical body. And if you go a little deeper, then you see that the essence of who they are is not their physical body.

It's not their psychological form either. The psychological entity, the me entity. I have often spoken about that, so I won't go into that now.

But just here's the immediate realization then that to equate the body with who somebody is or to equate the body with who you are is an illusion. Arjuna, Krishna addresses Arjuna. Arjuna, he says, the contact of bodily senses with objects and attractions in the world creates feelings like sorrow or happiness and sensations like heat or cold.

But these are impermanent, transitory, coming and going like passing clouds. Just endure them patiently and bravely learn to be unaffected by them. So he's teaching to accept whatever sensory perception arises to accept it as it is.

And talks about sensations like heat and cold and other physical sensations arise and if you don't react to them you step out to some extent of identification with form because the more you react against something the more you get trapped in form, identification with form. It says here, contact of bodily senses with objects and attractions in the world creates feelings like sorrow or happiness and sensations like heat or cold. One could differentiate that a little bit more.

On the one hand you have sensations that arise as you go through life, pain sometimes, but happiness and sorrow arise not really immediately through sensations but through a mental interpretation of sensations. So you need to look of course how your mind interprets what's happening around you, how your mind interprets your sensory input and see that the happiness, the misery, it's a mental choice, it's a judgment of the mind rather than the immediate sensory perception. The serene person unaffected by these worldly feelings and sensations is the same in pain and pleasure and does not allow him or herself to get disturbed or sidetracked.

This is the person fit for immortality. Realize this and assert your strengths, Arjuna. Do not identify your true self merely with your mortal body.

So it's through, it really comes down to accepting what is, whether it's a physical thing or a situation, accepting what is rather than reacting. Now an interesting sentence here, if you do not get disturbed by the external things that happen, then you are the person, as it says here, fit for immortality. That's an interesting thing to say because on the one hand, they just said that the essence of every human being is immortal.

And then here they say, it's when you not identify with external forms and sensory perceptions, but allow them to be, then you are fit for immortality. So one would need to add here what Krishna is talking about is conscious immortality, to be conscious of your own immortality, which is very different from unconscious immortality. When you are not conscious of your immortality, there's great fear of death.

So conscious immortality is realizing within yourself the essence of who you are beyond the form. That is conscious immortality. And you can only realize the essence of who you are beyond the form if you don't react continuously to the forms that arise around you as sensory perceptions.

Situations, people, they all become sensory perceptions. If you live in reactivity, I want to have that, I must introduce you, then of course you're trapped more and more in form, especially psychological form. So allowing things to be, not being dependent on externals is part of the spiritual practice, is part of realizing yourself as formless consciousness.

So this is the teaching of detachment. Without detachment, you can talk about spiritual things for a hundred years and talk about God in every other sentence, and it makes no difference. There's nothing spiritual in anything you say or believe in.

Without detachment, the spiritual dimension is not open, hasn't opened up. And Krishna continues, real as used in spirituality means that which is eternal, never changing, indestructible. This is a very definition of reality.

That which is real in spiritual language, spiritual terms, that which is real never ceases to be. Anything that is impermanent, even if it lasts a very long time and seems durable, eventually changes and thus does not have true reality. The wise ones understand the difference between the real and the not real.

When you fully understand this profound fact, you will have attained the zenith or pinnacle of all knowledge. This needs to be qualified a little bit. He says, when you fully understand this profound fact, which is the difference between real and unreal, now this translation here may not be the ideal one because it's not, this gives the impression that there's intellectual understanding required for you to realize the real.

So when he says, when you fully understand this profound fact, it really means when you fully realize this profound fact, understanding would be an intellectual work, analytical work. And just, oh, now I get it. The real doesn't change and the unreal is whatever changes.

I'm beginning to understand now. No, that's not it. So it's not understanding as such, it's realizing.

So I would suggest a different translation here. When you fully realize this profound fact, you will have attained the pinnacle of all knowledge. And how do you realize that?

Well, that's what it's all about, to realize that in you that's not subject to change. Well, where is that? Well, you could approach it very simply.

What is it that never changes in your life? One could ask.

[Speaker 12] (4:45:04 - 4:45:06)

Well, I don't know.

[Speaker 1] (4:45:07 - 7:17:36)

Well, if you look closely, you see one thing never changes. Your life is always now. It's always the present moment.

It has never not been the present moment, undoubtedly. No, could it ever not be the present moment? So your life is always the present moment.

Not what happens in the present moment that changes, but it's always the space of the present moment. That space, that there's content in it, but in itself it is just space for the content, that is unchanging. And that is consciousness, not the content of consciousness.

The space of consciousness. And so if you become acutely aware of the present moment as the very foundation of your life, or the very essence really of who you are, you are the present moment in which everything arises and then disappears again. Forms come and go.

What he talks about, the impermanence of all forms. Therefore, the forms are not ultimately real. Only that which is beyond form is real.

So what arises in the present moment is not ultimately real, but that which gives rise to it is real. It's consciousness itself. One's body, then Krishna says, is not real.

Not in those terms. And yet there is something that dwells within the body that is real.

And it is called here the atma, which is existence itself, says this translation.

I would suggest another translation here, which is being itself. Because it's not existence, because existence is something that stands out, that has form. X means out, Latin.

Sistens, standing. So he's not talking about existence. He's talking that which underlies existence, which is being.

But then he suggests two other terms for it. Awareness or pure consciousness, which is correct. So I'll read one more time this little part.

One's body, then, is not real. And yet there is something that dwells within the body that is real. The atma, which is being, I've changed the translation, which is being itself.

Awareness, pure consciousness. The wonderful thing, just a brief mention, when you are in touch with the truth within yourself, the truth of being, of who you are, and you read a spiritual text or the translation of a text or something handed down over centuries, you can immediately see what's wrong or what's right. I can see what's wrong or right in this translation without knowing Sanskrit.

Because immediately you see it, oh, that's the wrong translation. Don't even need to look up what the original is because the truth is realized within. And whether or not it's accurately shown when you see a text, you know it immediately.

I'll just, again, I'm jumping ahead now just to illustrate what I just said. In the same, still chapter two where we are, just a little bit further, it says this, just an illustration of what I just said to you. A reservoir that is necessary for a person during a dry spell is of little use during a flood.

Similarly to the enlightened person, even scriptures are superfluous. Yes, live amicably with worldly existence, but know you must transcend it. Prepare yourself for nothing less than union with divinity itself.

The important part here that I, why I read it is a reservoir of water that is necessary during a dry spell is of little use during a flood. So to the enlightened person, the scriptures are superfluous. You don't need books and scriptures anymore, but you may enjoy them.

And if something is not correct in them, also the mistranslation or because it's been misquoted, trans had been like some of the sayings of Jesus. You can, when I first saw the New Testament after my shift in consciousness and read it, I could see the truth of it. And I also saw occasionally that can't be right.

That's not how it is. So how the person, the evangelist or whoever wrote it had misinterpreted the original teaching. So that's a wonderful thing.

You recognize the truth when you see it. And when it's not quite right, you immediately know it. So he talks about the reality of who you are beyond the physical form.

And the next sentence here is, get to know this reality. It pervades the entire cosmos and is unchanging and indestructible. No power can affect it.

No one can change the changeless. And I like that translation, get to know this reality, which is better than understand because you can't understand it. It pervades the entire cosmos and is unchanging and indestructible.

This Atma is like space or sky. Clouds appear in the sky, but their presence does not cause the sky to grow apart to make room for them. In the same manner, the Atma, the true self within, remains ever itself.

Things of the material universe come and go, appear and disappear, but the Atma never changes. So I often, of course, use space also as one of the most appropriate words to point to that formless essence of all life. It is like space.

What we experience as space, and you can't even experience space, but somehow it's there. The Atma, the real us, was never born, nor will it ever die. This eternal reality within is never destroyed.

When your ego takes over and you erroneously identify yourself with the body, you feel that physical death is death to the self, and that is frightening. But the self, the Atma, can never be killed. When the body is slain, the Atma remains unaffected.

As a person sheds a worn-out garment, the dweller within the body casts aside its time-worn human frame and dons a new one. The cessation of your present pain and sorrow will depend on how well you overcome your ignorance of your true self that lives within you. So the only way of being free of suffering, of sorrow, is to overcome the ignorance of your true self that lives within you.

And then it continues to talk more and more again. We're still in the same chapter of the nature of the self. It's in some way repetitious, but that is how the reading of it, or the listening to it, can in itself become a transformational process if you listen in a state of openness and receptivity.

So I'll read just another two little paragraphs. He says, nothing new now that hasn't already been said, but in slightly different words, repeats the same, to drive it home, to drive it into you, where the truth can be recognized, not by the ego, but by the underlying intelligence. It is not easy to fathom this mysterious concept of the true self.

Everything else in the world changes. Every creature, rock, blade of grass, human being, element or component of any kind changes. Only the atma never changes.

Because it is never modified, it is termed immutable. Because it is invisible, has no form and cannot be heard, smelled or touched, it is termed unmanifested. Because the human mind cannot perceive or conceive it, it is said to be unknowable.

Unknowable means you cannot understand it. Ah yes, he actually says that. No one really understands the atma.

One person sees it as wondrous, another speaks of its glory, another say it's, others say it is strange. And there are many who listen but do not comprehend it at all. Very few even think of inquiring into what is beyond this physical world.

Humans who are not ready yet for this realization have no interest in even asking the question. They continue to be identified with form, believing that that is all there is and all they want and all they need. And as they continue to be identified with form, gradually their suffering grows.

Increases more and more until finally something in them cracks open. A little crack appears in their otherwise impenetrable form identity and then they begin to be open to the deeper message. Open to, they begin to, they can then suddenly hear the truth of this and then want to know more, go more deeply into it.

And we'll skip a few paragraphs now. In the next sentence here, there's a brief reference again to the battle but already it's used metaphorically. Rather than the real battle, heed this important point about life in general.

The way to win this great war is to react alike to both pain and pleasure, profit and loss, victory and defeat. You may remember I wrote in the A New Earth about the Zen master who, when accused of having done something, falsely accused, all he ever said is, is that so? He immediately accepted.

He reacted alike to pain and pleasure, victory and defeat. Just completely at one with the is-ness, as I sometimes call it, of the present moment. That's what it is.

So the way to this realization is the inner alignment, the inner oneness with what is now. And the spiritual practice is, as I sometimes put it, saying yes to whatever arises in this moment. So pain or pleasure, it is what it is at this moment.

Profit or loss is what it is. Victory or defeat is what it is. But it also implies, it's not that you become devastated when there is a defeat, you lose your job, but also means when there is a victory or gain, you don't become ecstatic.

You say, oh, that's nice. Well, okay. You don't go, well, yeah, I got it.

Yeah, yeah. Because you're creating a high and before you know it, the thing that created that high is taken away from you or dissolves or loses its ability to make you feel that. And then you, oh, no.

So the continuous dependency on external factors. So the good and the bad is accepted as it is. But you can only do that when you are rooted in the stillness of being and know that as the source of all satisfaction.

Then the defeat does not remove that and the victory doesn't really add anything to that. It's just what happens in the world of form. Things come and go.

Things are given and taken away. And now we come still in the same chapter to what some people, including Mahatma Gandhi, who read the Bhagavad Gita throughout his life, whenever he needed inspiration, he would go back to it. And according to him, what comes now and other interpreters and teachers is the central, the most important teaching of the Bhagavad Gita.

So Krishna continues to speak. You have now heard an intellectual explanation of the principle of atma, the true self, and of the need to discriminate between the real, the unchanging, and the not real, anything that changes. Now pay attention while I explain a practical spiritual discipline called karma yoga for living a more effective, happier life in this vexing, ever-changing world.

This is the path of selfless, God-dedicated action. By making this your path, you can live a spiritual life and yet stay fully active in the world. You can remain a man of action, achieving your very best, and yet not be bound or caught by the worldly.

So the term is karma yoga. Of this spiritual practice, yoga, don't think of yoga as the physical yoga that's only a small aspect of the larger yoga. Yoga means union.

So it's union with God. Karma yoga, karma, the literal meaning of the word karma is action. So when we usually talk about karma, we talk about action and reaction, and reaction, reaction, but the meaning of karma is action.

So karma yoga means union with God, the universal spirit, consciousness, through action. This was a revolutionary teaching, and for many people it still is. Traditionally in India, many other places too, the only way people thought you could achieve spiritual awakening was to withdraw from the world and become a hermit, become a monk, to renounce, to become a renunciate, renounce all worldly goods, renounce involvement in the things of this world.

That was traditionally what was regarded as the only way to spiritual awakening. And here in the Bhagavad Gita, Krishna teaches that yes, renunciation is one of the possible paths to spiritual awakening, but it is not the one for most humans. And he teaches that there is another path that does not involve turning away from involvement in worldly things.

Now he explains further what karma yoga is. When one's actions are not based on desire for personal reward, one can more easily steady the mind and direct it towards the atma, the true self within. For the person of steady mind, there's always just one decision.

Your attention is on being, on consciousness. But for the quivering mind pulled in a thousand directions, the decisions that plague it are endless and they exhaust one's mental strength. Further explanation of what karma yoga is, work hard in the world, but for work's sake only.

That's the translation here. Now that I've scribbled here, I looked it up, how this person, Mascaro translates the same sentence and it's quite beautiful. And this sentence is the essence of karma yoga, that spiritual practice.

Set thy heart upon thy work, but never on its reward. And there we have the essence of the whole thing. And that becomes a spiritual practice.

Now what does it mean exactly? Set thy heart upon thy work. Give whatever, and work does not just mean the work that you do for a living.

Work means any action that you perform. Set thy heart upon thy work means give whatever action you perform in this moment your fullest attention. Do it fully, be fully in it.

But never, don't set your heart on its reward. Setting your heart on its reward means where's your attention? Most people who don't live like this, they don't practice karma yoga.

When they perform an action, whether it's the work they do for a living or any action that they perform from the most insignificant things to wiping a table clean or making a cup of tea or putting on your shoes. These are all actions. But for most people, they set their heart, to use the terminology used here, upon the reward of the action.

Now the reward of the action comes, of course, is not now. It's a future thing. You're focusing on some desired outcome.

So in other words, large part of your attention is not in what you're doing. A large part of your attention is on the future moment that you want to get to through this particular doing. And when I say large part of your attention is on the future moment that you want to get to, what I'm really saying is that a large part of your attention is in your mind, in your thoughts, rather than in the doing.

Because the future that you want to get to is no more than thought forms. There is no actual future anywhere, ever. So when you are focused mentally on the reward in the terminology of the Gita, you're really trapped in thought patterns of future.

Those thoughts of future reward, outcome, where I want to get to, what I want to achieve through this, takes attention away from the doing itself. And the doing becomes inferior in your mind to the desired outcome. And so the energy that flows into the doing is karmic energy in terminology of this.

It creates further suffering. And you're already, you're not connected to the deeper intelligence within you when you are focused on the reward of the, sometimes it's called also the fruit of your action in some translations. So when you are focused on the action itself, then the ego is no longer operating through you.

The egoic self, the false self, is no longer performing the action. But you connect with a deeper level within yourself when you are fully giving your fullest attention to what you are doing. Egoic action is always a means to an end.

This is why the ego also, every human being the ego meets becomes somehow a means to an end. You're never, the ego cannot fully appreciate the presence or the being of another human being. It cannot honor another human being.

It cannot love another human being. It unconsciously can only use another human being for some egoic purpose. It doesn't know that.

It might even think it's in love with another human being, not knowing that what they call in love is the ego wanting to have this human being in your life because it adds something to who you think you are or it fills a feeling of lack inside you temporarily. And then this other human being is there to make you feel complete. You make me feel complete, but it doesn't work for very long, of course, because that incompleteness is always part of the egoic consciousness.

So this is a vital practice of not, as I sometimes put it, not making this moment, whatever you're doing in this moment, not making that into a means to an end. That's basically the same teaching as the Gita in slightly different words. Don't do anything as primarily, yes, it may also be a means to an end, of course, if you put on your shoes or you put on your pants.

Of course, you know that the end is you want to have the shoes on your feet or you want to have the pants on your body. But while you're putting them on, you can give your fullest attention and appreciation to that movement also. So yes, on the periphery of your consciousness, there is an end that you want to achieve, but the focal point of your attention is on the doing.

That's the reversal of normal consciousness or unconsciousness, where on the periphery, you're aware of what you're doing in the present moment, but your main attention is where you want to get to with that action, the fruit of the action. And that keeps you trapped in the bondage and in ego and in identification with form, in future, in thought.

Set thy heart upon thy work, but never on its reward.

You have every right to work, but you should not crave the fruits of it. Although no one may deny you the outcomes of your efforts, you can, through determination, refuse to be attached to or affected by the results, whether favorable or unfavorable. Desire for the fruits of one's actions brings worry about possible failure.

This is the quivering mind I mentioned. When you are preoccupied with end results, you pull yourself from the present into an imagined, usually fearful future. Then your anxiety robs your energy and making matters worse, you may lapse into inaction and laziness.

So you either get stressed, in continuous stress, or you can't stand it anymore and then you can't do anything anymore. And now a very important statement follows. One does not accomplish great ends in some by and by future.

Only in the present can you hammer out real achievement. The worried mind tends to veer from the only real goal, realizing the Atma, uniting with divinity, the true self within. So you cannot accomplish great ends in some future moment.

Only the present, only in the present, can you hammer out, as he translates, real achievement. So all true achievement is in the present moment, and that determines the quality of your life, as I call it. How present you are in what you do immediately brings quality into what you do.

It's hard to define what I mean by quality if you cannot feel it. There's a, do something totally as a means to an end or observe somebody performing some action, only concerned about the outcome. And you can see what I mean by low quality action.

You'll be doing, going, I want to get, I need to get there to this, not paying attention to really to anything because you have some thought of future outcome. And you get upset at the slightest obstacle that comes into you. Of course, obstacles arise all the time, of course, in one's life.

I want to get there, but then something stops me. And immediately when an obstacle comes in, somebody even questions something. They don't, you get either angry or fearful.

It shouldn't be happening. Whereas if you're aligned with the doing, then when an obstacle comes, immediately it's accepted and you look, you give it attention. And then you see, you immediately adjust to the newly arisen situation and take action.

You don't complain, oh, about somebody or some situation that has arisen. There's no huffing and puffing, as I sometimes call it. Because many humans go through life, huffing and puffing about this, complaining about this, shouldn't be this.

All that drops away because they're huffing, puffing because they have some idea of what they want in some future moment. It's never going to come anyway. So as an obstacle arises, immediately you look at it.

And then intelligent action arises. Because you're aligned with the present moment, you become much more intelligent. Not knowledgeable, necessarily, but intelligent.

Because you connect with a deeper level within yourself. And then what you say and do is more intelligent when you are aligned with what is, instead of trying to get it out of the way. That's the only way you can truly become intelligent.

That is the, that's why there's a book by Krishnamurti called The Awakening of Intelligence. Because that's what it is. The true intelligence is not really awakened at universities.

There you acquire knowledge or you develop your ability to analyze. But it's not yet true intelligence. The ideal, then, Krishna says, is to be intensely active and at the same time have no selfish motives, no thoughts of personal gain or loss.

Duty uncontaminated by desire leads to inner peacefulness and increased effectiveness. This is the secret art of living a life of real achievement. So real achievement is always in the present moment.

How are you dealing with this moment? How are you performing whatever action you are performing at this moment? What is the underlying state of consciousness with which the action is being performed?

That is achievement, to be at one with the doing rather than some future idea. And that is success, true success. True success is a successful present moment.

And a successful present moment is being one with the present moment. And Krishna goes on to say, work performed with anxiety about results is far inferior to work done in a state of calmness. So he's saying something similar to what I just said about quality.

When he says it's far inferior, work performed with anxiety is far inferior to work done in a state of calmness. There's an incredible difference between something done in a state of oneness with what is and something done with some projected goal that I need to get to. Equanimity, the serene mental state free from likes and dislikes, attractions and repulsions is truly the ideal attitude in which to live your life.

To be in this state of mind is to be lodged in the divine. Pitiful are those pulled by the fruits of their action. And Krishna goes on to say that the living in this way gradually eliminates karma from your life.

When you're endowed with this basic detachment, you shed the karmic consequences of both your good and bad deeds, casting aside the inevitable effects of your actions. Never lose sight of the overriding goal, which is to free yourself from bondage during this lifetime, to shed attachment to worldly things, detach from ego and truly release yourself from the wheel of birth and death. When you do this, you actually become one with God.

And Krishna says to Arjuna, I see that you sigh at this breathtaking goal, Arjuna. Know that you can achieve this by first uniting your heart with God and only then pursuing worldly things. Proceed in this order, not in the reverse order, and then your actions will be linked to the very purpose of life, which is again union with the divine.

By first uniting your heart with God, I would put it somewhat differently. First, you need to be rooted in being, which means honoring the present moment, which means being aware of the stillness within you. Being aware that you are aware, being conscious that you're conscious, being conscious of consciousness, that space in you, so that you touch the source of all satisfaction.

And then you act. And then you don't lose yourself in the action. It's a continuous vigilance is required in this practice so that you don't lose yourself in the action.

And then that always means you become stressed or angry or upset or nervous. And there's always something more important that you need to get to and you're lost out there. The knowledge of the true self, which is called atmic wisdom, atmic comes from atma, this is the true self within, is not for all.

Those with agitated, uncontrolled minds cannot even guess that the atma is present here within. So not everybody is able yet to hear the truth of this or even to be interested in this, and that's fine. It just means they have to suffer a little bit more first.

Here's a brief description of how people lose themselves in unconsciousness. Brooding on or merely thinking about worldly attractions develops attachments to them, getting drawn into thought. From attachments to sense objects come selfish desires.

Thwarted desires cause anger to erupt. From anger arises delusion. This causes confusion of the mind and makes one forget the lessons of experience.

Forgotten lessons of experience cloud the reason which results in loss of discrimination between truth and non-truth, real and not real. Finally, losing the faculty of discrimination makes one veer from life's only purpose, achieving union with the divinity within. And so one's life itself is wasted.

One lifetime is wasted, but ultimately nothing is wasted. I'd like to add it's all part of the awakening of consciousness. So what a beautiful teaching.

And we've only looked at one chapter of the Bhagavad Gita. And we've seen the essence of it, union with the one, as it's called, or the divinity within, realizing who you are beyond form and the spiritual practice of karma yoga, which one translator also translates as consecrated action. That's also a beautiful translation of karma yoga, action that is like a consecration of its, this almost like a religious, like a sacramental act, even the most seemingly the most insignificant action that you do.

But let's see. So no matter really where you are in life or what actions you perform, you start wherever you are right now. You don't need to wait for conditions to get better for your spiritual practice or that you can withdraw from the world.

The revolutionary teaching of the Bhagavad Gita, it was revolutionary then, it still is in a way, that everyday life can be used as a spiritual practice. And no matter what form it takes and whatever form it takes for you is the most appropriate one for you at this moment. You have to see that and then start practicing.

And when you no longer resist the present moment, you may also be surprised how quickly certain situations change when the habitual resistance isn't there anymore. How often things change for the better. They're actually kept in place, situations that are difficult are often kept in place by the very resistance.

The unhappiness that arises through that resistance creates further unhappy experiences. And then you end up interpreting everything that happens through your unhappiness. And many humans live like that.

So let's be grateful that such a lovely teaching exists. As I said, this is perhaps the one to start with. If you want to read the Bhagavad Gita, there's so much in there that I would like to spend at least one other session soon going more deeply into some of the other chapters of the Bhagavad Gita.

Here I have a little Bhagavad Gita that I bought many years ago, also survived miraculously, published in India by the Theosophical Society, which has the Sanskrit and the English together. Not that probably you won't understand the Sanskrit, but it's just lovely to look at the writing. I believe the writing is called Devanagari, which means the writing of the gods.

This is a somewhat more literal translation, which you can look at later after you've read the more accessible translation. And I'd like to end from the literal translation of the end of chapter two. So all the chapters end in the following way.

Thus in the glorious Upanishads of the Bhagavad Gita, the science of the eternal, the scripture of yoga, the dialogue between Shri Krishna and Arjuna, the second discourse ended. Welcome. Today, we're going to look at a book again, not an entirely new book.

It's the second, our second session on the ancient Indian scripture called Bhagavad Gita, which translated means the song of God or the divine song. I'll just, as a way of introduction, I'll just for a few minutes talk about the background, Bhagavad Gita. I talked already in more detail at the beginning of the first session on the Bhagavad Gita, which many of you will have already seen.

So the Bhagavad Gita, nobody knows when exactly it was written and nobody knows who wrote it. But it is beyond any doubt, one of the most profound spiritual writings, teachings in existence. Some people say or believe it was written 2000 years ago and some go back as far as 3000 years.

So nobody really knows. And of course, the language it was written in is the ancient language of India, Sanskrit. There are many translations of the Bhagavad Gita.

And if you become interested in it, I recommend that you look at least at two or three different translations. Each translation may have some merit. No translation can be absolutely perfect.

If you really want to get to the bottom of it, you'll have to learn Sanskrit, which will take you 10 years or so, and then you can pick it up. But as an alternative to that, I recommend that you go within and find the source of consciousness within yourself, in which case you don't need to learn Sanskrit for 10 years. Because all any scripture can do is point you back to the source within yourself.

It's a map, not more than that. So some maps are very helpful, but no map is the territory. So don't become a collector of maps.

You can appreciate the maps, but the important thing is the destination, going there yourself. And the translation I will mostly use today is the same, of course, I used in our first session on the Bhagavad Gita. It is a free translation.

This is it, Bhagavad Gita. It's called A Walkthrough for Westerners. And this, I believe, is the most accessible translation.

It's unusual. The purist probably would frown upon it. It's a free translation.

It even incorporates a little bit of interpretation in a very subtle way. It incorporates some interpretation into the translation, which is very helpful for Westerners. Other translations that are very good are the Penguin Classic.

This is, I bought this one in 1977. It has the date in. This is a good translation.

Stephen Mitchell also did a good translation, and various others. So what we'll do today, I'll just select a few passages, brief passages, read them to you, and then comment on them. Now, let's start with a very interesting little passage.

As you may, everybody nowadays is familiar with the scientific theory of the Big Bang, that the universe started an inconceivable time ago out of nothingness, seemingly. The scientists, of course, have no idea. They don't even question what was there before the entire universe came into existence.

But they believe that it all started with a primordial kind of explosion. And what was there before then, nobody can even talk about it, because if there was no universe before the Big Bang, the entire question was, how long did it take for the universe before the universe was born? All that is totally meaningless.

You cannot ask that, because there is no time without the universe. But it is interesting that a scripture written 2,000 or 3,000 years ago already talks about basically this very event and puts it into a larger perspective. So I'll read this to you now, and then we can briefly talk about it.

When Brahma, the creator, that means God, basically, when Brahma, the creator, wakes up at the dawn of each cosmic day, this entire universe and all creatures in it are instantly manifested, only to be dissolved back into the unmanifested, formless at Brahma's cosmic nightfall. So the Bhagavad Gita says that the universe comes into existence when God, of course, it's a kind of analogy, it's not the absolute truth, which could not be expressed in words, but it could be a distant glimpse of the truth. God wakes up, and as God, the primordial one consciousness that underlies all of existence, as God wakes up, the universe begins to come into existence.

And it's called the day of Brahma, the day of God. But there's not only one day, there are many days when the same thing happens again and again. Let's listen to this.

But each cosmic day and night of Brahma lasts thousands of yugas, which are time periods, eons, and each yuga lasts 10,000 to 400,000 years. So it consists of countless periods, each period lasts 10,000 to 400,000 years. The time is all but incomprehensible to humans in succeeding days and nights of Brahma, the same multitude of beings helplessly comes to birth and death again and again as the physical universe continues its expanding and contracting.

So again and again, according to this, it happens that the universe, as God awakens, the universe comes into existence out of the unmanifested and out of nothing seemingly. And then the nightfall comes when the universe returns back into the nothingness out of which it came, the unmanifested. And that, according to this, that is the night of Brahma of God when God goes to sleep.

And here they compare it with human beings, this eternal cosmic play is the same in the microcosm of the individual soul as it is in the cosmos. When an individual goes to sleep, the entire world his or her mind experiences as real withdraws only to come alive again at waking. So there's the general dictum as above, so below.

So everything that is true for the macrocosm must also apply to the microcosm and vice versa. So if we look at certain things within ourselves, we can draw certain conclusions as to the nature of the universe. And this is, of course, something that scientists have neglected so far.

They only look at the outside world to find out how the universe works. But one can also look within into oneself and you can find out things there that you can then apply to the macrocosm. For example, one was mentioned here, you wake up in the morning and then at night you disappear into, especially in dreamless sleep, you disappear into nothingness.

In dreamless sleep, there's absolutely nothing. You kind of, you go back to the source, but you don't know it. Then you wake up again.

Isn't it strange that the entire population of the planet at a certain time, they all suddenly become unconscious as the planet revolves. Well, we are so used to it, we don't even question it, the fact that people go to sleep every night. It's so normal, nobody ever questions it.

But let's say you come from some other planet where things are not like that, although there must be similar things happening everywhere. It's strange that the entire population suddenly drops unconscious. Once every 24 hours, they all go, and then they wake up again.

It's called sleep. And then we also have the heart. The heart expands and contracts as it works, the human heart, it goes.

So you have the same expansion and contraction as it's here described, the expansion and even scientists are talking about it. The expansion of the universe and on a vast, inconceivable scale, the universe, an inconceivable spatial scale, an inconceivable time scale, the entire universe goes, this is the God awakens and becomes the universe, and then it goes just like the human heart. The entire universe goes.

And similarly, the in-breaths and the out-breaths, you could say that the in-breath of the universe is the coming back to the source. That's again, you can observe yourself, you breathe in and out all the time. These are the cycles, the heartbeat, the in-breaths and the out-breaths, waking up, going to sleep.

You breathe in and you breathe out. And so as above, so below, the entire universe in some way, we could say operates in the same way, the out-breath of God and the in-breath of God. Those are the cycles.

Now, when the universe awakens, which would be the big bang, it does not mean there's one slight word here that I would disagree with in this translation, where it says when the creator wakes up at the dawn of each cosmic day, this entire universe and all creatures in it are instantly manifested. I wouldn't say they're instantly manifested, they are gradually manifested. And in some sense, we could say, which it would not be right to say that the universe is completely awake already.

The universe is in the process of awakening. It didn't awaken with the big bang, that was the big bang, it was just like the human going like this in the morning after a good night's sleep, the eyes open a bit and you are just still fairly unconscious. And then gradually more consciousness comes in.

And now the universe is awakening. We are you sitting there, me sitting here, this book, this scripture are beyond what it seems to be on the surface, the universe awakening. One of billions, countless ways in which the universe is awakening.

So we are part of an intrinsic part of the awakening universe and human awakening. Now, I don't mean now the awakening from sleep for humans, but spiritual awakening, human awakening is an intrinsic part of the awakening of the universe. So we are in the midst of the awakening of God, you could say, into this world.

And as God awakens and this one consciousness, which is the light of God, God animates countless life forms, the flower, that the life within the flower, that which animates the flower or the life within your body or the life within your mind, the one underlying consciousness creates forms through which it expresses itself, one could say. And the forms become more complex. It all started with very simple life forms and now become more complex.

Humans are much more complex than microbes or bacteria or even fishes in the sea. So gradually, this is an adventure. So we are not in the universe that's already awake.

We are part and essential part of the awakening of the universe. You are the universe that's awakening. And of course, according to this, there's that cycle of going back.

Why and so on, we can't even go there. Even what we talk about is not the absolute truth. Perhaps it is a distant approximation of what it is like.

No human mind could possibly understand how the universe operates and the vastness of it would be absurd to even try it. But this is just a distant glimpse of what it's like, a very limited way of understanding it. But now we come to a more important part even, Bhagavad Gita continues.

But beyond even the mysterious unmanifested state into which all beings dissolve at cosmic nightfall, there is another unmanifested reality. It is Brahman, the Godhead, the thing in itself that is beyond time, that does not perish even when existence itself dissolves. It is this eternal, absolute thing in itself that is the ultimate goal.

I am that, Arjuna. I am is Krishna talking, which is the personification of the divine. I am that, Arjuna.

Arjuna is the person Krishna is talking to in this dialogue, that is the Bhagavad Gita. All those who come to this ultimate home come to me, that's the ultimate reality speaking, God, never again to be separate, never again to return. So beyond the world of manifestation that we perceive and experience as the universe, there is the unmanifested one life out of which, of course, the entire universe arose.

But this unmanifested one life did not disappear when the universe came into existence, it continues. It is, I would say, it is present within each life form, within you, within me, as God. There is something in you that is one with the source of all life.

The core of who you are is the unmanifested one that was already there when the universe came into existence and never remains at the core of each life form, untouched by time. And human existence and what the true awakening is, is the universe becoming aware of itself as that unmanifested, and that is the spiritual awakening. So as you, the human being, awaken spiritually, you realize that you are not the form that you took yourself to be, that you took to be your absolute reality, the body, the psychological form, the mind, but you realize, you sense something within you.

It's not something, but we have to use language. There's something within you that has nothing to do with the physical body or the thoughts that go through your mind. There's a spaciousness there in between two thoughts, for example, now.

You don't disappear when you're not thinking, when one thought comes to an end and the other one hasn't come yet. There's just a little space there. In that space, there's nothing.

And yet that space in which there's nothing, there is a very subtle presence, but it has no form. It's consciousness itself. And that's the, if it's not the unmanifested, one could say it is the emanation of the unmanifested to use almost poetic language.

So you can sense something within you, an aliveness that has nothing to do with you as a person, but without which the person could not be. There's something formless in you that underlies your personal existence, but is usually overlooked. So to become aware of that, which I sometimes call stillness, that really is the goal of spirituality to know yourself as that.

Now let's look at another little passage here. Now Krishna, the personification of God here explains a little bit more about human life, human existence. It says, I will now explain more about the individual soul, which is called jiva in Sanskrit.

I'm now using for one or two sentences, which I scribbled in here, this translation, which I thought was slightly more, slightly better in this case. A spark of my eternal spirit becomes in this world a living soul, and it draws around its center, the five senses and the mind. So this is again, the divine God, the one consciousness talking.

A spark of my eternal spirit becomes in this world, a living soul, and it draws around its center, the five senses and the mind. A body comes into existence. The atma, which is a part of divinity, atma, a part of this God within, enters into a body in the womb before birth.

Thus, it enters the world of matter. And in this translation, it says, it draws around itself the five senses with the mind as the sixth sense. Now comes a very poetic way of looking what happens.

Like a breeze wafting the scent of perfume, the atma, when it migrates from one body to the next, carries with it the mind and the senses. So the atma is the consciousness, and it carries with it this scent of fragrance of previous existence. That means it brings along the intellect, the ego, the sense of being a separate identity and the lower mind, thought, mind, transferring thoughts and tendencies from previous lifetimes.

The individual soul, because it has drawn the senses around itself, experiences the pleasures, desires, and pains of the world. Now, important part comes now. Now, people who are unaware of the true self within, the underlying atma, the underlying timeless consciousness, do not recognize this soul in them that is using the senses.

As the senses are limited to the mind level, they are incapable of comprehending atma, which is above the mind. The yogi, however, the yogi is the person engaged in spiritual practice or spiritual living. The yogis, however, possessing the eye of wisdom, the yogis, however, possessing the eye of wisdom, do see me, their atmic self within.

The eye of wisdom. The translator here put in brackets intuitive faculty. Now, this is according to the Bhagavad Gita, the faculty of becoming aware within oneself of that which is deeper than the person, it calls the eye of wisdom.

And the translator to explain a little bit, as I said, put in brackets the intuitive faculty. And really, this is what my teaching, it's not my teaching, is all about is of course, becoming aware of yourself as consciousness. So that there is the dimension, the timeless dimension suddenly is realized within you.

And you do it at any moment by becoming aware that you are aware. Like right now, can you become aware at this moment that there is a presence there, that you are awake, that there is an underlying presence, even when you're not thinking, without which you couldn't exist. There's an underlying aliveness, a presence, whatever you want to call it.

You don't have to think to know that. In fact, it's only when there is a gap between two thoughts, you become aware that you haven't disappeared, or that you don't remember your personal history. You don't even, at this moment, you don't even remember your name, you don't need it.

But there is an essential aliveness or presence there. And that is the eye of wisdom that suddenly arises. Knowing yourself as that, you could also say what's left of you when you stop thinking.

Now you can't think about that. The usual tendency when I ask a question like that, that seems difficult to comprehend is you start thinking about it. So when I ask what's left when you stop thinking, then you might say, oh, I have to think about that.

But that's never the answer. So there is that which has assumed form in you, which is the person with its history, and there is that which is timeless and formless that underlies it all, that is actually the essence of your sense of identity, atman, and that is self-realization. It says here, to obtain this eye of wisdom, you must do two things, surrender your ego and purify your mind.

And that is done, I would say, by realizing that you are not your mind. Because if you're identified with every thought that comes into your head, as many humans still are, then basically you are your mind, and beyond the thoughts that go through your head, there is nothing else, that's all you know. And the thoughts that go through your head are conditioned by your upbringing, by your past, by your environment, the country you live in, the time period you live in, your family background, all those things determine what kind of thoughts go through your head.

And all those thoughts that go through your head habitually make up who you consider yourself to be. That's a certain story arises in the mind, and that becomes the mind-made self. And that is the reality for most humans.

And it's also a fact that for most humans, that is a very limited reality. They don't realize how limited their worldview is, how limited all their opinions are. They don't realize that they're inhabiting these little presence in their minds, that's their reality.

And when you're totally trapped in your mind, then you create a lot of conflict because then you, all the other minds become like enemies to you. And then you can become an extremist, whether political or religious, or you just have a lot of conflict in your personal life. You're just totally stuck in your little, in your head.

Cannot recognize your connectedness with nature, your connectedness with other human beings. You're cut off by concepts, by thoughts. And so that's most people's reality.

And spiritual awakening is realizing that there is a dimension in you that is far deeper than that. And that here, according to the ancient teachings, it's Atma, which is the God within, the divine within, whatever you want to call it. And that's a liberation.

That's even just having glimpses of that is liberating, that there's more to you than the little person that before was running your life. And with that, an intelligence comes into your life that is greater than the intelligence of your conditioned mind. And that's what all spiritual teachings are about.

I'd like to read now a poetic passage where the timeless one consciousness talks about itself. And we really have to look at this as a kind of poem rather than philosophy or anything like that. It's quite inspiring.

I am pure consciousness, the underlying essence of all elements and beings. Nothing whatsoever exists separate from my divinity. There's no power in the cosmos that does not emanate from me and belong to me.

The entire universe is suspended from me as if I wear the string in a necklace of jewels. The gems may differ vastly, but the force holding them all together, the central thread is me, divinity. I am the innate nature of everything.

In pure water, I am the sweet taste. In the sun and moon, I am the radiance. In the very center of human beings, I live as virility and courage.

I am the sacred word om, which designates the divine, and I am the sound of it heard throughout the universe. I am the slight delicate scent, the sweet fragrance of the earth. I am the brilliance in both fire and sun.

I am the light of divinity in all beings. I am the subtle spirit in spiritual practices that gives them their existence. I am the love in the devotee, the austerity in the ascetic, or the sweet sense of charity in the giver.

I am the primordial seed of all entities, the power of discrimination in those who are intelligent, the splendor within all resplendent beings and things. Of the strong, I am their might and vigor. As I am beyond all attachments, I am the power in unselfish desire.

I am the subtle force in good actions that puts them in harmony with the welfare of humanity. I am the innate urge to help others. So this is a beautiful poem.

And as you listen to something like that, or if you go back and get the book and read it, it's essential and it really works for you when you not just read it or listen to it with your mind, but you can actually sense something. For example, as this talks about the I am, I am, I am this, and that if you can feel, if you can sense the inherent I am that you are, then it's not just an external scripture anymore. Then the external scripture has become a pointer that actually works.

It points you back to your very source. And then you can go around and you can look at all the life forms in this world and sensing your inherent oneness with them. You see, you look at the flower suddenly.

Of course, there's that one consciousness has given birth to this life form. It's real. That, and so, and you can sense an aliveness within you as you look at that, an aliveness that has nothing to do with who you are as a person.

There is an aware presence there, which is especially noticeable if you don't label the flower mentally. Just look at it. Don't have to call it anything.

A nice, what a lovely flower. You don't need it. Well, if that thought arises, it's fine, but then you can drop it and just, and look.

And what's there when you look at a flower? There's the looking, there's the color, there's the shape, there's the scent or fragrance, perhaps. You can even touch it.

And what else is there when you look at a flower and you're not calling it anything? You're just looking and smelling, perhaps. Is there anything else there then at that moment?

Yes, there is the presence that makes the looking and the perception of the flower possible. There is the consciousness, the light of consciousness in which this perception arises. That is the, in you, the divine, the unmanifested, recognizing itself in the manifested, and seeing that the essence of the flower, sensing that the essence of the flower is one with your own essence.

And then you feel a connectedness that wasn't there before when you had ideas about the flower. When you were talking about the flower, thinking about it or learning facts about it, that may have its place. But if that takes up all your attention, then you live in a very limited world.

So beyond thinking about things and talking about it and labeling it and judging it, make sure there is another dimension in you, present and consciously present, where you can sense that there's a presence in you that makes all this possible. Would there even be a flower if you were not perceiving that flower? If there was no perceiving entity here, what would there be, what we call flower here?

Well, a physicist would, of course, say, well, it's a conglomeration of atoms and molecules. They're dancing around for a while until they separate and go their separate ways. It's not a flower.

There's a dance of atoms and molecules, but somehow the flower is born with the act of perception. And the act of perception is only possible because there's a consciousness there underlying it. And you are that consciousness beyond your personal history on a much more fundamental level.

You are the consciousness of the universe. That's what the entire Bhagavad Gita is really about. When you realize that, you don't need any scriptures anymore, but you might still enjoy them.

Often people make scriptures into gods. They just, oh, this is it. So you externalize again.

Of course, it's only a map or a pointer or signpost. You are the consciousness of the universe, and you can sense that. There's something deeper in you than the person, not separate from it.

The person has come out of it. One could almost say, let's say, you are the ocean and the person is the ripple on the surface of the ocean that appears there very briefly. Tick, tock, tick, tock.

Now, the ripple that only knows itself as the ripple, or a little wave, let's say, if you're a big guy, a VIP, you're a wave. If you're a normal person, you're a ripple. But a wave or ripple, they don't survive for that long.

No wave or ripple survives for that long, and then it's gone. If the ripple on the surface of the water, let's say, that has a certain amount of consciousness, if it only knows itself as a ripple, that's a very limited view of itself because really it is the ocean expressing itself temporarily as the ripple. So if the ripple could realize that it's the ocean in addition to being a temporary ripple, that would add an enormous dimension to its life that it was ignorant of before.

It's true. I mean, if you're just a ripple surrounded by all these other ripples threatening, it's, oh, scary. So you are that.

Another analogy we could use, a ray of sunlight. You could say that you are a ray of sunlight, and the ray of sunlight forgot where it came from and where it continues to come from and what it is connected to and ultimately what it is one with because the sunlight that comes from the sun is not separate from the sun. It really is an extension of the sun.

So when you feel the sunlight on your skin, it's an extension of the sun. If this ray of sunlight couldn't feel anymore its connectedness to the sun, then again, existence would become very limited. So the ray of sunlight needs to suddenly go within and say, oh, I can now feel that I'm connected to this vast thing and I'm just a temporary expression of this vastness.

And suddenly you have a trust in life because you are the vastness and an enormous trust comes in. What is trust? Which in some religious traditions is called faith, but I would prefer to use the word trust because that's really what faith is.

But not trust in some abstract idea, but trust in something that you are being carried. You're one with something vast and you are essentially it. And what is trust?

It's the end of fear. Until you feel the depth of you, that there's more to you than you thought there was, there must be fear. You can't really have trust in life if you cannot feel the life, the true life within you.

So fear goes as you become still and as you become present and you realize the most essential thing about you is consciousness, you're conscious, the light of consciousness. And very much a secondary thing is the person that's the ripple. So there are two ways of looking at a flower.

You can look at a flower as a person and through the eyes of a person in which case you say, what a nice flower. I'd like to give that to my mom on Mother's Day. I will order it tomorrow, whenever it is.

Or, oh, why don't you, I'd like to cut those flowers and take them home or put them, they would look good on my living room table or whatever else. Or you say, oh, this is called such and such in Latin. I know its name and all kinds of things about it.

That's one way, that's fine. That's one way of looking at the flower. Then you look at the flower as a person and for flower, you can take anything else, another human being, anything.

And another way of looking at the flower is to just look and be alert and present as you look without any label and sense the alertness in the background of the looking. Ah, then suddenly there's a depth there. And then more and more you function in this dance between being a person, looking through the eyes of the person, but never, not anymore completely losing yourself as being in this personal sense of self.

Yes, still occasionally applying it. It still occasionally operates in you. It has its place.

Labeling things has its place. Sometimes you need it, but not again losing yourself in all the thoughts that come this, that. Always having access to the spaciousness that's deeper than the person.

Then you become, the life becomes quite wondrous. You look around, but in a fresh, new way. It's always fresh and new.

And the world is then alive again. The more you get trapped in concepts, the less alive the universe is because then the concepts are old. I've seen it all and done it all.

Then they don't look anymore. And of course, then you know it all. It's even worse.

Opinions, trapped in opinions. Now, here's an interesting little paragraph on the Bhagavad Gita. What kind of people become spiritual seekers?

And it divides into, there are four types of persons, according to here. And this still applies very much nowadays. And this was two or 3,000 years ago.

There are four different types of persons who seek spirituality or God. He saw Krishna talks again as the personification of the one. Four types of people seek a connection with me.

One, the world weary. People who worship God for the alleviation of physical or mental agony or to be released from fears and adversity. There's many people, of course, who come to a spiritual teacher or teaching or a spiritual book, come for that reason.

And it is a good reason to be, want to be free of suffering. And of course, the whole Buddha's teaching is about freedom from suffering. So that's one type.

Two, the other seekers of happiness. They are seeking happiness through worldly things. People who pray to God to obtain wealth, family, power, prestige, and so forth.

So they get, they, maybe those are people also who do go into manifest, manifesting things through positive thinking and affirmations. But come out connecting with a somewhat deeper level, yes. In a limited way still, yes.

So they're seeking spirituality because they want something in this world. It still applies. Not that much has changed apparently.

And then there are the seekers of, this number three now, the third group, are the seekers of spiritual advancement. People whose motive for connecting within divinity is to gain knowledge and experience to aid their self-realization. And I would add people also who want to have the high of what they conceive of as the high that surely enlightenment must be.

As I sometimes call it, they want the fireworks, they're waiting for some ultimate experience. So that's another group. I have many like that.

And of course, I'll talk about that in a minute. Number four, these are relatively rare, according to the Bhagavad Gita, are people who want to know God, who truly want to know the atma, the self, who know that God alone exists and whose only impulse is for the divine and nothing else. And those are relatively rare.

I just want God. So the ones numbers whose motive for connecting with divinity is to gain knowledge and experience to aid their self-realization. So we have wanting to be free of suffering, wanting to be happy through this, that, or the other.

Three, wanting knowledge or experience or some high. And four, the direct wanting the one. I just want that.

So it's, of course, Bhagavad Gita says, of these four, the last is the highest because they know my truth and are devoted to me. As I'm supremely dear to them, they are very dear to me. The first three are attached to the worldly objects or mental states they desire.

But certainly all four types are noble because any reason for turning Godward or inwards will in due time lead to spiritual transformation and is therefore ultimately good. So my comment on this is the, it is true that the ones who just want God are rare and that's fine, it's not needed. Wanting to be free of suffering is more helpful.

Those who want to be free of suffering or adversity who've had enough suffering, that is a very powerful motivation for seeking spiritual awakening. It's a more powerful motivation and more likely to lead to realization or awakening than those who are seeking either happiness because they will have to experience that none of the things they seek, even when they get them, is really going to fulfill that purpose of making them happy and fulfilled. And then they begin to suffer.

And so they join group one. So first you're in that group for quite a while and then when you realize, okay, my manifestation is great, it works, but still it's not quite right because nothing fulfills me. Then you go back to group one, you're suffering.

And if you're seeking, now many spiritual seekers seek some kind of enlightenment experience or awakening. And sometimes I get, they write in and say, I've been trying so hard for so many years and it's not happening yet. I want to be free.

I want to be enlightened or whatever they call it. And they are expecting some kind of experience or they believe that if they acquire enough knowledge about it, finally it's going to work. And so they become very knowledgeable.

They can quote all kinds of scriptures. It's all there. And they know more and more about it and more and more.

And for those people, it's quite hard. In fact, unless they join another group, they're not going to make it. But they will have to join another group, which again is group number one, suffering.

Because if you try and try and try to get enlightened and then you get so frustrated, it's just not happening. So you join the suffering group and then you're much more likely to find it. So I'm really very fond of group one, suffering.

As long as you are not identified with yourself as the suffering entity, when that becomes your identity, then you have another problem. But nothing that cannot be addressed and recognized in yourself. Now, the most important teaching in the Bhagavad Gita that runs through, that it's mentioned in almost every chapter is what's called karma yoga, which is a way in which you perform action in this world.

I already briefly talked about it in our first session, but since this is perhaps the central theme and it's the main spiritual practice, one could say recommended in the Bhagavad Gita is to do whatever you do in a certain way. And what that is, I'll explain again briefly. And if you do whatever life gives you to do in a certain way, that will lead to a deepening and spiritual realization.

And that can be really, you can summarize that as in the words of the Bhagavad Gita, do not be attached to the fruit of your action. Which of course simply means, don't look to the goal of what you want to achieve through whatever you're doing now. Give your complete attention to the doing rather than where you want to get to through the doing.

And that's again, a very important lesson nowadays because most humans don't know that yet. They are always one moment ahead. They want to get there.

You may find in your own life still a lot of the time, you are not present moment centered. You are focused on the next moment that you need to get to. So whatever you are doing at this moment is designed to get you to the next moment.

And internally, you project yourself away from what you're doing now because the doing becomes a means to an end. This is very normal. Everybody lives like that.

Whatever they do is a means to an end. And in their mind, the end is more important than what they're doing. That is so habitual and unconscious that most humans don't even know that that is how they live.

That they always live for the next moment but they're never completely in this moment. They also don't know that by living in that way, they create frustration and suffering and stress and discontent. And basically, they're condemning themselves to continuous discontent and to stress because if you ignore the present moment continuously and ignore means, you make it into a means to an end because the next one is so important that you need to get to, then you miss life completely.

You miss the depths that potentially is there in life and life becomes shallow because it's all mental, because the next moment is always a mind formation. The next moment is a mental projection. The next moment is never a reality because it doesn't exist.

When the next moment comes, okay, one minute from now, I've got one minute to finish this. And then after one minute, it's not one minute, it's always now again. And then there's the next thing to do, of course.

Immediately, you look to the next thing because you have become used to being uncomfortable with the present moment, conditioned since childhood to feel ill at ease in the present moment. Oh, I should be doing something and doing implies some future projection. You can never be, you're always doing.

And now the Bhagavad Gita by recommending as a spiritual practice to renounce, as it's called here, to renounce the fruit of your action. Sometimes that is called a sacrifice. And what is really in this ancient terminology, what is to put this into modern terminology is really designed telling you to pay attention to what you are doing in this moment and make this moment the primary focus of your life, whatever you're doing in this moment.

And the secondary focus is what you want to achieve through whatever you're doing. So, and that is called a sacrifice. One could say you sacrifice the future if you renounce the fruit.

It says if you renounce the fruit, a different energy flows into what you do. And then many helpful factors come in. And that is the truth.

And it's a new way of living where you actually, whatever you're doing now, you give it your complete attention. This is more important than what I want to achieve through it. Yes, I know what I want to achieve through it.

But since there's only ever the present moment and nothing else, surely this must be important than the projected future moment. And then you can give your fullest attention to the doing and not to the desired outcome. And also then you are not dependent for your sense of fulfillment on the way things turn out.

Because if you're dependent for your sense of fulfillment on the way things turn out, quite often you will become frustrated because they may not turn out the way you want them to turn out. And especially, and the more dependent you become on the way things are going to turn out, the more likely it is that they're not going to turn out the way you want them to turn out because there's fear in you. And when you need things to be in a certain way, there's already fear in you.

So the fear flows into what you do and contaminates what you're doing now. The quality of your doing is contaminated by fear. And so the very thing that you were dependent on is less likely to happen because the quality of your doing diminishes.

In other words, you are less conscious in the way in which you act. And the less consciousness flows into the way in which you act, the less likely it is that the outcome is going to be productive and satisfying. So the more you depend on a satisfying outcome internally for your wellbeing and sense of identity or sense of worthiness or whatever it may be, the more you depend on the desired outcome, the more likely it is that you're not going to get it.

It'll fail in some way. And that makes life very frustrating. But if your sense of fulfillment is derived from the doing itself, that is that the outcome is secondary.

You no longer need it to make you feel fulfilled. The fulfilling thing is what you're doing now, the attention behind it, the consciousness behind the doing. If you can feel the consciousness flowing through you as you do something with your hands or as you speak or whatever it is you do, relate to other humans.

If you feel that and you enjoy the doing of this moment, in any, let's say you have a business negotiation, the outcome is you want the contract to be signed. And if your focus is excessively on wanting the contract to be signed for the company you work for or whatever, then the quality of your interaction with the other humans, the humans that you need to sign the contract, diminishes. The other human, the other person will intuitively feel your unease.

You are uneasy because you're fearful about the outcome. So will also intuitively feel that you are not truly relating to him or her as a human being. You are making him or her a means to an end unconsciously because you want them to sign the contract.

Now these, the people that you're dealing with, they don't know these things consciously that I just mentioned, but they can feel that and they will feel, no, I don't think I want to sign the contract with this person. It doesn't feel quite right. Whatever, or something will come in, they'll verbalize it in some way.

No, it doesn't feel right. Or they see, bring up some obstacle and magnify it and say, no, no, I can't do that. And then you have the alternative, somebody who doesn't need the outcome, but who gives his or her complete attention to the other person and actually enjoys the negotiation, the talking, enjoys not just what is, not just the words that are being spoken, but enjoys the presence of the other human being there behind the words.

But you can only enjoy the presence of the other human being if you can enjoy your own presence beyond the mental constructs in touch with yourself. So there comes a sense of goodness and rightness in the present moment of being with this other human. So you acknowledge their being.

You're not using them as a means to an end. Primarily, yes, it would still be nice if they signed the contract, you know that, but that is not your primary focus anymore. And if they don't sign it, you're not suddenly turning hostile.

As in many, in the business world, often you find if the people, if you don't do what they want you to do, they become hostile or they walk away, immediately lose interest in you. You haven't signed the deal. And that's quite normal.

The people who are most effective and successful actually are people who perhaps without even knowing it, perhaps because they have good karma, as the Bhagavad Gita would say, they live in this way. They like every moment of it, of interacting with you if you are the client. They love interacting.

They love that present moment. They don't transform the present moment into some means to a future end. And this teaching about renouncing the fruit of your action is the primary teaching of the Bhagavad Gita, which is 2,000 or 3,000 years old.

And still, most humans haven't learned that lesson. But that's all. If you have no other spiritual practice, then this would be quite enough.

And that is making the present moment the primary focus of your life. And not a means to an end. Then if that becomes your practice, you will not make another human being into a means to an end.

Because the only place where you can experience another human being is in this present moment. If you make the present moment habitually into a means to an end, you make this human being that you're encountering in the present moment into a means to an end. And then the quality of your interaction deteriorates, and you won't be loved.

The ego wants to be loved. But since you are not loving, the love can only come when you don't make the other human into a means to an end. Then there is a loving kindness there that flows through you.

Then there is benevolence there, the goodwill is there that is all missing when the present moment is a means to an end. And then all the things that the ego said it wanted, I want to be loved, and I want people to think I'm great. Well, as long as the ego operates in its old usual way, and the ego always operates in its old usual way, you won't get it, the very thing that you needed.

And then as you shift to, I can only be, instead of believing, I can only be happy if the world and other people recognize me and tell me that I'm important. And so you'll be trying to use people in order to get there. When there's a shift, you renounce the fruit of your action.

You begin to enjoy whatever you're doing in the present moment. And then suddenly, suddenly the things that you thought you needed, recognition, people liking you, people recommending you to others, people seeking you out, wanting to come to you, the ego always wanted that. And suddenly you have it when you don't really need it anymore, because the present moment is already fine.

It's good. You're enjoying it. At least if you can't enjoy it, you're surrendered to what is at this moment.

So there is a spaciousness there. And then all the things you thought you needed, as Jesus said, will be added onto you. You get the icing on the cake when you don't need it anymore.

Well, that's the irony. You'll get the things when you don't need them anymore. And you will still enjoy the things, but they won't make you happy because nothing external can make you happy for very long.

The happiness is something deeper that arises out of dwelling fully in the present moment. Then you feel alive and happy. I don't actually use the word happiness that much because it sounds a little bit too superficial, but the true, the true, the joyfulness of being alive, that inner spaciousness.

So that is karma yoga, which means the practice of action. Karma really means action. And yoga in a wider sense is spiritual practice.

And so the Bhagavad Gita here's comments says about this, action normally ties the human being to the wheel of birth and death, but not when performed as an act of sacrifice. So the act of sacrifice means you renounce the fruit of the action. And the terminology of the Bhagavad Gita, you offer up the action to divinity or to God.

That means you're completely present in the doing as if you were offering, whatever you do at this moment is an offering to the universe. And that's a, it's a giving. You actually enjoy the giving.

So that's the offering of this. It's not really a sacrifice anymore because it's quite enjoyable. Sacrifice we think can't be enjoyable.

You give. Then it says here, the action is non-binding. Sacrifice in this spiritual meaning of the word, the translator has added in a very subtle way, a little bit of explanation to the text.

Sacrifice in this spiritual meaning of the word is a universal rule, a fundamental law of nature. Sacrifice as the spirit of giving, which permeates all of creation. This sacrifice is a way for mankind to convert earthly misery into happiness.

So the giving is, you can look at the sun, how the sun pours out energy for millions of years continuously. And that is, according to the Biography of Eden, that is the principle behind the universe is the giving, the outpouring of energy. And that is what you enjoy rather than what you want to achieve through it.

That's a secondary thing. And when you live in such a way, everything changes. When you engage in selfless service, that is really selfless action because when you look to the fruit of the action, you really want something to enhance your sense of self through it.

And so surrendered action is also selfless action. When you engage in selfless service, which is sacrifice, your desires are fulfilled unasked by nature. Righteous people give more than they receive.

Indebted ones get more than they give. The one who receives without giving is stealing. So it's essential to, it's a spirit of giving, giving of yourself, giving of your energy, which is inherently enjoyable.

The eternal is present consciously in every act of service. Work performed with the best of motives becomes sacrifice. Life itself is turned into a sacrifice when directed to the service of divinity.

When people perform service as sacrifice, no matter what their work or profession, the universe itself becomes elevated and sublime. So you transform the universe itself by performing action that is selfless. And important sentence that I just read, the eternal is present consciously in every act of service.

So when you work or act in that way, what does it mean the eternal is present? It means something flows into what you do that comes from a deeper level within yourself than the personal identity consciousness. So as you are present in what you do, the doing becomes imbued with consciousness.

So there's more than, let's take a simple example. I can wipe this table. Let's say there's some spots on this table and I take a cloth to wipe a table.

I can wipe it wanting the fruit of the action, which is just want to get this done. And what I really want is the clean table. I'm not particularly enjoying the wiping of the table because I want a clean table.

And you can feel when you do that, certain energy frequency flows into what you do. And it can be very extreme, it can be even angry. Oh, this is dirty again.

At least I want it clean or in a very subtle way, just in any case, what you want is the fruit of the action. You're not enjoying the movement or the energy that flows into the movement or the sounds that the cloth makes on the surface or the sound that comes out of the cloth. Scent of spray that you use to clean the table.

You don't enjoy all that. That's a means to an end. Or you can actually go, and it smells quite good and you can feel the cloth and you can enjoy the movement of it.

You do the same thing, maybe slightly more slowly, maybe not even that. And it's the same thing. And if you are, you can feel it.

It feels different the way, to it in that way. It feels different because the energy that flows into it is of a different kind or of a different frequency. And it says in the Bhagavad Gita that the work performed like this, the eternal is present in every act of service like that.

So consciousness itself moves through you beyond the personal sense of self. Consciousness flows into what you do. Presence, as I sometimes call it, flows into what you do and it becomes a lovely thing.

And of course, yes, at the end, the table is clean. When you started, the table was not clean. But you are not more fulfilled or happy at the end than you were during the action.

In fact, the end is only insignificant compared to the doing because you're always doing something. So that's just a tiny example. Just you can take another example, going from here to there.

Again, is it just a means to an end? Or driving from here to there, driving to the store to buy something. Is that trip, let's say it's 10 minutes, is that something that you would rather not be engaged in?

You would rather be at the store already, in which case your mind is somewhere else. It's already where it wants to be or some total, I just need to get there. And then you run into the store and then you're looking for what you need.

Where is it? Oh, it's there. Okay, and then you run back to the cash.

Okay, but there's a line up. Oh, what are they? Why are they so slow?

Oh God, I need to be back home. And then finally you get to, you pay for it. Then you go back to the car and another 10 minutes driving back home.

Then you got into the kitchen and the wife is there. Oh, come on, let's get, we're running late. Get on with that.

We need to get this done by, okay. Always, always trying to get somewhere, but never quite getting there. And then your whole life like that.

It wasn't just an episode of half an hour. It's basically your whole life like that. No, that's not a pleasant way to live.

And how could it be? It could be that you actually enjoy the drive to the store because that's the present moment. Why can't you enjoy the drive to the store and look and enjoy even when you're stopping at the traffic light, it glows red.

Well, it's alive. It's a deep red color. That too is a form of life produced by humans, but it's an energy there.

An energy feed can even, you can look at the sky for a while. You can look at the trees. You can enjoy the movement of the car and the people that walk around.

There's all movement of life everywhere and you're breathing and it's fine and you do the same thing, but you're in it fully. It's beautiful. You can enjoy even going from one aisle to another and looking for it, and you don't even have to slow down to enjoy what you're doing.

Sometimes you may want to slow down, it's fine, but at other times when you actually need to go somewhere, be somewhere, you can enjoy or even doing something fast as in Zen saying, you might know the Zen saying, hurry slowly. That's what they tell you, hurry slowly. What does that mean?

How can I hurry slowly? That means if you have to hurry, keep the slowness inside you where you're totally present. Then you actually feel a centeredness even while you're running and actually enjoy the running.

Why can't you enjoy running to get back home or whatever? It all comes back to present moment. That's all there is.

You achieve what you want to achieve, but you will be assisted by the power behind all creation. That's a, don't believe me, you have to start living this way and find out for yourself whether this is true or not, whether you are assisted by the power behind all creation when you begin to live in such a way, present moment centered, then things actually turn out better. Not always absolutely perfect, doesn't mean nothing will ever go wrong again, so to speak.

No, but even the going wrong is all part of the isness of this moment. So that's the spiritual practice of karma yoga in the Bhagavad Gita. And so humans have for two or 3000 years been reading these things and a few managed to do it, but most don't know yet that there is another way to live.

And that's what it is. There is another way. Now you have nothing to lose by trying it out.

If it doesn't work, do it for months. If it doesn't work, you go back to your old way. But how could it not work?

How could enjoying what you do in the present moment, how could one even say it doesn't work? So this is the walkthrough for Westerners. This is the Penguin Classic.

I don't know whether it still has the same picture on it. Let me just finish by reading just a few from this translation, which is slightly different in character. The visible forms of my nature are eight.

This is an ancient division. Earth, water, fire, air, ether, the mind, reason, and the sense of I, which is a mental self. So these are the physical forms of my nature.

My nature means divinity is speaking. The visible forms of my nature are eight. Everything here is made up of these elements, it says, which is also in the West, I had a similar view.

Earth, water, fire, air, ether. And then comes the non-material, the mind, the intelligence, the mental sense of self. But beyond my visible nature is my invisible spirit.

This is the fountain of life whereby this universe has its being. All things have their life in this life. And I am their beginning and end.

So beyond my visible nature, all the things you can see, the things that you can think, your sense of your mental sense of self, the egoic sense of self, beyond my visible nature is my invisible spirit. This is a fountain of life whereby this universe has its being, the fountain of life, the invisible spirit, which you can realize within. It's not a thought, it's not an emotion, it's not a sense perception.

Then what is it? It's that which makes all thoughts and emotions and sense perceptions possible. Oh, consciousness, the light of consciousness, feeling it, sensing it as yourself.

Just one or two more lines to finish. Again, what I've just been talking about, let's see how the Bhagavad Gita puts it. Set thy heart upon thy work, but never on its reward.

Work not for reward, but never cease to do thy work. Do thy work in the peace of yoga and free from selfish desires. Be not moved in success or in failure.

Yoga is evenness of mind, a peace that is ever the same. Work done for reward is much lower than work done in the yoga of wisdom. And it says, be not moved in success or failure.

Well, that comes, rather than telling somebody not to be moved in success or failure, I would tell them how to be in that state of consciousness where you are not moved by success or failure and that of course is presence. Then if the outcome is good, oh, it's appreciated. If the outcome is so-called not what you wanted, well, that's how it is.

And you move on. It's still the present moment. And that means your success or failure don't make that much difference.

And the success does not give you the incredible high that it gives you when you desperately needed it. Oh, wow, yeah, I got it, yeah, yeah. You'll quickly come down from that.

And often you find the very success that you attained has a downside to it when you experience that. So it's the appreciation of what you wanted comes. It's lovely, it's great, but it doesn't change your state of being or consciousness anymore.

Good, that's it for now. So I wish you happy practice in present moment living or as the Gita calls it, karma yoga. Karma yoga, the practice of action or action as a spiritual practice.

[Speaker 10] (7:17:58 - 7:18:52)

Thank you, Eckhart, for sharing the presence once again. My question is somewhat related to that last one, but from a different perspective. As the consciousness rises around us, there are many more resources and many new technologies to ease the suffering of humankind around the world.

But the white elephant in the room that no one seems to want to acknowledge in that process is the fact that the population is increasing faster and faster, it seems. I guess you can phrase that question so the answer is included, but I'd like to hear your perspective on what we might do to facilitate that process or how that process will take care of itself.

[Speaker 1] (7:18:53 - 7:18:59)

Can you be clear what is the process you refer to?

[Speaker 10] (7:19:00 - 7:19:13)

How the strain on the planet's resources as a result of the population increasing ever faster, how we'll be able to resolve that conflict.

[Speaker 1] (7:19:14 - 7:24:19)

Well, it's obvious that the population cannot go on increasing because that would lead to disastrous consequences. Ultimately, that's fine too because the one consciousness will manifest through any form it chooses again and again and is evolving. But it is quite possible that the larger intelligence that is, that underlies the planet, the planet, there is an intelligence that pervades the planet itself.

The planet is an intelligent being which mainstream science would, of course, not agree with. But I very strongly feel that and anybody who becomes sensitive enough and no longer totally absorbed in conceptual thinking can sense that the entire planet is an intelligent being. It has a regulating intelligence and I feel that if humans don't take action to reduce this proliferation of bodies, they continuously produce, if humans don't take positive action, then the regulating intelligence of the planet, planetary intelligence, with just one another expression of the one universal intelligence, will take action and will do something to reduce the number of human beings on the planet. This is my feeling. I cannot prove to you that this is a correct prediction or agnostication, but the intelligence will take action and whether the action it takes is a violent form of action or whether the action it takes is non-violent, I don't know.

For planetary intelligence, it would be very easy to reduce humans within one generation by reducing the fertility in the sperm of men so that very far fewer babies are produced. And within one or two generations, the population could be reduced by 50% if many men are not able to father children anymore simply because something is missing there. That would be problemless.

So if I, I'm not in charge of planetary intelligence, but if I were, that's what I would do. It's totally painless. Don't have to kill anybody.

So, but we shouldn't wait for that. We need to look and see if we first, of course, we need to discover the wisdom inside. If we only approach it from the analytical mind, we'll just create, we tackle one problem here and we'll create a series of more problems on top of that.

So we need to become, go within, find the wisdom that is in the stillness, go within, and then the question is whether those people who are able to do that are those people that take decisions. Probably not because the politicians are not there yet. Well, most of them, but we are making a start here.

So first, so that you can take intelligent action, go within, never act from fear or kind of panic. We need to save the planet. Oh my God.

This is you generate fear. If you generate fear, nothing good can come out of that. Even if your intentions are good, any action that is taken on the basis of fear is going to have negative consequences and secondary effects.

So first we become still and peaceful and realize the truth of the beginning of the course in miracles, which says, nothing real can be threatened. Nothing unreal exists. Herein lies the peace of God.

[Speaker 12] (7:24:23 - 7:24:23)

Okay.

[Speaker 1] (7:24:24 - 7:25:28)

Now, what action can we take? If you are not in a powerful position, at least perhaps you can come up with ideas that come from out of the stillness. I don't have a series of actions that mankind should take because this teaching doesn't work in that way.

This teaching is designed to take the individual human being deep enough within so that they can connect with a source of who they are and everything else other people will have to do. So I can't give, tell you what course of action to take because the focus of this teaching isn't in outer action, but it goes to the source of all intelligence and all wisdom. But I have a feeling that you have some ideas already.

Is that right?

[Speaker 10] (7:25:29 - 7:25:31)

A small contribution, perhaps.

[Speaker 1] (7:25:31 - 8:11:28)

Yes. So, and that's a good start. And see where that takes you because you are able to access the stillness and fruitful, creative ideas come out of that.

So all I can say to you to carry on with what you're doing and see what else comes to you and in what other ways you can be helpful and useful so that planetary intelligence does not have to intervene. Welcome. I'm speaking to you from British Columbia, Canada.

It's about just after one o'clock in the afternoon on a beautiful spring day. The purpose of our meditation, of course, is always getting in touch with that which transcends the person to discover that there's more to you than the person. Person meaning both the physical body and your mind plus emotions and so on.

So all your thinking is to do with the person, emotions, your history, successes, failures, so-called. And even if you've reached a very high point in your life right now, you've just succeeded at something, just gained something, just fallen in love, you will find that it won't be long until that is no longer a real source of satisfaction for you. And it may even turn into its opposite.

High becomes low. Now, that's not a negative way, a gloomy, pessimistic way of looking at things. And it's not saying that you should not appreciate when good things happen to you or you achieve things.

It's wonderful. And it's to be enjoyed. So you can enjoy it knowing that, of course, it's not going to last forever.

And it cannot be a source of continuous satisfaction forever. If you were suddenly transplanted to the most beautiful place, let's say you're not happy where you are living now, maybe the climate isn't good enough or the environment isn't good enough. There's nothing wrong with striving towards finding a better place.

But even if you were suddenly transplanted to the most beautiful location you could imagine, perhaps for some people, that would be an island where it's always warm and pleasant. And there's the blue sea and there's white sand or whatever else you could imagine to be the ideal place. And suddenly you're there and you have nothing to worry about.

All your needs are met. And of course you might say, well, then I could really get into the spiritual stuff because we're living in a world where we wouldn't have to worry about all these other things anymore, making a living or succeeding or helping my family members or whatever. So it's all ideal suddenly and you would be happy for a while.

And then gradually you would become dissatisfied. First, boredom sets in. And after a while, your energy level would go down too because in the absence of challenges, you would, the degree of alertness would diminish.

So as far as your spiritual life is concerned, the best place is where you are right now and discover the dimension, the transcendent dimension here and now. And use whatever problems or difficulties you have as an encouragement or an incentive to go deeper into yourself, not running away from problems. Of course, you still may have to take action if action is possible or necessary or desirable.

You can take action to change situations, to improve situations in your life. But at the same time, see if you can discover the deeper dimension within that has nothing to do with what goes on in your external life. And that's why we're here, to discover that.

This is not about managing your external life better. There's nothing wrong with that, but you can, there are other teachings that can help you with that if you still need them. But it's discovering a deeper dimension within.

And that also has a by-product of discovering that is actually that it improves your external life immeasurably because you're no longer dependent on the ups and downs, the gains and losses, the good days and the bad days of your external life. You're not dependent on those things anymore for your sense of well-being or fulfillment or inner peace. And isn't that an incredible thing when you can enjoy things, deal with things?

Yes, but you're no longer dependent on the ups and downs. So all of you already have some access to that dimension within, and we're just here to deepen it. Or if you're completely new to this, this may be an occasion when you have your first glimpse of that in you that, which transcends your person, the personal life, the personal dimension.

So just like the universe, and the universe is whatever is around you, or the room you're sitting in, or if you look at the stars at night, or look out of the window, there's the universe with lots of things in it. And it's easily overlooked that the most essential thing is not the things, but the space in between things, even the room that you're sitting in. There's stuff in it, furniture, there's a floor, a ceiling, walls, but the essence of every room is the space.

The space in the room. So there are two dimensions, form, furniture, walls, ceilings, floor, ceiling, floor, and space, formlessness. Or you look up into the sky at night, what you see, countless stars, most of which are suns, just like our sun, many of them much bigger, countless stars, and the vastness of space.

Well, you can't actually see the vastness of space, you cannot see space, that's the strange thing. You can never say, oh, here is space. Because space is not something, everything else is something.

And now the amazing thing is there's an equivalent in you of what we call outer space, space, we could call it inner space. And that's the essence of who you are, just as the space in this room is the essence of this room or the space that allows billions of stars and galaxies to exist out there is the essence. And yet you can never pinpoint it or examine it under a microscope.

So the essence of you, you also cannot pinpoint, scientists can examine your brain, but they won't find you there. We know almost nothing about the brain. Of course, there's a connection between the brain and consciousness.

But the brain is a kind of transmitter of consciousness or receiver, it does not actually generate consciousness. Most scientists haven't discovered that yet. They claim to know what the brain is all about.

We don't even know what a thought is. No scientist knows what a thought, what is, does it exist as molecules? Nobody knows what a thought is.

And that's still the level of form, thought. So the essence of who you are cannot be defined just as the space around you cannot be defined. It has no boundary.

It's absolutely mysterious. You cannot know it in the sense that you know something in this world. You can only become aware of it by unknowing, by letting go of all that you know for a moment and just be conscious and realize you can be conscious of something, which is normal for everybody.

You're conscious of perception, and so on, but you can also be conscious of being conscious. And that is the transcendent dimension. And that at first people may not understand what it is that these words are pointing to.

Be conscious of being conscious. Sounds like some kind of duality, but that's only because we're using language. Now, as you know, as I've often pointed out, life or your life could be compared to a dream.

Things happen and then they evaporate. When you get towards the end of your life, it may begin to look more and more like a dream when you think back. And of course, a real dream, when you wake up in the morning, it dissolves and you say it was just a dream.

Many philosophers have argued about whether what you experience as your life is real or it's a dream. It's a question of perspective, of course. But it does have a very strong dream-like quality.

Or if you want to use modern terminology, it's your movie, the movie of your life. Some movies are very dramatic with lots of sound and fury, to use the words of Shakespeare, Shakespeare, full of sound and fury. And then Shakespeare adds signifying nothing.

Or another expression, Shakespeare's actually a play, much ado about nothing. And that's many people's lives. And it may not be until you reach the end of your life that you realize that most of it was really, you got upset about nothing much.

It's better not to wait until the end of your life to realize that you often still get upset about nothing much, the movie, that's all. So is your life real? Yes and no.

Is it a dream? Depends how you look at it. It certainly is dream-like.

Is this moment really happening or am I just imagining it? Am I imagining that I'm looking at the screen and somebody's talking to me and saying, are you dreaming? You just don't know.

What you do know is that this is what you are experiencing at this moment. It is being experienced. And a prerequisite for this, so that it can be experienced, whether it's a dream or not, is what we could call the light of consciousness.

Without consciousness, there could be no dream or no experience. So the one thing you know without any doubt is that you are conscious. And even that is not absolutely right when we put it like that.

Let's put it differently. The one thing that you know without any doubt is not that you are conscious because there's, again, a duality. I am conscious as if we're conscious with something added onto you.

No. The one thing that you know beyond any doubt is that you are consciousness or the light of consciousness, like the light of the sun, the light of consciousness. And in that light of consciousness, things come and go, arise and subside.

The good day, the bad day, the wedding, the divorce, or the death of your partner or your husband or your wife, the birth, the death. But all this happens, appears and then disappears. It appears in the light of consciousness.

And that's you. So you are not the form that happens. You're not really the dream or the experience.

You are the space for it, the light in which it happens, space or light, whatever you want to call it. They're just words. And that is the liberating, the great liberation, knowing yourself as the space of the light, as the consciousness.

And you can sense that at this very moment. What is it that makes this moment possible? What makes it possible for you to have the experience of this moment, whatever happens in this moment, the light of consciousness?

Presence. You suddenly become aware that you are aware or that there's awareness, the arising of self-awareness. And that is traditionally in spiritual language terminology, it means that is the real meaning of knowing yourself.

In ancient Greece, already the dictum, know thyself. On a more superficial level, knowing yourself is knowing what makes up the conditioning of your personality and having some knowledge of ways in which you operate in daily life. And that already is something good.

There needs to be some awareness so that you become aware of your own patterns. But you're still aware of something. And then at a deeper level, knowing yourself is knowing yourself as consciousness, as the space.

And that is essence knowledge. You can actually get this feeling of your essence. It's not yours, but temporarily just, let's call it yours.

You can get the sense of the essence of who you are. The essence of your identity is nothing that can be defined. It's formless.

It also has nothing to do with time. It's timeless. The challenge comes is whether there can be an awareness of essence, the essence awareness in your life, even when things happen.

Not just at this moment, but when you have to go back into your normal daily life and you start doing things, dealing with situations, working on the computer, making a phone call, doing your shopping, driving. Can you be there perceiving everything, speaking, and yet not lose that essence awareness in the background of your life? And that's an amazing challenge.

And that's an amazing achievement, which is traditionally called liberation or enlightenment. And I believe that really Jesus was talking about that when he used the term salvation. So there are different ways one can speak of it or point to it.

Can you feel, can you sense a certain spaciousness in you? Even when you make a phone call to talk to your accountant. Now you might say, no, I can't.

I lose it every time. And that may be true that you lost it many times, but I don't think it is true when you say you cannot. What does happen when you lose that awareness of depth within you, that awareness of awareness, what does happen when you lose it is because you thought that something else was more important than your inner state.

Something else was more important than awakening, spiritual awakening. You actually thought your conversation with the accountant or whoever it is is more important than what is the destiny of you as a human being, which is to flower, to be an expression of the flowering of consciousness. So you think all the little things in your life are more important than that in the moment that they happen.

Or you say, oh, let me first deal with that and then I'll be spiritual. But of course, there's no end to dealing with that. Life gives you one damn thing after another to deal with.

So peace, of course, is not an outer condition. You cannot find it out there. It's something that arises and that is intrinsically one with the transcendent dimension.

And then you don't get drawn into drama anymore because out there things still happen. And then you may notice that the transcendent dimension and the awareness is always there when there is a little gap between two thoughts. It's always there when there's a certain spaciousness, even while you're thinking, excuse me, so you no longer have one thought after another.

You have a thought and a little space, another thought and a little space. For example, whenever you're listening to somebody, you're not thinking. That's part of the practice of spaciousness.

You're listening. There's just an alert listening. You're looking at something.

There's an alert visual perception or an alertness behind the visual perception. That means you're there as the spaciousness. Then you begin to talk.

Then you move into form. And you can still sense the spaciousness in the background. And then you stop speaking.

And the spaciousness, the alert awareness comes again into the foreground. So when you use your mind and you or you become active, do things, the spaciousness recedes, still you can sense it somewhere. And then very often you find moments of brief stillness, could just be three seconds.

And then immediately, the awareness or you as you suddenly, the person in that moment, the person momentarily dissolves. And what arises instead is conscious presence. Then you come back into form.

Another thought comes, you speak, you do things. The awareness right goes into the background. The person operates again, but not disconnected anymore from the dimension of awareness.

So it's a very strange way. It's a totally new way. This is why it's a leap.

It's a leap in an evolutionary leap in consciousness. It's a totally new way of living. So that you are only temporarily a person, even on a normal day.

You're the person and then you are the awareness. And even when you're the person, you're still connected to the essence of yourself as conscious awareness. So you continuously appear and disappear, so to speak, as a person.

So imagine many human beings living in that state of consciousness. And of course you are, one could say, without making it into some kind of egoic belief. Of course, you are at the forefront of this evolutionary leap, not you as a person.

It happens because the person has become transparent to it. The person has made room for it. It comes through the person, but it's nothing to do with the person.

It's not the person. So in that way, of course, a totally different world would arise as more humans live in that way. But we don't need to be concerned about that.

We just need to be concerned about awakening, the absolute importance of awakening in our own life, in your own life. As you know, there is no such thing as your life. We just call it that.

So let's just, just one briefly drift was one example, just to recapitulate on the essence of what I said here, and what hopefully you verify in your own experience. Let's say you're going to make a phone call. There's a phone.

And about something requiring some information, having to deal with some problem, whatever it is. So there's a phone. You're still for a moment, 10 seconds, whatever, alert, still.

Anybody can spare 10 seconds, five seconds. And then you pick up the phone. And while it rings, you're still, there's just an aware presence, an alert, aware presence.

Then the person answers at the other end. And then you begin to speak. And then the alert presence recedes.

And then the mind begins to operate. And you speak. The person has come in.

Then you're waiting for an answer. You have just said something to that other person at the other end. And the reply is going to come.

And as the reply comes, the alertness suddenly is there fully again. And so you just listen in that state of alertness, which means the person recedes, temporarily dissolves, and you're just there as an aware presence. Then you find yourself speaking again.

The person is back. The awareness recedes into the background, but it's still, you can still sense it there. And this means you are speaking from the level of awareness, which means you're speaking much more intelligently and more effectively without creating conflict out of nothing, because all conflict is out of nothing, ultimately.

So the way in which the situation is handled is very different now, because you're not there exclusively as the person. Because if you're there exclusively as a person, that's the ego, of course. Ego means you only know yourself as the person.

You are completely identified with that conditioning that creates the person. And so that's the phone call. Just I gave that as an example of how you're in a situation where there's form, speaking, thinking, doing, and there is the deeper dimension of formlessness.

And that's a dance. So that's very exciting because to master that dance between the form and formlessness, that's the purpose of your life. No matter what else you do, that whatever you do is a vehicle for that.

In itself, it's not important at all, but it is a vehicle for something that is important. All the stuff that you think is important may be relatively important, but it is not absolutely important. Only one thing is of absolute importance, and that's consciousness, the arising of consciousness.

And of course, when the consciousness arises, it also transforms the relative. So I wish you well. And let's see how the dance goes for you between the relative and the absolute, between the person and the transcendent essence.

[Speaker 10] (8:11:38 - 8:11:39)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (8:12:54 - 8:13:35)

So our special guest is someone whose books have changed countless people's lives all over the world. And his name is Neil Donald Walsh, and he's here to join me here and now. Thank you so much for coming.

[Speaker 3] (8:13:35 - 8:13:39)

Oh, thanks for having me. I'm totally in love with you.

[Speaker 1] (8:13:45 - 8:14:52)

I'd like to, of course, I don't need to, everybody's aware of his books. And I also saw the movie, Conversations with God, if you haven't seen it, it's based on a very faithful history of your life at that period when you're beginning to write. And it's wonderful to watch.

Now, in a little while, I want to ask you what your message to the world is right now. But before we do that, I'd like to ask you a little bit about the creative process in you, especially at the very beginning, because not everybody, or not many people may be aware that in the period before the first book came through you, Conversations with God, you were homeless. Is that right?

[Speaker 3] (8:14:53 - 8:14:53)

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (8:14:53 - 8:15:41)

And you were living in a tent. And that is shown in the movie. And so it was a time period when all the structures around you that most people would consider necessary, they would think, I need security so that I can write.

I need... And of course, that's not the case. It happened to you when there was complete insecurity and the structures around you had collapsed.

I would say there is a connection between this enormous creative impulse suddenly coming through you and the prior collapse of the external structures around you.

[Speaker 3] (8:15:41 - 8:21:35)

How do you see that? Well, Eckhart, that's my experience as well in the following sense. But let me back up.

Let me just take one step back, may I please. I didn't set out to write a book. So I wasn't thinking in terms of having a creative moment or producing a book.

That didn't happen, actually producing a book with foreknowledge that it would be a book. Or that it would ever be seen by anybody until what became book three. So books, what are popularly known as books one and two in the Conversations with God cosmology were not written with any foreknowledge that anyone would ever see it without ever any intent that it would be published as a book.

It was a process of personal revelation, personal connection. And it was a process as well as, excuse me, a personal expiation. That is, I was ridding myself of all the thoughts I had about how I thought life was.

Because it began, really the process of my Conversation with God began when I realized that nothing in my life was working the way I thought it was supposed to work. My relationships with my significant other was falling apart. And with all of my others, my life work had come to a grinding halt.

I was doing nothing. I was on the street, unemployed, and I had a broken neck. I should explain that why I was on the street was that I had a car accident in which I broke my neck.

And very few people really survive a broken neck, or at least survive it intact. I'm very fortunate that I'm still alive, very fortunate that I'm not paralyzed, frankly. But I was one of the very rare people who can actually have a broken neck and be more or less normal afterward.

Except that for about two years, I couldn't do much. I couldn't lift this. I was not allowed to extend my arm.

So I couldn't do very, very little because they were wanting me to be very careful with this skeletal structure of mine. So I could do nothing. And I wound up on the street because the social welfare system fell out from beneath me.

So now, there I am finally sitting, and I had too much pride, by the way, to ask people who love me for help. That was interesting. I had a thought about it that I'm going to look bad.

How could I look any worse than I looked? But I had to. I didn't want to call my father.

He would have rushed to my aid, but I didn't want him to know that I was... I thought, well, I'll be out of this in just a few weeks. I can pull myself out of it.

Well, a few weeks turned into a few months, and a few months turned into a year, two weeks shy of one year that I was on the street asking people for dimes and dollars. Could you give me a quarter? Could you help?

And then I became so upset with myself. And so I began to ask myself because I finally got a job and I finally got off the street. But this is when the game got interesting.

Am I telling too much of this now? No, no, it's wonderful to hear. It was when I got off the street, when I finally managed to find a little weekend job as a radio announcer that I earned a few dollars, enough dollars to get off the street that I wound up back in the game, back in the game of life, back in the drama.

And that's when I realized the utter vacuousness of life. I thought, is this really all there is? Is this, am I back in it?

And for what? It doesn't, none of it made any sense to me. I felt like I was on another planet.

I didn't understand why do we bother? And so I woke up one night and I said to myself, what does it take to make life work? What is this life?

What's going on here? What is really going on here? And I asked the eternal questions that we all ask.

Why am I here? And who am I? And how did I get to this place?

And to what? You know, and I really begged God, my perception of God. I just begged for an answer, as many of us have done.

And God was good to me. She said, do you really want answers to all of these questions or are you just venting? I said, you know, I really would, I really would, I really would like answers if you've got them, you know, give them to me because at this point I'm really searching.

So, and so this voice, I heard a voice, Eckhart, over my right shoulder that began, and it was as clear and as present. It was a physical voice. It was not a voice inside my head.

It was a voice I heard audibly in the room, right next to me, such that I turned around to see who was in the room. It's 4.15 in the morning. I had gotten up in the middle of the night to just pacing back and forth, trying to, and then I sat down and I thought, you know, I was hearing things, but I thought, fair enough.

I'm going to write down, it happened to be, there happened to be a yellow legal pad on the table in front of me. And I picked it up just to, just to write down what I was hearing.

[Speaker 1] (8:21:35 - 8:21:38)

It's funny. I write everything on yellow legal pads.

[Speaker 3] (8:21:46 - 8:28:30)

Why am I not surprised by that? So, and I began to ask questions. Who am I?

What does it take to make life work? What is it that I don't understand? Help me, just help me.

Mind you, I wasn't a young person at this time. I was 50 years old and I thought, gosh, a half century. I've been here a half century and I don't understand what's going on.

Very not okay. So I was given, this information began flowing through me and I began writing. And I began asking questions because what I was writing, as I was, I want to say, by the way, that the voice very quickly moved into my head.

It left this physical realm and became a part of my inner experience. But I began hearing and I began writing everything that I was hearing. And of course, what I was hearing was bringing up other questions in me.

How could that be? I don't understand. I was always taught this.

I was always told that. How can that be? And I remember when I really got clear that I was talking to my, what I call my conceptualization of God, because I was, we were talking about the 10 Commandments and I said, I said, you know, I began writing questions and getting answers or writing questions, questioning what I was writing.

And at one point I asked, you know, I tried so hard to live a good life. I've obeyed the rules. Some of the rules.

Hardly none of the rules, but the point is I tried. I tried really, you know, and I, and I, so I said to God, I said, you know, and I was being very sincere. I said, you know, I tried to follow the 10 Commandments and the golden rule and the rest.

What does it take? God said, actually, Neil, there's no such thing as the 10 Commandments. Oh, well, that was just the bedrock of my entire life.

How, then what, then what are there? And from then, I knew that I had connected with some place of grander awareness that I call God just for a convenient short word, but a place of grander awareness that I'm clear resides in all of us. And that I want to say, if I could dare say it, not only that resides in all of us, but that is the identity of all of us, that all of us are, that we, that, and I, and I sat there and I thought, my gosh, I'm not just hearing from that.

I am that. That's who I am. And all of the rest of this is, I'm making it up.

I'm making it all up. So I began to continue this dialogue. And at one point, this other part of me, which I would now call it that, that I call God said, this will one day become a book.

And I'm just writing, journaling, by the way, this had gone on now for a couple of weeks. Every, every night at 4.15 in the morning, I was awakened. Like someone was pulling me by the, you know, by the shirt front, getting me back to this thing.

And so I was in my little one room cottage that I had managed to rent after getting a job, finally, a part-time job. And I'm every morning at 4.15 in the morning, I'm up, I'm up, I'm writing more and more and more. And at one point the dialogue said, this will one day become a book.

And you know, my first thought, of course, is yeah, right. You and a hundred other people are going to send your middle of the night, mental meanderings to a publisher who's going to say, let's get this out at once. Guy is talking to God.

But in fact, you know what? I sent it to a publisher and I've been asked many times, many times, why did you send that off to a publisher if you didn't intend for it to be a book? And I tell you, I did it, Eckhart, so that I could prove something to myself, because I thought really the truth is, without being funny about it, the odds of something like that being published were one in a gazillion.

And I thought, you know, it says this will be a book. That was the only measurable outcome I had received in all the downloads I was receiving. Everything else was conceptual, theoretical in nature.

But here was something that could be measured. It would either be a book or it wouldn't be a book. So I thought, you know, I'm going to test God.

So I sent it to a publisher just to see what would happen and let it go. And within not too long a time, I got a call from one of the publishers that I sent it to. I sent it to five.

I got rejection letters, predictably from everybody except this last person sent me a rejection letter and it said, no, you know, this book doesn't fit our titles list. I sent it back to the publisher and I said, would you at least read it? Because I know that it fits your titles list.

All you publish are books like this. So I sent it back to the publisher and he took another look at it. Actually, he looked at it for the first time.

His acquisitions editor had turned it down. He looked at it and he said, we're going to publish this. And they did, you know, and the rest is, as they say in the business, publishing history, you know, the book actually was rushed to print.

It sold seven and a half million copies in 37 languages. And it was on that crazy New York Times list for 137 weeks consecutively. And suddenly there I am, the guy who's supposed to be talking to God.

So you ask how the creative process works. It wasn't for me a process where I sat down to see how could I create a series of bestselling books. For me, it was an internal experience of my soul meeting my mind and blending with my essence to become one.

And then my mind giving itself permission to just shut the hell up. And I mean that literally, I mean, shut the hell up and just get out of the way so that my soul could join my mind in a collaborative expression of who I really am. And what is really true.

So that's how the process worked for me. And I'm sure you're sorry you asked a two second question to get a 24 minute answer, but that's how it happened.

[Speaker 1] (8:28:31 - 8:29:04)

And very helpful to hear for everybody. And it's very inspiring to hear. Because of course, the dimension that you described, as you said, is in everyone.

And basically the human being is one with that dimension. Is that in essence? Just another question to you.

Then after that, do you feel that dimension is still in you? Do you still access that when you write nowadays?

[Speaker 3] (8:29:04 - 8:34:11)

Or how does that? I don't write unless I can. My writing, I mean, I write a newsletter or a little piece for the blog or things.

But I don't write that kind of material unless I can come from that place. I don't try to get to that place. I try real hard to put this.

The answer to your question is yes. Why am I using all these words? The answer to your question is yes.

But what I want to say is, I think it's possible. I have learned that it's possible for me to deliberately access that place. And I think that everyone can deliberately access that place of knownness, nothingness, that place where thought recedes and wisdom emerges from the soul.

I use words that my conceptualizations allow me to understand. So I go to that place of the soul and I just get very quiet. And you know what happens to me sometimes when I'm writing?

My friends who are around me know this. I'll be sitting there writing from that place and literally fall asleep at the keyboard. I will literally be writing for maybe six or seven minutes and then I'll sleep for 10 or 12 minutes.

And then I'll wake up and realize, this just happened to me the other day. Again, it happens all the time. Not because the effort is so great, not because I'm so exhausted, but because I'm so completely out of my body, so completely out of my physicality, so completely in another place that literally I just, and I'm out of there.

And then I kind of come back and I continue to, but I think that, I don't suggest you do this while you're driving or at the dinner table, but sometimes when you're alone, it's possible to just let go of every idea you ever had and just go to that place. And I do it with a request. But you know what?

I want to ask you a question. Let me just finish that thought. So they're not, well, what does he mean by that?

I do it with a request. And the request is, dear God, if there's something that wants to come through me now, that wants to emerge and present itself now, I'm open, allow it to, and it doesn't have to. If it doesn't, that's fine.

Then I just don't write this morning. I don't have a need to just, and then the impulse will come through. Literally an idea or a thought that will just come through.

And I'll find myself following that thought almost like I'm being led by the nose. I don't have a thought about the thought. It's just whatever.

And the thing writes, I was saying to my dear wife, Em, when I finished my last book, when everything changes, change everything, I walked upstairs with it and I said, I didn't have any idea when I started this, what it was going to say. No idea at all. No outline.

Sounds familiar. No outline. No thought.

I know what chapter one will be about this and chapter two will be about that. It'd be a logical progression. And no, I had no idea.

And then out came all of this stuff, the mechanics of the mind, the system of the soul that was astonishing me as I saw it. I was just, wow, what is that? And then, okay.

And then it would reveal itself and reveal itself and reveal itself. So I have to, I've had to turn back my last 20 or 30 royalty checks out of confessions. I didn't write it at all.

No, I didn't really. I kept the money. But I almost have to, you know, I almost have to do it with my hand.

You know, I can't, I have to take it like this way. I can't look at the person directly because I didn't really. But you know, it's that way with all gifts.

In truth, the gifts of life, it seems to us, come through us, not from us. And as do the joys, you know, whether it's a royalty check or a smile on a person's face or a squeeze or a hug or whatever it is. It feels to me like all the joys of life come to us just as freely as the gifts come through us.

If we just allow ourselves to get caught in the flow and get our self out of the way, get any thought out of the way that you think you're doing it. Oh, I'm reading, I'm a wonderful writer. Watch this.

Because whenever I, and I do have those thoughts, mind you. I want to confess, I have those thoughts. I'm a great writer, but this is gonna be a great book.

And it turns out to be crap. And I gotta throw it away. So, okay, great, I got it.

So, but I wanted to ask a question. What the hell was the question?

[Speaker 1] (8:34:12 - 8:34:14)

Well, very often questions dissolve.

[Speaker 10] (8:34:14 - 8:34:15)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (8:34:20 - 8:38:34)

Either they are answered or they dissolve. I know what the question is. Thank you.

This has bought me 10 seconds. I have long wanted to know, once I got in touch with the, please forgive me, I cry at my own stuff. I've wanted to know, what is the purpose if I'm not this body?

By the way, one of the first things I was told in conversations with God is you're not your body. Your body is something you have. It's not something you are.

Now it's got to be old news, but 15 years ago, that was brand new for me. Okay, I'm not my body. Then God said, you're not your mind.

Okay, not my body, not my mind. Then God said, you're not even what you think of as your soul. You're not even that.

That's another idea you have, that you are your soul. Okay, great. I said, then who am I?

God said, isn't that an interesting question? Why don't you tell me? And I said to God, no, no, you know the answer.

And God said to me, no, no, you know the answer. And I said to God, no, I'm really coming to you to tell me. And God says, no, no, I'm really coming to you to tell me.

What God said to me was the difficulty here, Neil, is that you are convinced that you and I are separate, that you're something other than me. Only when you're clear that you are nothing other than me will you understand that I don't have your answer. You have your answer.

But you may be whatever you choose to be. You may have whatever you choose to have. You may do whatever you choose to do.

Such is the wonder and the glory of life that you may create all of it as you wish. And so I thought, wow, but why? That was the question I asked.

If I'm none of all of this and all these things are happening to me in the exterior world and the events, the tragedies of life, of life in general out there in my own life, why, why, why must it be so hard? Why must it be so difficult? What am I doing here?

And God said, being me. For me, the answer that I got, Eckhart, was the answer to the eternal question why was you exist in your present form that I might know myself through you and through all of life. And so I got that the opportunity for me was to let go of all my prior thoughts about who I am and why I'm here and actually make it up, decide.

If I wanted truly to be my conceptualization of divinity, what would that look like? If I wanted to really be in this exact moment when I came up here to say hello to you, if I was really being who I wanted to be, expressing what I really am, I'd go and I'd give that guy the greatest, biggest smooch on the face he ever had. And I thought, dare I do that?

You know, Neil Donald Walsh doesn't smooch Eckhart Tolle. That's crazy. Because I have these concepts, you know, that you're not supposed to.

But I thought, you know, I got up to this guy and I felt his energy. I felt your wonderful energy come out. I thought, you know what?

I'm going to give you a smooch. I'm glad you did. Because that was what was arising, to use your words.

And so that really is the answer to the question why? Why? So that life might know itself as life itself through the process of life itself.

That you might demonstrate through the living of your life what life is. And if you don't like what it is-ness, change it. You're at liberty to change it.

And that was the greatest experience.

[Speaker 1] (8:38:44 - 8:39:04)

Thank you. Very inspiring to listen to you. So even when you speak, you're connected with that level, that dimension within yourself.

It speaks through you. And that's inspired speaking. It's not prepared.

It just comes.

[Speaker 3] (8:39:04 - 8:44:27)

Yeah, except when it's not, you know, across the breakfast table. I try, the greatest challenge of my life is to access that level of awareness in the day-to-day of my life. Yes.

I find for some reason that if I'm talking to people, or I want to say presenting, or doing a television interview or whatever, that somehow I'm able to step aside from my need for it to go well, be right, look good. You know, somehow or another, I just let go of that. I'm not sure I know how, but I just do.

I remember Matt Lauer on the Today Show asked me a stunning question. He did a little interview with me, you know, and he asked me this question. They always do this, you know, when you have 30 seconds left.

He said, Neil, we have about 30 seconds left, but could you tell us if God had one thing that he could say to the world, what would it be? He said, could you get it down to one paragraph? I said, actually, Matt, I could give it to you in five words.

He said, really? So he kind of turned to the camera, you know, a little bit of a smile on his face. Ladies and gentlemen, from Neil Donald Walsh, here's God's message to the world in five words.

You've got me all wrong. So, if that's true, of course, we have a lot to talk about. We have a lot of fun to explore, a lot to say, why did I start?

Why did I even tell you that? Where was I going just before that? Huh?

No, I asked the question why. There's more than that. Wrong.

You're out. You're out. But anyway, thank you, thank you, day-to-day life.

My challenge is to somehow, when I am, I'm disattached, I'm more attached in private than I am in public. I'm more attached over the breakfast table with my beloved to my idea, how it should be and who I am and, you know, how could you have said that to me just now, and do you understand, you know, all this, than I am in public. So I do have a question, you were right after all, you can stay.

I do have a question for you. This is a terribly personal question and we can edit this out of the tape if you don't want it in the program, but I want to know whether, because I want to tell you, and I'm not pumping sunshine into your ear, this is the truth for me. You have stood for me as as close as I have come to see on this planet as a living master, who understands, but who does more than understand, because to be honest with you, I think I understand.

But the difference I see between you and me, to be honest and totally transparent is, we both understand it, we can both say it really well, but he lives it and I don't, except when I do. What I notice is that I live at probably 20, who can give a number, not enough of the time, and when I'm with my beloved, with my family, in private, I somehow get into all of my, you know, thoughts, and I forget what I'm saying right here to you, as if I didn't even say it, to the point where my loved ones look at me sometimes and say, you ought to read one of your own books, and it's well deserved, it's well deserved.

So I've come to you for a personal counseling session on television, how do I take what I think that I am, how do I take what I've experienced, I'm going to not even say what I think I am, because it's out of thought, it's not from thought, how do I take what I experience myself to be, and wash the canvas of my life with it, especially when it matters to me the most. In the end, honestly, I don't really care how it is with you, I'll never see any of you again, that's the truth. But that lady sitting over there, my wife, I see her every day, every hour, why can't I summon this, then?

[Speaker 1] (8:44:37 - 8:45:12)

First of all, in certain situations, the presence is there fully in you and comes through you, such as here, you know that, in a so-called teaching situation or writing situation, the presence moves through you, and then there's the rest of your life, and it is sometimes there, I would assume, and sometimes not, is that right, or is it mostly not?

[Speaker 3] (8:45:13 - 8:45:22)

I think it's more there now than it used to be, but it's still the majority of time not, and people who know me would tell you that, they'd say, you think this is a nice person, you should work for him.

[Speaker 1] (8:45:26 - 8:47:42)

So all it means is your mind still takes over, and either you relinquish it voluntarily in your daily life, which requires the minimum of awareness that this is what's happening right now, my mind has taken over, but I believe that you do have that, it comes in sometimes that you realize that your mind has taken over, and in that moment you can relinquish that and invite presence into your life, and whenever any conflict situation arises or any kind of suffering arises, irritation, anger, whatever it is, then it can be used as an alarm clock to tell you, oh, something has happened here, I sometimes say it's an alarm clock that tells you, I've lost the present moment, I'm not present in the now, so in other words, you are trapped in your mind, so you can use any conflict situation and the moment you notice it, you can invite presence back into your life and so immediately the alertness comes back, it's a voluntary death, if you don't do it, you'll need more suffering and then it'll happen, but if you voluntarily relinquish, because you know how it works, you know how it works because you experience what you do in a situation like this, there's that complete openness, you're not identified with old mind, your mind is simply a servant of the deeper awareness, as you speak to us, it's beautiful, you're not here, you're not protecting your ego, which is a wonderful thing, and because there is one thing much vaster here, speaking through you than the limited ego that still arises in your daily life, so as you sit here, the ego is not operating, otherwise you would have to hide the fact that you don't live it in your daily life, but something much greater than the ego is speaking through you right now.

[Speaker 3] (8:47:43 - 8:47:46)

You think he's going to miss a chance to talk to Eckhart Tolle about this, you're crazy.

[Speaker 1] (8:47:50 - 8:48:59)

So all it, alertness, be more interested in your inner state in any given situation than what's happening in the outer situation, what's happening inside me at this moment, what is my inner state at this moment is always primary, dealing with external situations, whatever happens, the outcome of this situation or that situation, or this person agrees with me or does not agree with me, all these are secondary things, if you can shift your attention primarily to what's going on inside me right now, nothing is more important than your state of consciousness now, it's not the external world is never more important than your state of consciousness, but one loses sense of that and you believe that some external situation is more important than your consciousness, your state of consciousness, it's not, that's the illusion, but the world is here to seduce us into believing that because it's very seductive, every situation.

[Speaker 3] (8:49:00 - 8:51:29)

And I think I've, I think I've discovered the reason why, you know, when you say things like the world is here to, it's very seductive, it's here to seduce us, the thinking mind, and God bless it, it does have some purposes in our lives, the thinking mind says, why? Why would God, if there is a God or, you know, why would life create a world that is very seductive and that is constantly seducing us moment by moment into thinking that we are our thoughts and to stop, and I, what I got when I asked God that question and when I was reconnected with just a moment ago when you talked about the alarm clock was, wouldn't it be interesting, my theory is, my viewpoint is, that the world in fact creates these moments of seduction, you know what, we need to write a book together called Moments of Seduction. You always come up with wonderful titles. So I think that the world creates these moments of seduction precisely to provide us a contextual field within which we can experience ourselves at the next grandest level to express our understanding and our awareness of who we are in the next grandest version of the greatest idea we ever held about that.

And what I notice is that yes, to be really honest with you, the number of times that this is true for me in my personal life are less now than they were before, and less than they were before that. But they're also becoming increasingly intensive and more challenging. Anybody get that in your life?

That they're more challenging and more intensive, even though they may be less, because we're rising in consciousness and the world creates a contextual field that says, you want to show us that next step of who you are? Watch this. Here comes a person walking down the hallway who's going to really challenge you.

If that's who you imagine yourself to be, not to make it a bad day for us, but in fact to make it a good day for us. To give us the next opportunity for God to demonstrate who and what it really is in us, through us, and as us. That's my thought about it.

Thank you. Because the alarm clock, when you said it's an alarm clock that goes off, that's what got me to remember it. That's right.

Of course, it's just life waking life up to life itself. And pulling us out of the dream. Okay, well.

[Speaker 1] (8:51:30 - 8:51:32)

Consciousness has answered.

[Speaker 3] (8:51:34 - 8:51:38)

Yeah. So now I did what I came here to do.

[Speaker 1] (8:51:43 - 8:51:45)

Let's have a moment of stillness.

[Speaker 4] (8:55:32 - 8:55:55)

My question to you is, in the book, The Secret, it's based on the law of attraction, where you attract everything into your life. Whereas your book, The Power of Now, is being in the moment and letting the universe guide your life. So I just want to know your thoughts on that, on the difference.

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (8:56:11 - 9:00:16)

Well, as we can see, if we look around, the universe, or life, creates life forms everywhere, wherever we look. So the universe loves to create form, it seems. It can also create form through the human form.

Humans can create as they do. And humans are not separate from the totality of the universe, so there isn't human creation and the universe creating. It's all one.

It's the totality. We are the universe. You are the universe.

So when you create, or when I create something externally, whatever it is, any structure that you build from simple thing, building something, or using your mind, your thoughts, to help in the act of creation, to create something on the mental level, before it becomes physical form. That's a way in which the universe can create through the human form. One could almost say indirectly, or secondary creation.

You may have heard the expression, we become co-creators with God. Your question is really, is it up to us to initiate the act of creation, or should we simply rest in presence and then see what happens? The foundation, of course, for creation is resting in presence.

That's the very foundation, because resting in presence, that is, touching the source of, true source of creativity, and the true source of fulfillment or satisfaction, which is not form, but the formless life itself. It is essentially fulfilling to sense the timeless presence that we could call I am, to sense that directly in yourself, not as an object in your awareness, but as yourself. It's a self-realization of consciousness, not a subject-object realization.

And that is essentially happiness, if we want to use that word, aliveness, fulfillment. That is essentially your identity, your true identity, which has no form. That's why the Buddhists say there is no self, self in the sense of anything that you consider yourself that has form, a psychological or physical form, is not who you are.

The essential self, which the Buddhists deny and just call emptiness, or which in India is called the Atman, that is the formless, and that's the very basis. If you go into, if you create before having consciously realized the source of creation, then you belong to all that.

2012 to 2015 Eckhart Tolle TV Part 6

[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 12:55)

India is called the Atman, that is the formless, and that's the very basis. If you go into, if you create before having consciously realized the source of creation, then you belong to all those billions of humans who create out of the state of identification with form, which we could call the ego state. But that's also the universe.

If the universe did not want to experience itself as the egoic entity also, then it would not be, the ego would not exist. So it seems the universe loves that dream, or which becomes a nightmare sooner or later of the egoic consciousness. So whenever you create, because you believe that the object of your creation is going to make you happy or fulfilled, then you create out of the egoic consciousness and it's stressful and frustrating and never really fulfilling.

But that's the dream of the ignorance of who you are. And perhaps the universe needs to dream that dream and then wake up out of that dream into a conscious realization of itself. And that also is happening through the human form.

So the humans can create out of the ignorance, identification with form, in which case also they create a lot of havoc. Of course, they create a lot of conflict because the more deeply you identified with form, the more you come into conflict with other forms that are also deeply identified with their form. That it's not just the individual form, it's also the collective forms of tribes, religions, religions within religions.

You see what's when you listen to the news, you can see one Islamic sect is killing another one and the boss, even within the same religion, they hate each other. And this has happened. And that is complete identification with form.

It's not, it's happened, it has happened in Christianity. In Christianity, at the moment, they may not be killing each other. They did not enough of that in the Middle Ages, but they still, many still hate each other.

And whoever does not agree with your little group, of course, is the antichrist. That's a nice word you can pre-impose on others. Buddhists haven't come up with that yet.

I have never heard of the anti-Buddha, Buddha. So, and that's within the totality, that's fine too, because that's the dream of identification with form. And how do I know that?

Because I've been in that dream and I've come out of that dream of identification with form. And what is true for the individual is true for the totality. So it's a collective dream.

It's also an awakening that happens when the suffering and the madness becomes so pronounced that it forces you to open your eyes. And then you look and say, what am I doing? What are we doing?

What have I done? What have we done? So this happens when the suffering becomes very acute, as happened, for example, on a very large scale in the 20th century, when after the first world war, when for the first time, the tools of technology and science were used in warfare.

There had been warfare for thousands of years before. But now it became magnified through the tools of science and technology, bombs, gas, poison, the substances, artillery, tanks, submarines, machine guns. And suddenly they created havoc that they'd never seen before on such a huge scale, millions and millions of dead.

And nobody actually remembered how did it all start. What was the beginning of the first war? They just drifted into it totally blindly, identified with their little tribe, their little nation.

So that's one way of creating. And whenever you have not touched the source of life within yourself, touched it, realized it, live from it, then you create and add to the karmic burden on the planet because whatever you create has negativity attached to it and karma creates further resistance. It provokes resistance, creates more resistance, and though contributes to the continuation of the dream.

So to put it very simply, when you think something is going to make you happy, if you create this or that, that's not going to happen. That's the ignorance. If you're looking for fulfillment through something that you imagine you're going to create, it's not going to fulfill you, it can't.

You have to come from that state of fulfillment already. Then a different kind of creation can happen. You could, of course, just sit for the rest of your life somewhere and hope that somebody will put some food into your mouth as if you go to India and you're truly emanate peace, then that will happen.

They will put food into your mouth. If you do it in a Western country, it probably won't happen, but they'll put you away. And then they'll put food in your mouth.

That's okay. Most people find that even if they rest in presence, at some point, the impulse to act will be there. It could be action on a small scale, very small scale.

It could be action on a larger scale. It may not immediately be action. It may be an inspiration or an idea or a vision that suddenly rises into your mind.

And then you contemplate that and it feels empowered. And it is not something that says you need to achieve that in order to become happy or fulfilled. The energy that goes with it is so empowering that it is the same as if you had already achieved it.

That's the act of creation has that energy that flows with it. It is as powerful as the actual achievement in itself, if not more so, because the actual achievement is already the end of the creative process. The moment you have completed the creative act, you're already at the end of it.

And what now? So the empowerment is in the doing, not the arriving. That's the egoic delusion is that the empowerment is in the arriving, but the empowerment is in the doing, in the act of creation.

It's not just the empowerment, it's also the joy and aliveness that comes with it. So you don't need the, as it's called in the Bhagavad Gita, the fruit of the action. You're not looking or are more focused on the fruit of the action that it's called in the Bhagavad Gita, which means the outcome, the desired outcome.

You're not, your attention is not mainly in the desired outcome. Your attention is on the doing itself. Although, yes, you have a vision of what it is that wants to come into being, but your attention is fully in the doing and the enjoyment and the empowerment of doing.

It can be very intense, the act of creation. The energy that flows into it can be very intense. It's so intense that it might even look to an outsider as if you were stressed, but you're not.

But there can be that intensity of creation. So when something comes through or you, in whatever form, and that's beautiful, then you are the universe, the creative, the one intelligence, the one creative intelligence is creating through the human form, and that's beautiful. So it's this deep enjoyment in the act of creation.

It's the, the motivation is not egoic anymore. The motivation is not a sense of lack or fulfillment or of unfulfillment, but enjoyment. So in that sense, this, the secret, I don't remember if the secret talks about that, the book, that the foundation is the present moment as oneness with that, and then creation is fine when you no longer believe that certain things that you add to your life or create are going to make you happy or fulfilled.

So that's the difference. So the question then, do I need to make plans? I can't answer that as such.

You may be one of the few who will rest in being for the rest of their lives in this bodily form and just sit somewhere or walk around. And that's fine too, but it's less likely. There are very few.

It happens, maybe in India happens more than in the West, just as well, because the environment there is more receptive to that kind of thing. As for example, Ramana Maharshi, the, some of you may know, have heard the famous blue, wonderful spiritual teacher who passed away in the early 50s. He just sat, when he was a young boy, he left his home.

He had a realization of being, of awakening. And he sat next to a temple away from his hometown. He left his family.

Nobody knew where he was. And he just, there was no movement into action, just being, no speaking, didn't want to eat, just the bliss of total oneness with the source. But after a few years, he started to put food in his mouth and then he started to speak.

So a little bit of doing happened even to him, but no planning. So in his case, he didn't say, okay, I'm going to set up an ashram. That happened by itself.

The ashram organically grew. So it can happen to some people who are just either totally present and then something happens around you. In most cases, some kind of doing will be involved.

It could be a spontaneous unfolding of what is happening already. Let's say you're playing an instrument and you love it so much that you just, you enjoy playing it. And then gradually music comes to you.

You compose something or spontaneously play. And suddenly, without any vision of what you want to achieve, things can grow. This can happen.

It has happened to people. Just the intense enjoyment of the doing leading to organic growth into form. The Beatles loved making their music and I don't think they had necessarily a vision that we are going to be the greatest ever, but it happened out of the deep enjoyment and the intensity of that act of creation.

[Speaker 4] (12:56 - 12:56)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (13:21 - 1:41:27)

A couple of weeks ago, I spoke briefly at a conference in San Francisco. A big conference, close to 10,000 people. Annual conference, mostly for business people, but always towards the very end, they have a spiritual person.

Which is better than no spiritual person. And then the organizer invited a small group of people who spoke at the conference and some who attended the conference to his home for dinner. Small group, meaning 150.

And he organized even some entertainment. The main person providing the entertainment is a kind of yogi magician. Nobody knows exactly whether he's more of a yogi or more of a magician, or whether it's a combination, or whether everything is just tricks.

Anyway, this person, the main entertainment of the evening, when people had eaten in the garden, they had erected a tent, a big tent, enough for 150 people. In the middle of the area, there was a raised pedestal and on it was a gigantic water tank, glass, transparent, with a few fishes swimming in it. And then it was announced that this man would now come and get into this tank and hold his breath for seven minutes.

And that's what happened. He came, still wearing a few clothes, and he climbed up, submerged himself in the tank. And of course, everybody could see him.

He was floating in there and there was a countdown and for seven minutes, and while he was in there, he looked at everybody from inside the tank, like a fish would look at you, but completely kind of still. And he managed to hold his breath for seven minutes and then finally he came out. And then after he had recovered from that ordeal, the organizer wanted me to meet him.

So there were a few people standing around and he was there. And one of the people standing around said, can you do that, he asked me. And I said, I don't think I can, but I can stop thinking for seven minutes.

And the man who had been in the tank said, it's very much like that. He meant, I suppose, being in the tank. And he probably meant when he's in the tank, he's not thinking because if he were thinking, he wouldn't last for seven minutes.

Presuming that it's not a trick, we don't know, but it didn't seem to be a trick. He was just in there holding his breath. So I mentioned this story because I want to emphasize again this afternoon, the main point of why we're here.

And that is to fully realize that there are two dimensions, so to speak, to who you are. The one that is defined in form, which includes the physical form and the psychological form and the thinking entity. So your consciousness has the two dimensions.

There's an intermediate area, but we don't need to go there. There's the conscious dimension of thinking and that creates your conventional sense of identity. And there is the deeper space where there is a vast consciousness that is not defined in form.

So there's the two of you, the known, the person, and the unknown, the undefined, or as the Buddha called it, the unmanifested, the unborn, the uncreated. And the Buddha added, this is one of the sutras in my free translation. So he said, there is the unborn, the unmanifested, the uncreated.

If there were not, sorry, the sutras are a little bit repetitive. If there were not the unborn, the unmanifested, the uncreated, there would be no escape from the born, the manifested, and the created. And I'm adding in my free translation and you would be completely stuck in it and with it.

So there is a dimension in every human that is far deeper than what you conventionally consider is the I. So you can say there is the I that is just defined through thought, and there is a deeper I that is not defined. And the purpose of your existence really is in evolutionary terms, is to find that deeper being, the undefined, the unknown, and bring that into this dimension and into your life.

And you all have made the discovery already that you don't need to think continuously, and that your deeper sense of who you are does not depend on what your mind is saying about who you are. There is a more immediate, much more real sense of I than you could ever find through thinking about who you are. So to access the unmanifested, the unborn, the uncreated, if you want to use those words, you have to find within yourself the space of no thought, which is always there.

It's just covered up by continuous thought. Doesn't have to be. So gradually, you find that the unknown you comes through more and more.

First, you have to become comfortable. I mentioned it briefly the other day. First, you need to become comfortable when you enter that space with not knowing anything, because that is the, you're accessing the unknown, the undefined, which is primordial intelligence itself, not intelligence that has become thought.

That's the only thing you can measure to a limited degree, but there's primordial intelligence. In order to access that, you have to give up, not completely because it's still there, but your reliance, exclusive reliance, and main reliance on accumulated knowledge and on thinking. If you don't give up your reliance on conditioned knowledge and thinking, you can never go beyond.

So you would be very limited, not be creative, and ultimately, not wise. You can have a highly developed mind, but lacking in wisdom. And to have a highly developed mind and lacking in wisdom as an underlying guiding force, and that comes from the deeper level, to have that highly developed mind, whether it's a person or a society, culture, is a dangerous thing, because that mind can create havoc for yourself and others.

And the more developed it is, the more destructive it potentially is also. So you find that often with people who, some people who run countries, of course they have a university degree, and they, well, not all, but some might be considered intelligent in conventional terms. And yet very often their actions are actually very unintelligent.

They don't take into account the totality of the situation, the deeper implications of their actions. So they're not, whatever they say or do is not connected to the realm of wisdom. Don't need to mention any names, but look at any politician that comes to mind, look at the past 20 years.

Some may come to mind. Such lack of wisdom, quite amazing. And then you have the highly developed industry that creates dreadful weapons of destruction.

And these people who make these, they're all intelligent. Otherwise they wouldn't be able to do that. But how can you build an atom bomb without intelligence?

It requires highly intelligent people. So wisdom, intelligence needs to be guided by something deeper. And that deeper then needs to, can actually use the mind, the human mind, as an instrument for its expression.

And so, again, in order to get to that place, which is not a place, it's just a deeper dimension to who you are, you need to give up that reliance, that unconscious belief that you continuously need to think, to work things out, because otherwise things will get out of control. So every moment you need to have some kind of, comes to some kind of conclusion about this, what's happening at this moment. You immediately have some kind of opinion and conclusion and call it something.

And often at school, that quick, the quick, like a very quick comeback is often encouraged. The people who are, when the teacher asks questions, the one who can give the quickest answer is usually considered the best. And then there are others who may be slower and they don't even have time to raise their hand because it hasn't sunk in yet.

The question hasn't, the question needs to sink in and then at some point an answer may come, but they don't wait for them. There was, for example, when Einstein was four years old, his parents became concerned because their serious concern was that he might be mentally retarded because he was so slow at thinking. So we need to have that courage to go into that unknown place.

And what is that unknown place? Which is not a place. It's not to impose immediately interpretations on the world and on situations and on people and whatever arises.

So to be able to just look at things, look not just visually, but look in, also used metaphorically, which means to give attention to whatever is here now and to feel the power of your attention itself, which is intelligence, like a light that shines on a situation or on a person. And to feel that inherent power of consciousness that falls, is not, doesn't, is not produced by you. It comes through you.

Then you feel enormous amount of so-called self-confidence, not egoic self-confidence, but you are connected with, you can feel there's a power at the depth of who you are. And that power can flow into this moment. And it is there when you give your fullest attention to something and you're not thinking about it.

You're just looking, you're just giving attention. It could be a situation, a person you're looking at, whatever it is. You're just there as a field of attention, of awareness.

And so you are the bringer of awareness. And that flows from a deep place that is far transcends who you are as this physical form. That deep place connects you, not only with others or other humans, it also connects you with a source of all life.

And so you are not disconnected. You just seem to be. And the ego is a disconnected sense of self.

You are not disconnected from the totality of the universe. You are an aspect of the totality of the universe. You're not autonomous.

That's the delusion that every person is considered to be an independent consciousness, whereas the truth is every person is an expression of the one consciousness. So when you can feel that one consciousness as presence within yourself, you don't go around in continuous anxiety anymore. What's the next thing that's going to upset me?

And of course it always comes. So in other words, a certain confidence comes in that is not based on anything that you have perhaps achieved on the level of form. It's not confidence because you have an important position.

It's not confidence because you have accumulated wealth, not confidence because other people think you're great or not confidence because you have a certain ability that you have developed that you're better at than most people. Usually those things, or you look better than most people, or at least above average, either good looks or you have a great body. So all those things could give you your sense of confidence.

So a person who is very good looking would gain most, unless there are other factors, where that person is even more remarkable, but in the absence of other factors, the good looking person would predominantly gain self-confidence from looking in the mirror and seeing other people's reactions to who they are, which could be admiration and envy, depending on who is looking at you. And the ego would quite love that. It loves admiration and envy.

And so it feels, you feel confident because you're so good looking. And that lasts for, could last for a few years. And then it gets shaky because good looks don't last indefinitely.

And that's just one example. But whatever it is, it could be wealth. It could be what other people think of you.

So you derive confidence from some source, but that's always very shaky. And you may lose it when in certain situations, for example, the person who is confident because of their good looks might suddenly no longer be confident, surrounded by people who are intellectuals or have a lot of knowledge. And suddenly that person feels so stupid.

And so confidence collapses. So, and we often have examples of people who seem to have everything. They should have a lot of confidence.

They've got, they were born into wealth. They look relatively good. They've had a good education, conventional terms.

And yet even that for many people they still feel, I'm not really good enough. And they can't quite explain why. So for some people, those external things work.

And for many others, even those don't work. So the real self-confidence is only there when you transcend the self. So we can then drop the word self and then you have true confidence.

And confidence means trust. And trust means absence of fear or anxiety, or a sense of not good enough, or a continuous compulsion to compare yourself to others, which makes life very uncomfortable. You always look around at others.

So the true confidence is not really self-confidence. The self, because there is the self, which is, that's one name we can have for ego. The moment you're not thinking, but you are just a presence, where is the self?

Where is the ego? It's gone. It's only when you start thinking again about yourself and your problems, then there's the self.

Well, not always problems, but often. But when you start thinking about yourself and your life situation, and so all the things you're dealing with, there's the self. And what you have and what you don't have, and what you can do and what you cannot do, and what you are aspiring to, and what you are proud of, and what you regret, and what you feel guilty about, and all those things that make up the egoic self, that can be transcended in an instant if you stop thinking.

And then suddenly there's only that presence. And then you're connected with the deeper. And then, at first, it comes in glimpses.

And then you are connected to the source of intelligence, and power, and aliveness. And then you suddenly feel very confident. And we can't quite say why, because if a person asks you, why are you confident?

You're not particularly good at anything. You don't look particularly great. You have no wealth.

You haven't got that much of an education. And why are you feeling so confident? And you would say, I don't know.

Ultimately, confidence means absence of fear. And the spiritual word for confidence in spiritual terminology would be faith. That is the real meaning of faith.

Faith is not to have a belief in a particular story. That's often people think faith is the same as belief. So if you believe in this particular story, even the story that there is a God somewhere who protects you, it's still a story.

And you might have faith in the story that there is a God somewhere who looks after you. It's fine. It's probably a bit more comfortable to have that than to have the belief that there is no God who looks after you in the absence of anything else.

Slightly better to have the belief there's a God who looks after you, but that's going to be very shaky when something bad happens to you. Because you had a deal. You had a deal with God and you had all that faith.

And what has he done for you? He was supposed to look after you. Was he asleep when that bad thing happened?

So it often happens that people who say they have faith, they go to church, but when something really bad happens, it gets very shaky suddenly. Sometimes they lose their faith. Sometimes they take refuge again and find some explanation.

They say, well, the traditional explanation is, well, he's punishing me for my sins. So that's it. And then the story works again.

So you have repaired the story. But so that is what is conventionally called faith. But true faith is the absence of fear and is not derived from a story.

It is derived from a deeper place within yourself. And that's what, if Jesus uses faith, this is what he talks about. Not believe in a particular.

Later, the people who wrote down what he taught, they already had misunderstood to a large extent. So distortions already started there. And then they had to translate from the language that he spoke in into other languages and another language, oh, it's a long story.

So faith is trust. Trust is absence of fear. And that can only be there by accessing that deeper dimension within yourself.

And the quickest way there is suspend thinking and feel yourself as the presence. And you will then find that gradually presence increases in your life. It comes through more.

And gradually it begins to replace your ordinary conventional sense of identity, which is still has the remnants of it are still there, of course. For example, I can think about my childhood. I can think about my twenties and thirties and what happened then, what I was doing then.

And so in that sense, I can even meet people that I knew a long time ago and just re-recognize each other although we look different after many years, meet people again. So in that sense, of course, that still is that kind of continuity that is upheld by thought. And so you remember all those things.

And, but who you are, your sense of beingness, of identity, of who you are is not derived from that anymore. Nor is it derived from your current life situation, whether you are rich or poor or influential, don't know what that means, or non-influential. If you look at the hundred, once a year, they choose the hundred most influential people on the planet.

And with some of them, you can understand, okay, that makes sense. But with others, you say, what? One person can shake their body in a particular way.

It becomes the one most, one to a hundred most, well, it's interesting choice. And many other examples. Don't want to mention any names.

So all that influence, all that stuff, all those things no longer matter. So I found, for example, luckily my old sense of identity kind of dissolved. And then there was that confidence, but in the eyes of the world, that confidence was misplaced.

It was, nobody understood it. And most people didn't even notice it because I don't necessarily appear very confident in ordinary human interactions. I'm kind of, don't say that much.

And some people call me shy. So, but I knew I had this feeling of rootedness in being, but everybody else thought I, my life was ruined because I had abandoned my academic career and had nothing else to replace it with. So how, why do you feel okay with yourself?

You've, you have nothing. You've, you've thrown it all away. So my mom didn't understand me at all.

She only understood me again after I'd become successful. So there was, there was that quiet confidence in the background that wasn't based on anything external. I could have thought back, well, I was, I did get into Cambridge, so I must be great, but then I dropped out, so that's not good.

So I could have constructed some kind of story in my mind, I got into Cambridge, but I was too good for them, so that's why I dropped out. There could have been a story that temporarily would have been satisfying, but not for long. And some stories are quite absurd.

People actually, many people actually have fictitious stories about who they are based on events that never happened, but let's not go there. So my sense of identity then as the unsuccessful person, and then the so-called successful person didn't change, just exactly the same feeling of beingness, of I-ness. There was no change between being nobody in particular and being somebody special in the eyes of the world, but there was no change in the feeling of identity, unfortunately, because my ego would have, the big ego I had in my twenties would have loved that success, would have gone, yay, I made it, but it was too late.

So accessing the, that not knowing, state through presence, become comfortable with not knowing so that you don't compulsively interpret everything all the time. Then you access greater intelligence. And then at first, gradually, you notice it flows into, you might find yourself saying things that surprise you in certain situations, only when the situation requires it.

You don't just say it into nothingness. When the situation requires it, you find yourself saying something. Oh, what did I just say?

That's interesting. Or you take certain action or certain insights come to you. You're kind of carried or kind of guided, but not in a narrow sense.

Intuition arises more, more creative thoughts, because thoughts still come. But as you become comfortable with not knowing, the thoughts tend to be less destructive. And that element of destructiveness goes eventually out completely.

So thoughts don't torture you anymore. Your own, because millions on this planet are being tortured on a daily basis, not by anybody, but by their thoughts. An enormous amount of suffering is created on a daily basis by millions of people on the planet.

They create it for themselves. They don't know it. It's amazing state.

That's why we call it unconscious. So that doesn't happen anymore. So thoughts still operate.

Even some drifting thoughts still occasionally happen, but they are harmless. They're no longer poisonous vipers that bite you. They're thought, oh, oh.

And then another thought, oh no, what am I going to do? And then if that wasn't enough, more thoughts come. And so much fear is generated by thought, not by situations, but by thoughts.

So that's, you need to, as soon as possible, get out of that. Another wonderful shift that happens is the usual state is you're always confronted with situations and people, and they change all the time. And that makes up your external life, a continuous change of people that come in, situations change, places change, and things happen.

And mostly those who are unconsciously identified with the egoic self are, so to speak, underneath the situations, which means the situations determine their inner state, their state of happiness or unhappiness or well-being, their state of mind, their emotional state. So the simplest example, just to simplify, just to show you what I mean, it rains one day and they go, oh, what a miserable day. Next day, it's sunny.

Oh, it's sunny. That means you are under the situation. You're not above the situation, you're under it.

The situation controls you. And I've given them the simplest possible example, but even that happens very commonly. So, especially if you live in London or Seattle or Vancouver, where it rains quite a lot, then if you are dependent to some extent, even on the weather for feeling good or not good, then that's what happens.

But you will notice when you look out of the window, the real pain comes with saying, what a miserable day. It's, the rain is nothing in itself. It just is.

But you call it something. And it's not just a middle, it's another miserable day. And the moment you have used the word, the thought miserable, it connects to other things in your life that you can also call miserable.

And there we go, that's the beginning of a day. And that's the beginning of a storyline in your head. And you are under the situation.

So whatever situation you go into, and now of course there are many more complex situations in your life than the weather, you meet a person. Now, how does this person behave towards you? How that person behaves towards you, of course depends on the state of consciousness of that person.

Now, and then how do you behave to that person after you've had their reaction towards you? What is your reaction towards them? And usually if you're under the situation, your actions and words and how you feel are determined by the other person's actions and words.

In other words, an angry person will make you angry too. Or other states, a confrontational person, when you're discussing a certain subject, whatever state of consciousness that person manifests, you will follow if you're under the situation. Or things, of course, continuously, not continuously, but frequently in one's life, things in quotation marks go wrong because you've made plans to do something and something comes to interfere with your plans.

Things are going wrong. The usual thing, if you're under the situation, you get upset, you get miserable. You complain to yourself and others.

That's dreadful. Now, considering the fact that these things happen quite frequently in everybody's life, that is not a powerful way to live. If you are at the mercy of situations, you're at the mercy of things going exactly the way you planned them and the way they are supposed to go.

And if they don't, you get upset. Some people get sad or depressed, others get angry and irritated, whatever it is. So you are at the mercy of things happening or not happening or happening in a particular way, or people behaving towards you in a particular way.

So you're under, you're always at the mercy of stuff happening or not happening. And if you are more deeply connected with the presence, that is the source of satisfaction in your life. Every other source of satisfaction is kind of fake, pseudo, not the real thing.

Presence, that arising presence is the source of satisfaction, the primary source of satisfaction in your life. Yes, there are secondary sources of satisfaction. Of course, an apple pie.

You have a nice swim, feels good. You go for a hike. You have sex.

You have a drink. You even achieve something. You learn to master a certain skill.

And then as you practice, it's satisfying. And then you achieve it, it's satisfying. These are all secondary satisfactions in your life.

And there's nothing wrong with that, of course. And if you meet a long lost friend, suddenly, oh, it's great to meet you. It's so wonderful.

Of course, there is a satisfaction in that, but they are all secondary satisfactions. The main source of satisfaction is the presence. And even all those things that are secondary satisfaction, many of them are because for a moment, they bring you into presence.

For example, if you're climbing a mountain or you're hiking or you're walking on the beach or you're swimming, certain activities take you out of your mind and can bring you into presence while they last. And you feel so good. And you think it's caused by the activity, but it's caused by the fact that all the habitual torturous thinking subsided and you're suddenly completely there.

That was so good, that swim, that hike, that whatever it was, it was so good. Okay, why? Well, it was good because, were you thinking?

No. Were you thinking about yesterday or tomorrow or your problems or your difficult life or difficult people in your life? No.

Okay, you were completely present. So once you realize and sense that true satisfaction is derived from presence, that means when things go wrong in ordinary life, when you encounter undesirable, so-called undesirable circumstances, when things don't work out they were supposed to work out, things break, suddenly you lose something, a difficult person comes into your life. You can, even in that situation, you can continue to be in touch with the source of satisfaction.

Let's say you made great plans for some great wedding and suddenly on the wedding day, something happens and the groom or the bride are detained somewhere and they can't make it. And we've invited 300 people and we've paid thousands of dollars for this wedding and I've been looking forward to this for years. It was supposed to be the culmination of my life.

It's a fictitious situation, but it could happen and probably has happened. It's just one of many possible examples. So this is a very unpleasant thing if you're not in touch with a true source of satisfaction and you go all shaky and upset or hysterical, whatever, depending on your predispositions.

If you lock yourself in a room or you scream, depending on whatever kind of ego you have. But if you are in touch with the source of satisfaction, in presence, well, okay, that's a pity. But of course we'll have it some other day.

And you continue to feel a sense of aliveness because after all, this moment isn't that bad just because the wedding has collapsed and I'm using the collapsed wedding as a metaphor of whatever collapses or goes wrong. So here we have, and you are then above the situations in your life. They don't control you anymore.

And I wouldn't go so far as to say that you control them. To some extent, of course, you can manifest certain good things, but you're never totally in control of externals. There are many other factors.

So, and you don't need to be totally in control of externals. So question always arises, are you above the situation or are you below the situation? Are you at the mercy of situations and people or are you free of dependency on how other people behave towards you or how certain situations evolve or happen or dependent on whether something happens or does not happen?

Shortly after my, this shift in consciousness, I had saved some money to visit my dad in Spain. And because his wife was extremely challenging, it was agreed that I would stay in a small hotel. That was, I was in my, I think I was about 30 years old.

So I was looking forward, of course, to going to, I lived in England, going to a sunny Southern Spain, spending 10 days there. And I booked, or my dad booked for me a place. He didn't have any money at that time.

Well, he had some money, but not, I think not enough to book a great room for me. So he made a booking, but he hadn't looked at the hotel or the room. And when I arrived, the hotel was by the sea.

So I imagined a view of the beautiful blue Mediterranean Sea. And when I got there and I looked out the window, there was a brick wall. It was facing away from the sea, and there was a kind of cliff, and there was just a brick wall and a little bit of sky.

And so I stood there and looked at the brick wall, and suddenly I felt incredibly peaceful. And I suddenly realized it doesn't matter at all whether I have a sea view or a brick wall. Why didn't it matter?

Because there was a flow of satisfaction coming from within. If it had been my choice, I would have said, I prefer a sea view to a wall view. But I didn't have a choice.

And I was amazed because that was not long after this inner shift. So I wasn't yet familiar with all the effects it has on things in one's life. And there were many, many instances when I was amazed.

I said, why do I feel so peaceful? I don't know, I just feel, I did nothing. In this particular case, I knew that at some level, it did not, ultimately did not matter.

And that was so liberating. So liberating. That reminds me of a very similar story.

We had a retreat in probably Oregon many years ago. And one of the participants who was also a friend of ours had just started to unpack things in her room, the retreat room, when a woman burst into her room without knocking, in tears and sounding hysterical. And she said, this was supposed to be my room.

And they put me somewhere else. I asked specifically for this room. I've been waiting for this retreat for a long, long time.

And I'm having difficulties in my life. And he says, oh, just don't try to. And our friend, without even having, giving it a single thought, said, you can have it.

I'll move into yours. And the woman's, really? No, do you mean that?

Oh my God, how wonderful, thank you so much. I'm so happy. It is probably true that she had been through difficult times, yes.

But she was totally at the mercy of externals. And our friend, I didn't inquire further how she felt when she moved into that undesirable room, which probably wasn't that bad. I don't think there was a brick wall outside the window.

She was fine. So in her, there was some connectedness with the source of satisfaction. So her wellbeing did not depend on what kind of room she was in.

Now, does that mean whatever room they put you in, when you book a room in a hotel, you should say, okay, not necessarily. Why not, if that is not the right room, you can talk to the, actually, this isn't the room I booked. I'd rather have the room that I booked and paid for, and then see what happens.

But again, there is not going to be that, ah, ah, or the anger. This is, how dare you put me in this room? You lose all, there's no longer a flow of, do you remember we talked about what makes up a true human?

It's goodwill towards other humans, a flow of benevolence and goodwill, no matter what the situation is. And even if you're complaining about your room, you can complain, and there can still be a flow of benevolence and goodwill because there is a human being there. That human being may have nothing to do with the fact that they put you in the wrong room.

And you probably know that, but you're angry with him or her. So, of course you can change situations. And I think I probably asked, I don't remember all the details, I may have asked, I'm sure I did in that, when I got to that hotel with a brick wall outside, do you have another room with a sea view?

Sorry, that's all we have left. Okay. So it was a surprise to me that, one that I could be okay with that.

And I don't know how this woman from the retreat, whether she benefited from the retreat and whether by now, I haven't seen her in a long time, I wish her well, and I do hope that by now, she has found the source of true satisfaction within herself so that the wrong room does not create an enormous amount of suffering. If a wrong room creates an enormous amount of suffering, how much suffering when something really goes wrong? So connect to the source of satisfaction, otherwise you're at the mercy of stuff and people.

How do you connect? Access the space of aware presence and stop thinking for a moment. Stopping thinking is not an action that you do as if you were attacked your mind and told your mind, stop thinking.

It is possible to stop thinking if you hold your breath for long enough. But eventually, even if you hold it for seven minutes, eventually you have to breathe again and then we'd have to think again. So it's not, you cannot force that presence onto yourself.

And stopping thinking is not an action you take against thinking. It is rather a letting go of thinking. One could say a dropping, you relinquish, you realize that right now you don't want it, you don't need it.

It's superfluous to the situation. So you just, it's more a letting go than an active interference of what's happening in your mind. It's a surrender.

This is why it is often associated with surrendering to what is because surrendering to what is is not attacking what is or fighting with or through some kind of internal struggle, bring about surrender, that doesn't work. You cannot bring about surrender through some extra internal struggle. I must surrender.

But there's something in me that doesn't want to surrender. Surrender is just a, this is what is. So this moment brings you into presence and into yourself.

And so I would suggest even so that presence, give it a chance so that presence can arise more and more in you and use situations. I already pointed out a few, and there's some in the books where you invite the state of not thinking into your life. I talked about the waiting.

You remember whenever you're waiting for something, be alert, be present, be completely there and drop all the nonsense in your mind that says this shouldn't be happening. Be completely there with your attention. Feel your attention, feel the attention.

And then you look around and there is nothing wrong with this situation where you are waiting unless the mind tells you there is something wrong. But there's nothing wrong with the situation. That's an amazing realization.

Associated with that is you will be able to differentiate between a situation and your reaction to the situation. Unconscious people cannot distinguish something that happens and the way they react to what happens. They are a single thing.

So again, to bring it down to the simplest example, unconscious people cannot tell the difference between when they look out of the window in the morning and it's raining and their mind says what a miserable day. They actually believe that it is a miserable day. They can't distinguish between the situation and their mental, emotional interpretation of the situation.

They become a single phenomenon. That's a mark of unconsciousness. So if you can tell apart, perhaps even in the moment of calling something, something, you look out of the window and suddenly you realize, well, there's water coming down from the sky and it's raining.

And here's my reaction to it. Here's the story in my mind that says it's a miserable day. Suddenly you've separated the two.

Once you've separated the two, you realize you end up with this baggage in your hand of that which your mind added to the situation. Do you still want that miserable thing or you just drop it? And suddenly you look out of the window and it is as it is.

And that's freedom. So I've just gave a very simple example, can be applied to any situation. So there's always just the isness of this moment which cannot ever be otherwise.

Of course, you can take a step to change what is now, but right now it is. The mind, the egoic mind does not know the basic fact that what is right now already is and cannot be otherwise because it already is. This is perhaps the most basic truth you could utter, but the egoic mind doesn't know that.

It says, oh no, it is, but it shouldn't be. And, or this is another person, let's say it's a person. The isness comes to you in the form of a person.

So this is how this person, this is what this person says and does. And this is the emotional energy or mental energy that you can feel coming from that person. That's what it is.

Should it be otherwise? Your mind could say that, but if you become completely okay with that's what is, then immediately you are in touch with a deeper, because you are not, no longer ego-based. So you can, even if, even just that acceptance will drop you into presence and suddenly you can feel, even if you had lost it for a moment, suddenly you can feel it again by simply accepting this moment as it is.

And suddenly you feel, oh, there's a presence. Feel yourself as the presence. So you need to do little things to become more comfortable with the state of pure awareness and not thinking.

For example, it sounds a little silly, walk from point A to point B. It could be just as little as from the chair to that vase, or vase, as it's called in America. You can walk from the chair to the vase, vase.

It took me years, several years of living in North America before I could get myself to say tomato, because I'd lived in England for so many years and it was a tomato. But after a while, waiter smiled when I said tomato. And so eventually for a day came when I said tomato.

Okay. There's a vase, the vase. Can you walk from here to there?

This is point A, that's point B in pure awareness. So when you go for a walk, look at the tree that's right ahead of you there and say between here and now, I'll just be present with every step. And then you just walk and you are that field of presence.

It's not long, so it's not a big thing to achieve. So you just go, oh, wow, I wasn't thinking. Let's see if I can do it.

It's not a doing, it's you're letting go. The thinking is a doing. So you're letting go of the doing.

The only doing you do is the walking. And that happens by itself virtually because you don't have to do it. And while you walk, you can look around and be just very present.

You don't have to go as sometimes when they do walking meditation in Buddhist monasteries, they go. That's fine if it works for you, that's fine too. But it doesn't have to be that complicated, just walk.

And then the next tree, that's a little bit further. Just, so if you give yourself, you use that space, that external space and make it into a temporal space where in you practice the timeless presence between here and there. So that somehow it makes it a little easier rather than say, okay, I'll try and be present while I walk around here now.

Give you, later you don't need that anymore. Just a little, another thing that I often recommend as you may know, perform a small action in complete presence. It could be a simple thing as lifting a glass of water or any object and putting it from here and putting it there.

But the movement is not a means to an end. You're just present. You're not just looking to the end result.

You want to put it there, it's a normal thing, but just, or you can lift it and drink and just be, and then it travels back to the table and you're still not thinking. And then you put it down and then you can start thinking again. And then you need another zip of water.

In that way, you could get addicted to water. And if there is a source of suffering in your life right now, it can be, I'm not talking about any action that you can or need to take right now, then do it. But a lot of suffering in one's life does not involve any particular action that you can take right now.

It is, you carry it in your mental, emotional field. And any such suffering can be burned away, so to speak, through intense presence. Just go, no past, no future.

Just be the presence, intense. This is the sword, I occasionally use that expression, the sword of presence that cuts through time and suffering because in the absolute presence, suffering cannot survive. And people who evolve, awaken spiritually through being confronted with physical suffering or potentially life-threatening illness, some of them learn that lesson.

And the lesson is, I must not leave the present moment. We saw a clip yesterday where the woman learned to be in the present. I must not leave the present moment because the moment I leave the present moment, I begin to suffer.

That could be, if the doctor tells you you only have a limited time to live, then you have to, it's awful if you go thinking there, thinking about your past, thinking about your future, which is getting shorter and shorter. But just, so that some situations sometimes push you into presence, but you don't have to wait for life to push you into presence. You can actually choose presence.

So if you have a moderate amount of suffering in you at this moment, bring more alertness to this moment. Be more, turn up the light, the light of presence. It's a little bit like a dimmer switch.

You can turn it up and there's no tension involved in it. You just go, you're so present that past and future do not intrude anymore. And even thoughts, only little thoughts come and go, doesn't intrude anymore.

You just go, that is the mark of the Zen master. The Zen master is, you can see the old paintings, the old drawings of Zen masters, they all look. And what are they saying?

They're saying, I'm not leaving the present moment. And that's where their power comes from. And that burns away all suffering because suffering is here.

Of course, you could still have a toothache or you could still have physical pain, but that's not suffering, that's just pain. Suffering is what you built on top of that, psychological suffering. So once you separate to learn, once you learn to separate the situation from your interpretation, also you become present.

You can just as present with what the is-ness of the situation. Practice presence. Strange thing, I never write things down.

I was going to do questions, that the original idea was to do questions this afternoon. And suddenly I realized, no, well, it came from within. This needs to be about presence to remind them and bring back the energy of presence because that's the only thing this is about.

And what almost never happens, I'd scribble down a few notes. I never take notes to talks. I scribble down a few notes, I have to tell them this, this, this, this, this.

Very strange. Let's look at the notes. Oh, I've already said it all.

You see, you don't need notes. It's done. Another simple way, of course, is a conscious breath.

Brings you into presence. Conscious breath means now. A very quick way of taking attention away from thinking.

Just conscious means you feel the breath moving in and moving out. One conscious breath brings you into presence. And then you might even want to take a second conscious breath because it feels so good not to be stuck in your head, in your mind anymore.

And what does it mean it feels so good? You're getting in touch, perhaps just a little bit at first, with the source of all satisfaction in your life. I have had, as I mentioned before, I have had letters from people in prison who discovered this secret.

They were in prison, they are in prison, and discovered the source of true satisfaction, which is presence. And suddenly they go. They are free, internally free.

Being in the body is, of course, another way of being anchored in presence, particularly people who are very much in their minds. Feeling the inner body at the same time as you look around, feeling the aliveness pervading your inner body, and at the same time, having enough attention left to be aware of your surroundings, but no attention left for thinking. Because if you feel the inner body and you are perceiving your surroundings visually, through looking, listening, and feeling, you will not have anything left for thinking.

Try it now. Feel the aliveness. Can you feel the aliveness that pervades your body?

In your hands, your feet, your legs, the entire body? There it is. But you can still perceive the room.

Of course you can. And you can hear the sounds, the words. But there isn't much left for thinking now, because some of it is in the body and others is in sense perceptions.

Very little left for thinking, probably nothing. Isn't that wonderful? You don't have to think.

And then a moment comes, and that is your greatest achievement in life. You can achieve nothing greater. The moment comes when you simply say, okay, I'm not thinking now.

Don't need to think. And then you let go of thinking for a certain period of time. A minute, two minutes.

Occasional thought may come in and drifts out, doesn't matter anymore. And you perceive and you feel that presence. So you have the choice to think or not to think.

That's enormous power, that you're no longer at the mercy of your mind. That's the end of the matrix. And some of you, perhaps right here and now, I'm not going to ask, tell me whether you can do it or not.

Relinquish thinking at this moment. Just be, but it's not only, there's not just an absence of thought here. There is also the presence of presence.

It's not just a negative thing. There's no thought. But there's also something else and that you cannot define.

It has no shape or form. It's timeless. And that has always been there in your life.

But it was continuously overlooked because thoughts are so noisy and they took your attention away from it. So you may find something, or quite a few of you have already experienced similar things to what the stories I talked about that happened. Or you may find in the very soon, a similar situation where something goes wrong and you go, oh, well, that's a pity.

But the upset isn't there anymore. You still feel that underlying satisfaction. Or if there is upset, it's very much on the surface now.

It doesn't touch your deepest being anymore. There can still be a surface unhappiness, ripples on the surface, but it doesn't go very deep anymore. And sometimes not even that.

You lose something, something goes wrong, and immediately you focus, well, that's what it is. And the present moment isn't... Because of that, the present moment isn't really bad.

It's still the present moment, just as it was before. It always is. And you will find as presence arises more in you, something happens that when you are not very conscious yet, or fairly unconscious, when challenging things happen, you get more unconscious.

People, situations, you react, you get angry, reactive. And then when you reach a certain threshold, something challenging happens, and the presence in you intensifies and you go. So then any challenging situation pushes you into more presence rather than pulls you into unconsciousness.

That is a critical threshold where instead of pulling you into unconscious reaction, the same challenging situation forces you or pushes you into intensified presence. Because the degree of presence that comes through you, into you and through you can vary. It's not always the same intensity.

Sometimes it's a low intensity presence, and it tends to be a higher intensity presence when you're confronted with challenging people or situations. And when that happens, then you know that's a decisive dividing line between being pulled into unconsciousness by unconscious people in situations and being pushed into heightened presence by the same people or situations. So when that happens, you can go, wow, this is so great.

For example, when I sit in my room, there is an underlying presence. And so it's very pleasant. And I look around, don't necessarily have to do anything.

I look out of the window. I can sit there for a long time. I love sitting quietly, doing nothing.

So, I mean, not all the time. Sometimes I do things. And then the time comes, let's say, I look at my watch and say, oh, okay.

I realize even without words, oh, by the way, if you have a watch or a clock at home, you can practice, especially if it doesn't have numbers on it, but just can practice looking at it. And you can know what time it is without any concepts, words in your head, direct knowing. So you look and you know it's a quarter to six, but there are no words that say it's a quarter to six.

You can practice that. You just look and you know. And many things happen that in presence, you look and you know, but you don't have to call it anything.

That is non-conceptual knowledge. You can look at a person and know a lot about that person without any judgment. You can sense their being.

So the time approaches to come here and then give a talk. I've been sitting in my room and then I can feel, it's not a decision on my part at all. I can feel an intensification.

Suddenly, gradually it goes. Presence builds up. No tension in it whatsoever.

Just presence. The light goes up and then I go come here. There's a high intensity of presence.

It's very pleasant, it's beautiful. And when I go back to my room, the intensity decreases and it just goes. So it always responds to the situation, whatever it is.

When something goes wrong, it goes higher again. Not that there's anything wrong with talking here. That's a different matter.

Yeah. When a person comes, I used to see people a lot privately. I don't, haven't done it in a while.

Whenever they come into, they sit down, I look at them. They start talking to me usually about their problems and there's a presence goes. It almost seems to fill the room.

They go away. Presence goes, it doesn't disappear. It just goes, state of rest.

And there have been times, there are times when it comes for no reason whatsoever, very intensely. There have been times when I've, at night, I felt I was being connected to an electric socket and it goes, bleh. There was nothing to do.

But there may be a reason why that happened also, which I, my mind does not understand. So you are here to bring that into this world. Apart from the things you do in your life, they will flow into what you do in your life.

You bring presence through whatever you do. It doesn't matter what you do, whether you're a director or CEO of a company or whether you cut people's hair, makes no difference whatsoever. It comes through you.

Well, that's it, it seems.

[Speaker 5] (1:43:15 - 1:44:11)

My question is around, before you were talking about intensification of presence. So at times I've felt intense energy in my body, throughout my body, but that's more rare. And it's, I feel that I experience presence in more of an underlying calmness or, yeah, calmness.

So my question is, is presence experienced, is there something consistent with presence? Is there something that's felt or a consistent feeling?

[Speaker 1] (1:44:11 - 1:49:53)

Do you mean, does it always feel the same? Is that what you mean, perhaps? Well, the, as I said, the intensity of presence can vary.

Then, so presence is the energy field. Now, this is very hard to talk about, but I'll just, I will make an attempt. It is almost as if there's a place inside from where presence emanates.

And that place is timeless. And I can only compare it in the sense-perceived world, you could compare to this, like the sun that continuously shines, and yet it has no form. So it's like a space, rather, out of which presence emanates.

So the sun isn't actually positive presence, but if you imagine that the sun were an empty space out of which the light emanates, then you get a better, this is closer to the truth of how it is experienced as you go very deeply into it. So there is a space within, or a spaciousness, that is the point out of which the emanation of presence happens. And that space is absolute repose, absolute stillness.

And to feel that in yourself is joy, very joyful, for lack of a better word. There's an aliveness there, but it is absolutely still. That's the core.

And that is, perhaps as I speak of it, you can get a sense within yourself what that is. You can only sense it when you're not thinking. You can't be thinking and sense that.

That's the innermost stillness within you. Out of that emanates presence, which can emanate directly from the body, can also move into your mind and begin to use your mind and inform the mind and speak through the mind. So there were times in my life when I was very passive for, you know my episodes on seeking on park benches, but even after that, for long periods of time, I was so immersed in that inner stillness that there seemed no point in doing anything.

And you don't need to go that way. I didn't have any guidance, so nobody could tell me what to do with that. So I gradually had to learn for myself that you can be active in the world and at the same time completely rooted in the stillness.

So you particularly mentioned the state of calmness when you can feel it. So it may be that you have that connectedness with a still point within and feel that very strongly. It's very hard for people to, people also differ in their choice of words when they speak about it.

So you could ask, if you go to India or you go to any Buddhist country, you may find that, ask them about spiritual awakening, you may find that the words they use to describe it are very, very different. And only if you know already from direct experience what it is they're talking about, you can recognize that they're talking about the same thing. So I've already said too much about it because what I have said, those words may not be what the words that you would choose to talk about your experience of presence.

So are you able to suspend thinking for certain moments without going to sleep?

[Speaker 5] (1:49:54 - 1:49:55)

I'm not sure.

[Speaker 1] (1:49:56 - 1:49:58)

Okay, try it now.

[Speaker 5] (1:49:59 - 1:50:09)

Okay, stop. Okay, how was that? I don't remember a thought.

[Speaker 1] (1:50:10 - 1:50:15)

Okay, so there was no thought because not thinking is not memorable.

[Speaker 5] (1:50:16 - 1:50:18)

Yeah. Okay.

[Speaker 1] (1:50:19 - 2:06:03)

Now, this is very significant. So the mind doesn't know what to do with not thinking because the mind is thought. The mind cannot really appreciate how important not thinking is because what the mind is interested in is, let me ask another question.

That's what the mind is interested in. It's not interested in stepping aside and allowing no thought to arise. So the mind has a certain momentum.

The most important thing is to become familiar with that state of no thought. Far more important than any question that could arise in your mind or any answers that the greatest spiritual teacher could give you. So that's why I mentioned, I believe, in the New Earth, I was visiting that big center where they offer countless fascinating courses on developing this and that faculty and spiritual development and physical development and all kinds of huge number of courses are offered.

But you can have anything, a menu of courses. You can pursue any interest, wonderful and fascinating. So I don't know if you remember reading it.

I wrote, somebody came to me and showed me that program, that menu of fascinating courses and workshops. Said, which one do you think is most suitable for me? And I looked through it.

I said, there's so many, I don't know. But I can tell you this. What, well, the way I put it at that time was, be aware of your breathing just for a few days and you will gain more than attending any of these courses.

And it's free. Be aware of your breath as you go through daily life as much as you can. What does that imply?

That implies there's a space of no thought. Because you cannot be aware of your breath and think at the same time. So if you want rapid acceleration of spiritual awakening, this, by the way, is the last question for tonight appropriately.

If you want rapid acceleration of spiritual awakening, don't ask another question. Because the next question and the next and the next won't get you any closer, especially after. As you can see, I'm winding down the question.

Especially after being here for several days, I have said all that can be said about spiritual awakening. The next step is up to you and it does not consist in, well, let me see. No, I need to, something else I need to know.

I know that some questions are helpful because, but ultimately, the most essential thing is bring presence into your life now, for example, by being aware of your breath as much as you can. It's just one way of bringing presence in. Or feel the inner body as much as you can.

And that's rapid. Or if you can, just step out of thought already without using any of those portals. Just move out of thought.

And some of you can do that already. Then choose that as much as possible in your daily life. Choose to be in thoughtless awareness whenever you don't actually need to think.

And that's quite a lot of the time, especially moving from here to there, doing habitual things, listening to people talking. Be the presence. That's the spiritual practice.

There's no other spiritual practice. Everything else would point to that. But this is the most direct spiritual practice.

And very rapidly, you'll find the shift happening. But it's your choice now. Before, unconscious humans don't have a choice.

When there's no inkling of awareness in you, you don't even know that apart from your thoughts, there's anything else in you, you have no choice. You are being used, you are possessed by thought. You have a choice.

Now, with choice comes responsibility because the moment you have that choice, it implies that there is sufficient awareness in you for you to have choice. Once that has arisen, that choice becomes your responsibility. We have to look at it from that point of view because if people ask me, well, who is responsible?

Presence or you and all kinds of strange questions? The most useful approach is to see that you can choose to be present. That's your responsibility.

Choose to be present in many, many situations in your daily life. Choose presence over useless thinking, for example. When you're in bed at night, when you wake up in the morning, when you're walking in nature or walking to work from here to there or traveling on public transport or sitting in your car, stopping at a red light, choose presence over thinking.

You are able to do that. First, you have to remember that you have a choice. That comes one.

Okay, I have a choice. And then exercise the choice and take your attention away from thinking and put your attention on attention itself. Become conscious of being conscious.

That's your job now. And then you cannot not experience an accelerated arising of presence. It's that simple.

But the weird thing is many people who have the choice still do not exercise their choice. I'm now, what I just described is looking at it from one perspective. From another perspective, which is also true and actually more true but less helpful, it is true to say that when you exercise your choice of being present, what is really happening is that presence is choosing to manifest through you.

But what presence wants you is to feel that you can have that choice because it helps it to manifest. Ultimately, there isn't you and presence. You are an aspect of presence.

So forget about what I just said. But exercise your choice to be present, no matter where you are. And if you lose it, fine.

It's coming back again and again. Of course, you will drift off again sometimes. You drift off into thinking.

You may drift off into reactivity and find, but then come back. The moment you notice it, the moment you notice that you've drifted off into reactivity, your choice is to come back. If you cannot come back directly by saying, okay, I'll just be present, then use either your breath to bring you back, use the awareness of the inner body to bring you back, use some conscious movement to bring you back, or use sense perception to bring you back, looking without labeling.

It's all, all the, especially natural things are helpful. You look at them, look at your dog. He's not thinking.

So, and immediately, it's so easy to be present with an animal, with nature, with the sky. You can use those things as help. So, if you need some additional help to be present, use that.

I sometimes call that a portal into presence. Use the portal of the present moment, which is what present is. Okay, what's the problem right now?

What's wrong now? And then you have to, because the mind has been telling you for an hour that things are very wrong. And then you have to, well, what's wrong?

What's the actual problem at this moment, which after all, is all that ever exists? What's the actual problem at this moment? Well, this has just happened and this might happen.

No, this moment, nothing. I'm sitting here, breathing. There was a man working with Byron Katie, a spiritual teacher.

And he was talking about, oh, I'd love to have enough money and if I had enough money, what I would do, I thank you for your question. I don't know if this is still the answer to your question, but the man was saying, if I had enough money, I would move to Hawaii and that would be so great. That's my dream.

And she said, well, what would you do in Hawaii? He said, well, I would sit in a deck chair by the beach or in my backyard and look at the palm trees, breathe. And she pointed out to him, well, where are you sitting now?

Is the chair comfortable? Yeah. So what's wrong with that chair?

How different would it be to have just a slightly different view around you? You can be in Hawaii now. It's an inner state.

It's just the mind telling you, you need to be somewhere else in order to be happy. You need to be somewhere else. It's here now.

What's wise to seek, postpone fulfillment to some future imagined point, not realizing that the source of all satisfaction is within you already. And then sense that as your very presence. And then the rest is, as Einstein said, I want to know the mind of God.

The rest is details. The mind of God is consciousness. And everything else, whatever happens or doesn't happen, you catch the bus or you miss the bus, you lose money, you gain money, up and down, hot and cold.

That's all the details. So now you go to sleep, lie on your bed and feel the presence pervading the body. And when you wake up, before you do anything else, lie on your back, feel the aliveness in the body, and then look around.

That's a good way of going to sleep and coming out of sleep. Improves your dreams too. Waking up in a dream, you might have had that once or twice.

You suddenly realize you're dreaming. And usually quickly the dream comes to an end. And what's happening here is really very similar.

You're waking up to your essential reality. And then your whole life feels a little bit like a dream unfolding, at least it does to me. But it's quite pleasant.

So you're awake and in the dream. That's lucid dreaming, they call that. And what we are doing here is called lucid living.

Very similar. Oh, tastes so good.

[Speaker 6] (2:06:38 - 2:07:36)

Thank you for this opportunity, for being here and allowing us to become more aware. And my question is a little bit of a follow-up from what you've just said. I know you work with psychotherapists and therapists in helping others.

And my question is, how can we follow up on the analogy of the caterpillar? How can we support others? How can we know if they are there, if they are not there?

Is it possible to help? I don't know what the question is, but it's, can we support someone in this process? You obviously are and Kim is obviously supporting us.

So is there different stages that we can support different people in different processes?

[Speaker 1] (2:07:37 - 2:15:32)

The moment the spiritual awakening, if we want to call it that, happens in you, which is the disidentification from the thinking mind and certain degree of arising of presence. Well, not the moment it happens, but a little bit after that, as this process continues, you, many people find that more and more people come, you meet people sometimes seemingly accidentally, or it might be people who you know already who need you, who also are at a stage of readiness, but don't know it yet. And you may find and will find that these people are drawn to you.

You may not immediately recognize them. In fact, you may think, listen, this person is not going to awaken in this lifetime, but you can get surprise, big surprises. Sometimes the most unlikely people can come to you and you know that that's happening.

There's a moment usually when you notice there is a transmission either of presence as an energy field, or they ask you a question, you give an answer, and the answer has a certain power or aliveness to it. It comes through you spontaneously because the question was a genuine question and there was an opening in the other person. If it's not a genuine question, if it's a question asked out of curiosity, what's that spiritual stuff all about that you do or whatever, or tell me about that spirit stuff, but there's no real opening, then your answer will not be good, or there may be no answer.

But if it's a real question and there's some degree of presence in you, then there will be a real answer. And the helping then comes in two ways. One is through the energy that you emanate as you are present.

The second is through what you say to them. And that is the beginning of you becoming a spiritual teacher. And many of you, some of you are already spiritual teachers, whether formally or not formally, some of you will become formal spiritual teachers because the world is in great need of you.

Humans want you, they may not know it yet, but everybody, even if you do not become a formal spiritual teacher, you will do some teaching informally through everybody you meet because you spread, your state of consciousness spreads to others. That applies both to unconscious people who spread their negativity or the viral infection of their minds and to present people who spread presence. And it's not that you are doing it.

So an important obstacle could be if you think that you need to do something to help them. This is very seductive because it's a wonderful thing to help others. But the obstacle is you think that it is up to you to help them.

It's not. In fact, you wouldn't know how to. I wouldn't know how to.

So you have to allow it to happen by holding the presence, especially when somebody comes to you, ask the question or you say something, hold the presence and then see what happens. So it's not you who is doing it. Sometimes I've met some people who said they've been asked to, first they saw some individuals, helped them, they're growing and growing in presence.

And then somebody approached them, can you give a talk to our little group? And then they came to me and said, I don't think I'm ready to give it, to give a talk to a group. Somebody asked me to give a talk to a group.

I think I'm not ready. And I said, if you think you're ready, then that's not a good sign. Because there's probably a little ego in there that thinks I'm ready to be a spiritual teacher.

Just come to me and I will heal you. But if you feel that the most powerful place, whether you are with one person or with a group of people, the most powerful place is to not know. But you have to be comfortable with not knowing.

If you're uncomfortable with not knowing what to say, what to do, then you go, oh dear, what should I say? The mind says, quick, say something useful to this person. And then you think things you've read in a book.

Well, Eckhart says that, it doesn't mean you should never quote, but it's always more powerful if it comes from you. So it only comes if you are comfortable with, enter that space of not knowing, which is basically you surrender thought and you just look at the person and you listen and then see what answer comes, then see what you say, if anything. In some cases, you might not say anything.

So the help allow it to move through you. And that's a big relief. It means you don't have to do it.

You only become a vehicle for it, an opening for it. You become an opening for consciousness. So you don't have to heal people, help people.

I mean, you can help physically, that's a different matter. You can give somebody food or money to help, but at a deeper level, you can't do anything. So getting out of the way, and then it will happen through you.

In the course in miracles, it says the moment you become a student of the course in miracles, which by the way, is a lovely teaching, but not for everybody. So don't believe that because I mentioned it now, you have to go and get it. It's great for some people.

It's a beautiful spiritual work, but for others, it's not the right one. Nothing is right for everybody. Course in miracles, however, says the moment you start studying the course in miracles, which really implies the moment you begin to disidentify from the conditioned mind, you become a teacher of God.

Now the ego, of course, would probably love that term. That's just why I personally would not use it, but there is some truth in it. It's not a terminology that I would use, but the moment the presence arises, you begin to teach presence.

[Speaker 7] (2:15:32 - 2:15:39)

But really, presence does it through you. Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:15:56 - 2:16:19)

So if anybody here wants to, is asked to give a talk, a spiritual talk, you don't need to be ready. Just say, yeah, I'll do it. And then you go there and you sit in front of the people and stop thinking.

Stop thinking and see what happens.

[Speaker 3] (2:16:36 - 2:19:03)

Hello, Eka. My question, I don't know if it's a I don't know question or maybe I don't care question, but it's on the topic of, maybe you can call it the phenomena. As I've sort of been practicing the power of now on the new earth over the years, it's helped me a lot, reduce my ego and my pain body.

And as that's happened, there's lots more oneness now emerging just naturally. And I can sense it and see it. And sometimes there's some phenomena that appears in me.

You know, sometimes once I had a cat on my chest and there was a woman laying in a bed next to me. And I said to her, the cat has a, you know, sore ear in the right ear. And it turned out to be her ear.

So I didn't get that, but yes, little phenomenas of coming. Sometimes I've seen things from people as well that, you know, once I went to a clairvoyant class and saw a man, the teacher of the class, he, while the class was being taught, he stood up and he said, look at me, I'm tall. And he looked like he was tall.

And as he was giggling and then as he sat down and he stood five minutes later, he stood back up and said, look at me, everyone, I'm short. And it looked like he was short. So he still looked like the same height, but I don't know, there was something going on with the perception and, but this is just phenomena that just one thing that I've seen and a few other little things.

And, but yeah, lately I've just been interested in the last few years, like documentaries on, like there's a young boy in Tibet, several years ago, he meditated for up to nine months and Discovery Channel filmed him 24 seven where he didn't eat or drink or sleep. Apparently there's many other stories as well. He got bitten by a snake and all that.

And, you know, there's another man and he hasn't eaten in 80 years and the scientists studied him for 10 days and he's fine. So yeah, just, I don't know if it's a relevant question, Okay, I understand.

[Speaker 1] (2:19:04 - 2:22:59)

Thank you. It sometimes happens that as you awaken spiritually, some people develop also certain psychic abilities. They might see things that other people don't see or you might know something that's going to happen beforehand.

Now, psychic and spiritual awakening don't necessarily go together. There are quite a few people who have psychic abilities and a huge ego. So they haven't awakened spiritually, but have certain innate or developed psychic abilities.

But it's possible that as people awaken spiritually, there can also be certain phenomena accompanying their spiritual awakening. It's a well-known thing and those things in India are called siddhis, which are powers that develop as you awaken spiritually for some people, not everybody. And every true teacher will tell you that you should not give excessive importance to any powers, whether they be clairvoyant or clairsentient or whatever, that arise spontaneously during your spiritual awakening, because if you give them importance, they will lead you astray.

So you don't deny them, you recognize them, you say, hmm, that's great. If you give excessive importance, then instead of moving towards spiritual awakening, if that's like a, this is the channel towards spiritual awakening, then you have a little power that develops there. If you give that too much attention, you suddenly go off, you go off the main path.

And it usually involves ego. Look what I can do. I have met people who had powers of manifestation and many of these people have these powers at times and at other times they have to pretend that they have them, so they become half real and half charlatan.

Don't go that way and don't seek those powers because that would also be egoic seeking. And don't give too much attention to watching those things on YouTube and so on either, because that can also lead you astray. There are good things on YouTube.

I'm on YouTube too. So. And there are other teachers and teachings that you can watch.

So if you want to watch YouTube, although I mean the mind loves to get, oh, isn't that fascinating? But it doesn't get you anywhere. It doesn't contribute to your awakening.

So be careful with what you give your attention to. you can still occasionally enjoy a story like that. Like I watched this man who held his breath for seven minutes.

That was interesting. Later, I looked him up on, I must admit, I looked him up on YouTube and I saw a whole performance that he did on YouTube and I was impressed, but that's fine. I don't need to watch any more after this.

So stay with what really matters.

[Speaker 3] (2:22:59 - 2:23:01)

Wonderful, thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (2:23:19 - 2:24:36)

Thank you. I'm interested in what your awareness is about the transgender issue. It seems to be more prevalent now, but that just could be my limited thinking, but I see it more with the 16-year-olds and the younger generation coming through now.

And I just wanna know from that compassionate place and also, because I'm interested, I get confused in myself about is it an ego attachment or is it actually the awareness coming through bringing androgyny and having respect for that, for the difficulty that these people are experiencing?

Right, thank you. Most people's sense of identity or part of most people's sense of identity is to do with their gender. So how large that part is varies from person to person and from culture to culture.

So by that, I mean a man feeling his sense of self consisting partly of his awareness of being a man. In some cultures, that makes up, in some cases, 70% of a man's identity is the fact that he's a male. These tend to be traditional cultures where the roles, the dividing division between genders is very pronounced.

And a woman equally in those cultures, a large part of her sense of identity or a sense of self would be around being a woman. In the Western world, this is not quite as pronounced, although it's still there, but there's less identification for a man or woman with being a woman than in some traditional cultures and than it was in the past in the West also. So especially with people becoming more conscious, the genders are coming a little closer together.

And that may well be true that there are more people now who may not even be certain what gender they are. And so that is not necessarily a bad thing, although it can be confusing for those people, because especially if they're young, because everybody's looking for a sense of identity, a clearly defined sense of identity. And if they don't know whether they're a man or a woman, then there seems to be something lacking.

They cannot form any clear sense of identity based on gender, which seems to be an obstacle, but does not have to be if they were given appropriate spiritual guidance. They could be shown. In fact, it could be an advantage to not know whether you are there or there, because it could make it easier for you to disidentify from identification with form, because ultimately that's what it is, male or female, male or female forms.

So if those people could be helped, then they would find out that actually it can be an advantage so that they can derive their sense of identity, not from the physical vehicle, because the physical vehicle may be uncertain. So they could perhaps more easily than somebody who feels very strongly, I am a man and you are my woman. Yeah.

Wasn't there a famous pop song? No, it was the other way around. It was the Canadian singer from Montreal.

What was her name? Celine Dion. I am a woman and you are my man, something like that.

So this is a good example of, and that was a very successful song because it strengthened every woman who listened to that could identify with, yeah, I'm a woman, and then you were out in a bar, and then you meet a man, this could be my man. And the man did the same, oh, there's my woman. So you can see how much identity there is in that.

And it's ego, it's really, there's a masculine ego and there's a feminine ego. In some cultures, a woman has a particularly defined, in some cultures, it seems that every woman has a high-pitched voice, but it's because it's part of the ego role that they adopt. In other cultures, a woman is conditioned to behave in a particular way.

She behaves in certain constrained way, just can't laugh too loud. There was even a pronouncement made by a politician in one of those countries, a woman should not laugh in public.

[Speaker 8] (2:29:44 - 2:29:48)

Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha.

[Speaker 1] (2:29:48 - 2:34:18)

It's not becoming to a woman to laugh in public. So whereas in the United States, it's perfectly acceptable for a woman to laugh out loud. You see it often.

So it's a trap to derive your psychological identity from your male gender or your female gender. Both of them are trapped in their little worlds, their little identities. So we are going beyond that.

And I believe in the more distant future for mankind, the two will come together at some point. Anyway, that's, but for the time being, let's see if we can help those who are uncertain about their gender and point to them the possibility of not identifying with any gender and still, and so go deeper immediately. So maybe if you, anybody who comes into contact with young people who are uncertain, perhaps you could point that out.

It could be the beginning of a spiritual path. Sometimes the greatest difficulty in life or early in life is at the same time, the opening into spiritual awakening. So that can also be the case, or it used to be more so in the past for a gay person, man or woman, it still presents certain, even though now there's greater acceptance around it, it still presents certain challenges.

And in the past, it's been, it was a gigantic challenge because it was rejected by society. So in the past, if a man or woman was gay, immediately was an outsider, at least internally. And there was a, now it's much easier to, at least in Western countries, to accept that.

The trap here could be, there is another trap here that you find it sometimes with gay people that instead of going beyond gender identification they have a very strong identification with being gay. So, and then they overemphasize the gayness and that becomes an ego role that they play. That was a trap for those people.

So every, there's always, you need to be beware because there are many situations where the ego can come in and use it for its purposes. I mentioned in the power of now for a gay person, the advantage is that to some extent, even though there's greater acceptance nowadays, a gay person can still feel a little bit of an outsider. And so that's always a great advantage for anybody who does not fit in totally with the mainstream because that can create an early disidentification from mainstream egoic identities.

And then the arising of spiritual awakening can become easier. It's the greatest difficulty, people who have a handicap, a physical handicap, for example. A dreadful thing to be born with a physical handicap, but also a great opportunity of disidentifying from the body, identification with a physical vehicle at an early age.

And again, the trap there is they could go the other way and build an identity in their minds around being a person with this particular disability, in which case you are trapped, there's another prison you're trapped in, in your mind. So it's a subtle thing, but very interesting. I hope this helps a little bit.

[Speaker 7] (2:34:19 - 2:34:19)

Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (2:34:20 - 2:34:23)

Thank you very much. And thank you for your sensitivity. Thank you.

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:35:23 - 2:57:33)

Welcome. I'm on my little summer retreat. It's quite hot.

And I'm glad we were able to make it. Join us, despite the fact that I believe right now there's a very important event happening on the planet, which involves 24 men chasing one ball. So if you're here, despite that, I'm very happy.

And if you are tuning in from Brazil and you've been experiencing some unhappiness, also connected with these 24 men, or perhaps a different set of 24 men, then you may want to look more deeply into the cause of that. And if it hadn't been Brazil, it would be some other country. The mechanism is the same.

It all goes back to not realizing who you are. And identifying with something else, using an image in the mind, personal or collective, and endowing that personal or collective image with a sense of self. And if that happens, something happens to that mentally created image, personally or collectively, you feel injured, hurt, or diminished in your sense of self, and you become unhappy.

So that's a very normal thing. Most humans, except for those who already are in touch with that dimension within that lies beyond this superficial realm of delusion, most humans then have a number of things that they derive their sense of self from partly collective, partly personal. Collective could mean your nation, your tribal identity, which relates to sport teams and so on, religion, my religion, our religion, or a particular church or movement within one religion as opposed to another church that's different.

Nationalism, in some places, is still strong, not as insane as it, perhaps, as it was in the 20th century in many places. And many other collective identification from my club, my town, my this, my that, or our, and then personal possessions, status, recognition from others or lack of it, knowledge, personal appearance, external appearance, and so on, all things the mind identifies with. Very precarious because basically they're all mental fabrications, stories.

There's nothing wrong with mental fabrications and stories, you can enjoy those as long as you know that's what they are. But if you take them to be ultimate reality, then very quickly you begin to suffer. We continue to live surrounded by these stories.

Enjoy them, you can watch the game, you can even be happy if your team wins and the other team loses, but it doesn't go that deep anymore. So if your team loses, yes, there's a surface dissatisfaction which you observe, or if your team wins, there's a surface elation, you go, oh yeah, but it doesn't go that deep. Because on a deeper level, you know that that has nothing to do with who you are.

It's a game, it's a story, a play, a dreamlike formation. Now mostly in a dream, you don't know that you're dreaming. Occasionally it happens that you have a lucid dream and you suddenly, in the middle of a dream, realize that you're dreaming and then there's a fundamental shift in the way in which you experience the dream.

And the same in daily life, most people are so identified with mental formations, things, events, and so on, which all become mental formations, that the lucidity factor is missing. So they are in the dream of daily existence, but so identified with it, they don't know it is a kind of dream. So they try to derive a satisfying sense of self from it, which is impossible.

Now the equivalent of having a lucid dream or realizing in the middle of the dream that you're dreaming is, of course, to become aware in your daily life. Suddenly there is an awareness. Which is not a thought.

The awareness, sorry, from the dimension of awareness, you can recognize a thought as just a thought. And you realize who you are essentially is that deeper aware presence, the lucidity that enables you not only to have sense perceptions, but also enables you to have thoughts. That is lucid living.

So you have, you can have lucid dreaming, but more important, it's much more important to experience lucid living. And that is the beginning of the end of misidentification with who you are. And what then happens is that there can still be minor manifestations of happiness and unhappiness, but it doesn't go that deep anymore.

Now, some people might say, okay, I'm okay with unhappiness not going that deep, but they might feel uneasy with happiness not going that deep anymore. What I mean, of course, is the, what is conventionally called happiness is a temporary surface phenomenon. But there is a deeper happiness, if we even still want to use that term, usually I don't, but there is a deeper sense of presence, of rootedness, of vast spaciousness, of aliveness, that is sometimes called joy, but you can call it inner peace.

You can call it a deep sense of contentment in the background. And this is why we're here, to be reminded that that dimension is there within you, waiting to be discovered or waiting to reveal itself to you. Or if you already live in connectedness with that, to deepen it, that's why we're here.

So the question then, of course, is, do I know who I am? Beyond my physical body or beyond my external appearance, beyond my place in society, beyond whatever country I happen to belong to because I happen to be born there, beyond my religion, which again, in most cases, is my religion because I happen to be born in a particular place, beyond my social function, status in society, or beyond my possessions. And all those things I mentioned are really, they may have an external existence, but you experience them as images in your mind.

And of course, you are the presence behind those images and even within those images. So right now, there's a chance for you to stop thinking, not through any kind of effort, not through any willpower, act of will, not through suppression of thinking, but simply because you realize that right now, thinking is not really necessary. You don't need to figure out what I'm talking about by thinking about it.

You understand the words, so of course, there is some mental activity, but the words are not understood on the level of mental concepts. They are understood by you at a deeper level where the truth that these words point to is immediately recognized as your own presence. So the only presence, when words point towards presence, only the presence in you can recognize the meaning.

And you go, oh. And you might not be able to explain it to anybody. It's just the simple fact that you are conscious right now, which is beyond doubt.

Everything else may be a kind of dream. But there must be a consciousness for the dream to appear. It appears in the light of consciousness.

I am that. I'll speak for you and for myself. I am that I am.

I am. I am conscious presence. I am consciousness, formless, timeless.

And I know myself. As the formless, timeless consciousness. But that knowing can only arise between two thoughts or in the absence, temporary absence, cessation of thought, like now.

Between this moment, because on the external, there is a time, on the deeper, there's no time. Between this moment, now, and this moment, now, there's no thought. That's a very amazing thing.

So let's try it again. I say now twice, and in between the two nows, see if you can just be there as the presence. Now.

Now. Well, that wasn't that difficult. Now a little longer.

Now. Now.

[Speaker 8] (2:57:43 - 2:57:43)

Now.

[Speaker 1] (2:57:47 - 2:58:10)

You can either close your eyes, or you can look into my eyes. It may be helpful to look into my eyes because I'm not thinking. And that can connect you with the state of not thinking.

We'll do it again. Now.

[Speaker 8] (2:58:28 - 2:58:29)

Now.

[Speaker 1] (2:58:37 - 3:17:45)

There's nothing more important in your life, and I'm totally 100% confident and certain that that's the absolute truth. There's nothing more important in your life, no matter who you are, than accessing that dimension, which is not only the dimension of your true identity, but also the place where true intelligence arises, and creativity, and peace, and loving kindness towards all beings, because that is the formless realm of life itself, of consciousness itself, that then recognizes itself in all other forms. So it's vitally important.

And last but not least, you no longer get very unhappy when your team loses. So another way you can, if you want to practice with inner spaciousness, aware presence, you can also go like this, and for a moment, this, the hands, I'm holding my hands like this, this space between the two hands represents the space of presence. So you go, holding the space of presence.

This is the external equivalent of something inner. So you can think that past is here, future is here, thinking is here and here, which is past and future, and in between there's the space. So you can sometimes do it when you're alone.

Just go like, just for 10 seconds, 20 seconds, and just be present. No thinking. This is the space of no thought, but alertness.

Many moments of no thought during your daily life, and then if you invite them, they will happen more often, until at some point, the sense of presence is never lost even while you're thinking. They're still in the background. A certain sense of beingness or space that is recognized as more important than whatever is happening in your life.

Whatever you need to deal with at that moment, whatever is going on, there's something more real, and that also gives you a true perspective on the ups and downs of daily existence. It's almost as if you had a detached view of things, so that the term detachment is something that's associated with the state of presence. It enables you not to be attached to things, which ultimately means mind stuff, not to be attached.

Attached means seeking your identity, your sense of self in those things. Detached means realizing they are not yourself. They are anatta, as it's called in the Buddhist Pali scriptures, not self.

They are, another Buddhist term, anicca, would be impermanent. They don't last, they come and go. If you don't realize that, you don't realize who you are, then you suffer.

And then gradually the ability arises to do things and to observe things and to listen to somebody or listen to the sounds of nature or listen to any sound without any interpretation in the mind, without naming it, without immediately liking or disliking it, without wanting to attract a certain condition to yourself or feel wanting to reject a certain condition. So that's the ability to perceive without naming. You can look around the room or out of the window.

And it's an amazing thing if you can be just the presence behind the sense perception. You have gone beyond being merely a person. You have transcended all conditioning, thousands of years of conditioning, including, of course, all your family conditioning, cultural conditioning, and so on.

So being the presence, functioning as a person, but being the presence, and when that happens, then the person is a much more pleasant person than a person who is disconnected from the being dimension, doesn't know it. It's always there, but it's not recognized. That person who is disconnected from presence, who exists only as a person, not as being, that person is a troublemaker.

They don't know that, they think they're doing what they need to do, but they are creating. When I say troublemaker, I, of course, mean, unknowingly, they create suffering for themselves and others. And they get upset very easily.

Any little thing that goes wrong immediately, they get upset. They are totally at the mercy of conditions, things that happen around them, what people say or do to them or about them, or what people fail to do or should have done or said. It's all very upsetting, isn't it?

And then there comes the righteous indignation and the blaming and the accusing of others or groups of others. And the labeling. And that's all the madness that, in a more extreme form, becomes violence.

Why? They don't know who they are. They think they're only this person.

And they're totally in the grip of the person which is their conditioning. And the person is, to use an Eastern term, a karmic entity, a conditioned formation. Often when I observe people, I can feel the heaviness that they carry of that personal sense of self.

Completely in the grip of their conditioning. And it's a huge burden to walk through life totally in the grip of your conditioning. No spaciousness whatsoever.

Always concerned, thinking of this and that and waiting to react to the next thing and looking out where the next little bit of satisfaction can come from or where the next enemy may appear. Some people who perhaps haven't had prior contact with anything spiritual may reach a point where they get tired of being themselves. Can often be misperceived as being tired of life, but really they're tired of who they are.

They can somehow sense the repetitiveness of all the stuff that goes on in their lives. And so that can be a good point to reach. You're ready to go beyond.

And that is not the time when you dump off the Golden Gate Bridge. That's the time you dump out of your conditioned sense of self. Oh, what a liberation that is.

Freedom. Freedom from the person. Once presence has manifested in your life as the first initial glimpses, you can choose presence more often.

That becomes your responsibility. At a deeper level, presence is choosing you, but let's not to go there right now. It's a helpful perception to feel that you can choose to be present right now.

You've chosen to be here with us, with me, and you're choosing to be present at this very moment. So enjoy your freedom. The game of life by being lucid within it.

[Speaker 8] (3:17:54 - 3:17:55)

Thank you.

[Speaker 7] (3:18:42 - 3:18:45)

A moment of stillness before we start.

[Speaker 1] (3:18:46 - 4:06:50)

Not waiting for anything to happen, but just being in the moment now. Make sure you're comfortable in your own skin as you sit there. If you're not comfortable, then just notice that you're not comfortable and allow yourself to not be comfortable and then you become comfortable.

I have a little treat in store. We will talk about, not only talk about, but go into the essence of the book that has been with me, accompanied me for the past 30 years. A book that I've gone to, back to periodically.

I still go back to periodically, pick it up, read a page or two or three and meditate on it. It's one of the great treasures of spiritual literature and it is a book that was written in China 2,500 years ago, the Tao Te Ching. Now that's a huge, seemingly a huge gulf that separates us from that time period and yet the book is still vitally alive.

And if a book that was written so long ago is still vitally alive, it means it must have been written from a very deep place and point to something that is timeless. If it were not written from a deep, timeless place within the author and did not point to something that is beyond time, a book written 2,500 years ago would be irrelevant, meaningless, incomprehensible. Many books that were written 20 years ago are out of date or if you read yesterday's newspaper, it's out of date.

So for something to still be alive now and to be deeply meaningful to many people, there must be something there that is timeless and that is the essence of the book and that's what I would like to go into with you. So we are not going into a book, we are not just going to study a book, we are just using the text to go deeply within, to discover something within ourselves. So all that the book is, is a device that helps us discover ourselves, and our connection with the greater whole, the universe, whatever you want to call it.

So just very briefly, the historical context, it might be helpful to know just a little bit about that. This book was written about 2,500, 2,600 years ago in China, that in other words, 500 to 600 BC. Now that was a very exciting and meaningful time period, something incredible was happening during those, let's say, one and a half to two centuries.

For the first time in the history of humanity, as far as we can see, there was a universal wave of spiritual awakening coming over the planet. At that time. So the author of the Tao Te Ching, Lao Tse, is a contemporary more or less of the Buddha in India.

So the Buddha and his teaching arose at the same time, approximately as the teaching of Lao Tse, the author of the Tao Te Ching. So there was the Buddha arising in India, beginning to teach, and another significant teacher in India whose teaching did not go very much beyond in India even to this day, but has remained very meaningful and profound in India, Mahavira, taught at approximately the same time as the Buddha, and it developed into Jainism, the religion, a very beautiful religion, still practiced widely in India based on ahimsa, nonviolence, and respect for all living beings. All those things were revelations when they first came into being at the time, the teachings. So we have the Buddha in India, we have Mahavira in India, at all arising at the same time in Persia, we have Zoroaster, sometimes called Zarathustra, not to be confused with Nietzsche's Zarathustra, which is a completely different character.

Zarathustra, the prophet in Persia. We have at the same time in ancient Greece, and that was a time before the famous Greek philosophers started to teach, Plato, Aristotle, Socrates. It was earlier than that.

Those were philosophers that arose for the first time there. They are called pre-Socratic philosophers because they predate Socrates. We only have fragments of their philosophy, but those fragments are enough to show us that their teachings were in some ways, this is how I feel, more profound than the later, more differentiated teachings of Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle.

My favorite pre-Socratic philosophers are Heraclitus and Parmenides, and we only have small fragments, but the fragments show us that those teachings were still in touch with the source of being, the source of life, the oneness that underlies all phenomena. And later, as the philosophy became more differentiated, that was becoming lost. The philosophies became very interesting and much more differentiated, but the connection with the root of all life, the unmanifested oneness, the transcendental dimension, gradually became lost.

So those philosophers, 500 and 600 BC, still had that connection. And they showed people, they also realized that humanity had lost it. So it was part of the wave of awakening that was coming over the planet, the teaching of those philosophers.

This is not philosophy as we understand it these days. It's about inner transformation, not speculation. Those were not speculative philosophers in the same way that Buddha wasn't speculative, Mahavira wasn't speculative.

So it is a transformational teaching. It's about inner transformation, not about figuring something out with your mind. So we have that arising, the awakening arising in Persia, the awakening arising in India, the awakening arising in ancient Greece.

And now we come to China, we have Lao Tse, his teaching at the same time was arising in China. All part of this wave of awakening that we are now experiencing again, even on a much larger scale now. So we are at a similar time period, except that the wave of awakening that is coming into this world of spiritual awakening is on a much larger and more powerful and all pervasive scale.

So we are in the middle of that. 100, 200 years ago, nobody in the West was discussing the Tao Te Ching. And this is why we can go back to it and understand it, because we are awakening.

Lao Tse was, we know very little about his life. He was, they say, in charge of the archives of a kingdom called Shu and reached, we don't know how old he was when he was becoming bored with the life of the court and the intrigues and the conflicts around him. And so he decided to leave his job and to leave his homeland and just go out into solitude.

And the story goes, nobody knows whether it is true, that he left and he got to the border of the kingdom. There was a front, a little border crossing and a gate. And the gatekeeper said, I'm not going to let you pass unless you write down your wisdom.

So he must already have had a certain reputation as a wise man, but he had never written anything. And so all he could do, he said, okay, then I'll write it down. We don't know how long it took.

He wrote it down and the gatekeeper let him go. And that is the Tao Te Ching. That is the teaching and that is the book.

And then according to one story, the last we ever know of him, he was sitting on a water buffalo riding off into nowhere. And that's the last that anybody ever heard of him. Nobody ever saw him again.

That's one version of the story. Another version of the story is that he continued to teach and reach the age of 160 years. The Tao Te Ching is the title of the book, which is not usually translated.

People have tried to translate it, but unsuccessfully. Usually they give you subtitles. So it says Tao Te Ching.

One of the traditional subtitles is the way and its virtue. And that's already somewhat of a mistranslation. Although Tao can be translated as the way, you just can't translate Tao.

Even if you translate it as way, it's pretty meaningless. And if you're a Chinese person, you're not at a great advantage. You still won't know what Tao is.

So you're not at a great advantage. The Tao is something that cannot be named. And we'll come to that in a minute.

So the subtitle, the way and its virtue. Virtue is a mistranslation of the Te in the Tao Te Ching. Virtue has become a dead word in our language.

When did you last say virtue? When did you last use that word? Probably many years ago, if ever.

So the word virtue is not alive. What it really refers to is the power. So to translate, it's the power of the, of spirit, of the transcendental dimension.

The way and its power is a better subtitle for the Tao Te Ching. The way, how to live. The way to living, living in alignment with the one power that underlies the universe.

The one thing that you cannot name, that is not a thing. Living in alignment with the ultimate, which sometimes is called God, but the moment you call it God, it's not it. You've made it into something.

It is not something. It is something that flows through the entire universe, animates the entire universe, and at the same time is beyond it. That is the Tao.

And that is something that you can discover within yourself. You can live in a way that connects you with the inner source of all life, of all being. So the way and its power, it's the, he's teaching us how to live so that we are in alignment with the power that underlies all life, which as Lao Tzu says, for lack of a better word, I'll call it the Tao.

And the Tao, that's a good thing because you can't do much with a word that you cannot exactly see what it means. The same way that Buddha used the word emptiness, you cannot worship emptiness. It's almost, it's a negative term.

It negates form. So it's always been the tendency for humans to worship concepts. The concept of God arises in your mind and then you start talking about God.

The concept of God becomes an idol because it's no more than a thought. So you can't do that with a Tao because you can't picture it. You can't form an image of it in the same way that you can't form a picture or an image of emptiness.

So that is the transcendental reality that the book points to and it shows us the way to it. So there's great power there. And the book came to me for the first time in my 20s, maybe mid 20s.

Somebody said, have a look at this. This is interesting. And I looked at it and something drew me into it but then I couldn't quite, it was so obscure that I couldn't, I knew there was something hiding there in the book.

There was some truth hiding but I couldn't get it. It was there and then I put it aside and okay, I have other things to do now. And then years passed and then in my early 30s, I rediscovered the book in a different translation.

There are many translations available and not only was the translation better, something had by then taken place within me and awakening a shift in consciousness. And through that new consciousness, I looked at the book and I said, wow, that's, he's talking, I know what he's talking about. I realized the depths and the profundity of what those words were saying.

And since then, the book in different versions, not the actual physical book, but the Tao Te Ching has never left me. It's always been with me in one way, one form or another. So that's the story behind the Tao Te Ching.

And now let's see if we can go a little deeper into it. We are going to use, there are two translations that at the moment are my favorites. We will use Stephen Mitchell's translation, fairly recent Tao Te Ching.

Another translation that I've had for a number of years that I'm very fond of is by Jia Fu Feng and Jane English. They together translated the Tao Te Ching. And that's another beautiful translation.

I will be using mainly for today, Stephen Mitchell's translation or version of it. And the first two lines of the Tao Te Ching are very famous. I've quoted it quite a few times, but even there, sometimes translations differ.

The first two lines are the Tao that can be told is not the eternal Tao. What he's saying is you cannot really speak about the ultimate reality. Whatever you say about it is not it.

However, he then continues to talk about it. So how is that? Well, he's telling you not to attach yourself to the words, not to begin to believe in the words or in concepts, not to make it into some new belief.

The truth is not in the words. That's what he's saying. The truth, the words only point to the truth.

And the truth is only to be found within you beyond the realm of mind or of thinking or of concepts. So that's just a little, very important, those first two lines. The Tao that can be told is not the eternal Tao.

Okay, and now let me tell you about it. Because the Tao is in you and the only place where you can discover it is in you. And so the book shows the way to discover who you are beyond who you thought you are beyond whatever your mind is telling you who you are.

And now the closest he comes to defining the Tao, which cannot be defined. I'm just saying the closest he comes to defining it is in these little lines, which I will read to you now. And again, you need to listen to that, not just with your head, but you need to listen to that with your belly or your entire being, those words, because you cannot understand them just through the mind.

If they are meaningful, or if you can sense the power that is in the words, then you are sensing your own power beyond thought activity. There was something formless and perfect before the universe was born. It is serene, empty, solitary, unchanging, infinite, eternally present.

It is the mother of the universe. For lack of a better name, I call it the Tao. Note that he begins by saying there was something formless and perfect before the universe was born, before the arising of form, before the Big Bang, you could say.

He uses the past tense. In the next line, he says, it is serene, empty, solitary. It is not only that which was there before the world came into being, it is that which continues to be there timelessly at the core of your being.

That which was there before the Big Bang is still present in you, the unmanifested one life, one consciousness, without which you are nothing. It is the essence of who you are. And of course, if you say that to a normal materialist scientist, whatever, I'm saying a normal scientist, not a great scientist, then he will say, what is this nonsense?

Or if you tell it to somebody who is totally close to you, they'll say, this is mumbo-jumbo. There was something before the universe was born and there's something, what are you talking about? And now listen, he very wisely, Stephen Mitchell, put in a little quote by one of the great scientists, Albert Einstein, what he had to say about it.

Somebody who did a lot of thinking, but whose thinking was rooted in the stillness, which as we shall see is an essential part of the teaching of the Tao. His thinking was rooted in the Tao, in the stillness beyond the noisy mind. That's where Einstein's realizations came from.

And so he was not just trapped in his noisy mind like most scientists and then deny the reality of the transcendental, but he was connected with it. And he said, I'm not used to quoting from books and talks. Here's Einstein talking.

The scientist's religious feeling takes the form of a rapturous amazement at the harmony of natural law, which reveals an intelligence of such superiority that in comparison with it, all systematic thinking of human beings is an utterly insignificant reflection. This feeling is the guiding principle of my life and work. The recognition of a vast intelligence that underlies all of creation.

Instead of saying what, somebody, something more intelligent than me, that can't be, that's mumbo-jumbo. But something that I can't understand, I can't categorize, what mumbo-jumbo is that? This is what the Dowdy jingle standing on tiptoe and you're not stable.

It's in the flower. It creates that. It's in you.

It pervades the very space around us. It comes through the human brain, becomes, the brain is like a, gives it some form. And when the brain goes, it no longer goes through that form.

It's the very consciousness that you are. So this shows that Einstein was in touch with that dimension. That's why his thinking was inspired.

That's why he had sudden revelations. Now, now we come to the first slightly longer, just a few lines, never more than a few lines at a time. How to live, to be in touch with that.

Can, I'll read the whole, this little section first, and then we'll look at the lines and go into it. Not just, not with the intellectual mind, but sensing our way into it. Can you coax your mind from its wandering and keep to the original oneness?

Can you let your body become supple as a newborn child's? Can you cleanse your inner vision until you see nothing but the light? Can you love people and lead them without imposing your will?

Can you deal with the most vital matters by letting events take their course? Can you step back from your own mind and thus understand all things, giving birth and nourishing, having without possessing, acting with no expectation, leading and not trying to control? This is the supreme virtue.

For virtue, substitute power. The power moves through you. If you live in that way, you become it.

You realize your oneness with it. Back to the beginning. Can you coax your mind from its wandering?

It wanders about. If you look at your own mind, that's what it does. It goes from one thing to another, one thought leads to another thought, and it goes on and on.

Sometimes I call it the voice in the head. Can you coax your mind from its wandering and keep to the original oneness? In other words, is it possible for you to sit still for a moment and don't give attention to every thought that says, follow me, I'll show you the way.

That's what every thought is. I'm important. Think about this, think about this.

Okay, and once you follow up one thought, and then it becomes another one and another. Stream, then you get, that's how most people live. Continuously immersed in just chatter, mental chatter, streams of thinking.

It's even become literature in the 20th century. It's called the stream of consciousness. James Joyce, you get 30 pages without any punctuation marks.

Just, he wrote down how he observed his own mind and he wrote down how it works. It goes on and on. No period, no comma, nothing.

Normal. So once you know that, and most amazing is people don't even know that. They are so identified with it.

It's just, that's who I am. I just, I think. It's not even that they say, I think, because they are the thoughts.

And they miss the vast dimension with these underneath thoughts. That's why I say, okay, just don't give all that importance to your thoughts. Just come to a point of rest.

This is where the present moment becomes so important because it's the present moment that can take you out of the stream of thinking. Just becoming alert to this moment. There's nothing much to think about as you sit here.

What can you add to this moment that's better than what's already here? Or when you look at a flower, why add thought to it? Or when you look at another human being, why add thought to the beautiful perception of that?

So then you keep to the original oneness. The moment you're no longer dominated by thinking and you realize there's a realm beyond thinking inside me, you're connected to the oneness because it's only through thinking that the illusion of separation arises when you start calling things this and that and judging and naming. Doesn't mean you can't do it anymore, but you're not trapped in it anymore.

Can you let your body become supple as a newborn child? When you are immersed in thinking, your body becomes rigid because it reflects what's going on in here, a lot of which is problematic. I need to think about this.

And the more problematic your thinking is and all thinking is problematic, the more lifeless your body becomes and the flow of energy through the body diminishes. You get rigid, you get tense, you're holding in. Can you let your body become supple as a newborn child?

This is a free translation. If you go back to the more literal translation, he's actually saying, can you concentrate your chi or your vital energy until your body becomes supple as a little child? This is really, he's teaching body awareness.

Can you go within, take attention into the body and to feel that you're alive inside? Can you feel the aliveness in your hands? Can you feel the aliveness in your feet?

Can you feel the aliveness that pervades the entire body? Takes you out of your mind. Even as you sit here, can you feel that?

There's a very ancient Taoist practice, thousands of years old, almost as old as the Tao Te Ching, which tells you, you should breathe with your heels, from your heels upward. Says, can you breathe from your heels upward? Of course you can't because you can't suck in air with your feet.

But it's just, what it's saying is, it is directing attention to your feet and you imagine that you're breathing from down there. You're breathing through your heels. What that does is, you suddenly become aware it starts from the bottom of your entire energy field.

I'm breathing in, just simply imagine are you breathing in from your feet? Energy starts to move in from down there. Imagine that you're actually breathing in from your feet and then the energy of the breath flows into the body.

Very ancient practice. That particular one, I only discovered two days ago that somebody, thousands of years ago, they recommended that already. And I said, oh, that's the inner body.

That's what I was talking about. I always talk about. Can you cleanse your inner vision until you see nothing but the light?

That is perhaps a somewhat obscure, although there's light in it, but to the mind, it's a little obscure. What do you mean, cleanse your inner vision until you see nothing but the light? The light is the light of consciousness.

Cleansing your inner vision as to still the mind until you become aware of awareness, until you become aware that you are conscious. And then that remains always there. The entire, this entire little chapter is really how to be in the world, but at the same time, connected with the source.

At this moment, it might be easier if you forget. Don't think of yourself as somebody having a past. Don't think of yourself as somebody having a future.

What's left of you right now without that? Consciousness, just a presence, not an opinion or memory. That's the light of consciousness.

And that's the Tao, really. You cannot grasp it. You cannot make it your object of knowledge and say, oh, there it is, there's the light of, I can see the light of consciousness.

No, you are the light of consciousness through which everything is seen. You can't see it, you can't grasp it. It underlies everything.

It's so there, it's who you are. It's your presence. And when I say your presence, it's not quite right because it's not yours, it's you, it's oneness.

If I say your presence, then there's you and presence, but language works in that way. It creates duality. And that's what the Tao Te Ching is about, is realizing that that's an illusion.

Can you love people and lead them without imposing your will? This is imposing your will in another translation. It's always helpful to look at different translations.

It says, can you be without cleverness in this world? I talk about cleverness in one of the books, that the ego is clever because it tries to work out some advantage for myself or for us. It has its little schemes.

It tries to use people, that's cleverness. Politicians are clever, most of them. Very few are intelligent.

PhD doesn't mean you're intelligent. Well, whether they have PhDs or not, it has nothing to do with that. Intelligence is to see the larger whole of all and then not just act to enhance one little fragment and then be in opposition to the rest of the world of life.

But see the totality. Can you be without cleverness? Can you deal with the most vital matters by letting events take their course?

That's a very fundamental teaching of the Tao is not to interfere in the way things are moving. And even if, so you don't, there's no violence whatsoever. And that's of course beautifully practiced in all martial arts.

In martial arts, the opposing energy that is coming towards you is not resisted. This is deeply influenced by the Tao Te Ching, non-resistance going with the movement of life. The Western approach is somebody comes towards you and you hit back.

It comes towards you and you go. And the Eastern is it comes, the force is coming towards you and you go with it. And then suddenly your opponent falls.

The very energy of that attack movement is used to defeat the opponent. You have not opposed it, you go with it. There's almost, we can say, no violence in it and yet extremely powerful.

And that can be applied in many things. It can be applied in daily life and not getting involved in useless discussions, not identifying with mental positions of rightness. I'm right and you are wrong.

And then you start, this energy totally takes you out of yourself. Not engaging in useless discussions, being able to listen in a state of openness to another, not identifying with your opinions and then opposing somebody else's opinion. Can you step back?

Oh, before that, can you deal with the most vital matters by letting events take their course? Now, I looked at another translation. That's a little closer to the original, which says, instead of by letting events take your course, it says, by becoming the female.

Can you deal with the most vital matters by becoming the female? The female principle, female is often used as synonymous with the Tao. So one could almost say that the feminine principle is the principle of allowing, which is like this, whereas the male principle is this.

If you want to see it and express this, the male goes like that, the female goes like that. And according to this teaching, the female is, one could almost say, expresses the Tao more clearly than the male. It's somewhat easier to express the Tao through the female form than the male form.

If you're male, then you have to discover the female in yourself to be one with the Tao. Also, you have to discover that the allowing, for example, when I say, allow this moment to be as it is, that's a female, you're not fighting what is, you're allowing what is. There's an embracing, you see it when the, sometimes with Quan Yin statues, the holding hands like that or Virgin Mary statues, which are all expressions of the female, all embracing, all embracing.

Can you be the female in any situation? And that's, so in a discussion, can you be, now some women would say, oh, I don't like this idea, I want to be powerful, they don't realize that the power of the female is enormous. The power of allowing is far greater than the power of interfering.

Can you be the female? Let's see what else we have before we go to another longer one. How you receive this depends on your degree of openness to this message.

So this sounds very familiar to me, that's why I'm just reading it to you, just a few lines. Some say that my teaching is nonsense. Others call it lofty, but impractical.

But to those who have looked inside themselves, this nonsense makes perfect sense. And to those who put it into practice, this loftiness has roots that go deep. So there are some people in whom the openness is not there, and then whatever, what we are talking about here is totally nonsensical.

So you need, there needs to be something in you that recognizes the truth of this beyond words and concepts. Empty your mind of all thoughts. Let your heart be at peace.

I'm going to read the same again in a different translation, just give you a slightly different sense, different feel. Empty yourself of everything. Let the mind become still.

Empty yourself of everything. Empty everything. Let the mind become still.

Watch the turmoil of beings, but contemplate their return. Watch the turmoil of this world, of all the activity of this world, of all beings involved in running around. Watch it, which means be the awareness and contemplate their return.

They all return to the formless sooner or later. All the forms. Imagine you're seeing a movie.

I always, I love to see old movies, like movies made in the 30s or so, or 40s. And I love seeing, for example, you see street scenes, actual street scenes, big city, London, New York, whatever, people, hundreds of people running around to go about their business. But this is what the turmoil of beings, as it's called here, you have to see it.

And I see that in amazement, I watch that. This is for us to watch, but contemplate their return. And when I watch that, I realize all these people, the actual street scenes, all these people are no longer there.

They're all dead now. All, it was so important what they were doing, was it looked so important, running around, cars going. And if you had seen a speeded up version of the movie, as you see a speeded up version of anything, if you saw a speeded up version of this room, like you sometimes see how a flower, it's a wonderful image.

If you see, they do it on film, how a plant comes suddenly out of the soil. And so they, over a period of a few hours or a few days, it's filmed. So you see that period within a few seconds, contracted.

So you see actually how the plant comes out of the soil, then leaves come out of the plant, and the flower comes out. And suddenly you see the flower is wilting. The leaves are wilting and falling off.

And then the entire plant goes.

[Speaker 8] (4:06:51 - 4:06:52)

Gone.

[Speaker 1] (4:06:55 - 6:07:58)

This is what it's talking about. You have to actually see. It's an amazing thing.

When the touch, we'll touch to see that, when you truly watch that, something inside you goes, you can't put it into words, it goes, wow. Because you realize that applies to everything in this world is that way. It comes into being, every body.

I'm really, I'm looking at my own body when I see it. It's just a slightly different version of that. It lasts a few years longer than the plant.

But if you saw even the baby growing into an adult, you go, maturity, vitally alive, physically active. And then gradually, winding down. And then beginning to look like a wrinkled apple or a pear.

And then, suddenly the life force leaves. And then soon later, all the molecules and atoms say goodbye, we're going our own way now. And there's nothing left.

Just an emptiness. If you saw this room and the people in this room, and let's see if we didn't move from this room and we had a camera here, you would see gradually the body's dissolving or evaporating, whatever, it would go very quickly. I sometimes compare them to soap bubbles popping.

So if you saw this, we had this camera here over a period of, let's see, how long do you want to live? 50, another 50 years. You would, then the soap bubbles would pop one after another.

Pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop, pop. Nothing left. And then for a little while longer, the physical forms would stay.

And then you would say gradually, even the physical forms crumbling, they could take 2000 years or whatever, depending on atmospheric conditions. And even then the chairs could become dust. So everything is dissolving, birth, dissolution, everything, every form, it's impermanent.

And to watch, it's extremely powerful to watch that. This is why he's telling you, watch the turmoil of beings, but contemplate their return, means be aware of the impermanence of all forms, not as a negative thing, but simply as you see it for what it is. And if you are aware of the impermanence of all forms, that all forms are short-lived, how can you be aware of it?

There must be something in you that is beyond that. It's only from, as I sometimes say, if the entire universe were blue, the color blue would not exist for you because there would be nothing to differentiate it from. If we said everything is blue, you say, what are you talking about?

There's blue, what's blue? There's no other color. If everything were impermanent, you wouldn't even know it.

But there is something in you that is beyond that. It's only from there. And that is why the contemplation of impermanence can put you in touch with that because that in you, which is the consciousness, the timeless presence, the light of consciousness, is not touched by that.

And then the question the mind asks is, well, but what about when I die, I lose consciousness, or if a brick falls on my head, I lose consciousness. What about that? That all it means is that consciousness can no longer flow through your brain into this world.

It then has to withdraw and seek another channel. Consciousness is not affected. You cannot lose consciousness.

Isn't that amazing? Why not? Because you are consciousness.

It's the essence of who you are. So you can't lose yourself. Consciousness, you can also say life.

You can call it life. You can call it Tao. It's the unmanifested, underlying the timeless essence of all life, that which animates all life forms for brief periods, each for a brief period.

You are that. You can't think about that. If you think about it, it doesn't make sense.

You have to sense that in yourself. Now, sense that. You can't know it as an object of knowledge.

You can only know it as yourself because it's the subject of all knowledge. Each separate being in the universe returns to the common source. Returning to the source is serenity.

Another word for serenity is stillness. All things return to the source out of which they have come, the life, the unmanifested one life. Returning to the source is stillness.

Now, the wonderful thing is we don't have to wait until we die to return to the source. To live a life that is filled with power and wisdom, we can return to the source before the body dies and live in a state of connectedness with the source of life. And that's why it says returning to the source is stillness.

When you find the stillness within yourself, you're returning to the source of all life. It is, what is stillness? Just a moment when you're not thinking, but still conscious.

Just an inner space, like now. Okay, ready for this? Here are all your thoughts, and now we go.

Then thoughts come creeping back, and then we go. And suddenly there's a, can you sense that there is a space inside you that's just conscious? Where you don't call yourself anything or call me anything.

You're returning to the source, to the formless, the timeless in you. If you don't realize the source, you stumble in confusion and sorrow. If you don't realize the source in yourself, you stumble in confusion and sorrow.

That's how most people live, unfortunately. Stumbling about, unconnected with who they, disconnected from who they are, not realizing the source of their being. There is immediately, there's confusion, which is mental confusion.

The mind creating all kinds of pseudo problems. You yourself, you become a problem to yourself. You become a problem to others.

You become a problem to the planet. You become a problem, or you contribute to the problem making of the world, and that's the normal way to be. You stumble in confusion, and so that's confusion, and sorrow is the suffering that comes when you are not connected with that dimension in yourself, in your daily life, you suffer.

That's the destiny, that's what the Buddha said, life is suffering, unless you go beyond suffering, which is the teaching, it shows you the way, say as the Tao Te Ching does. Confusion and sorrow, you can't get rid of it, no matter how you try to rearrange your outer life, or think if I achieve that or that, I'll be fine, you won't. So you stumble in confusion and sorrow.

You need to find the source, and it's not even hidden, it's just there underneath the mental noise. So when you realize the source, realize of course doesn't mean you have some kind of intellectual idea about it, realize is when you have no idea, when the ideas, the importance of ideas diminishes, and there's just a space of awareness. Ideas are secondary.

In fact, you will have some interesting ideas coming out of that, creative ideas, new ideas, new insights, but they are secondary. When you realize where you come from, you naturally become tolerant, disinterested, amused, kind-hearted as a grandmother, dignified as a king, immersed in the wonder of the Tao, you can deal with whatever life brings you, and when death comes, you're ready. Beautiful images explains who or what you become when you live in connectedness with that, no longer as a little entity that thinks itself to be separate from the universe and from other human beings and from everything.

You become tolerant, disinterested means not uninterested, disinterested, amused, there's a little bit of amusement at all the things that people in this world feel is so serious and so important, and all their fears and ambitions and all the things they run after. You then become a little bit amused at all this, what is called the turmoil of beings, running around like little rabbits. All this, I have so many problems to think about, oh my God, what's happening?

Oh no, God, you become a little bit, you become amused a little, there's a slight smile, you don't, but sometimes you might even laugh, but there's a slight, a little bit of a smile, because you know it's not ultimately real. What they believe to be so important is ultimately not that real, it's a temporary thing. It's relatively real, not ultimately real.

In other words, everything is a little bit like a dream. For example, what happened to you yesterday? Where is it now?

A little bit like a dream, whatever was important then, it's gone, even breakfast this morning. Okay, did I have breakfast or was it a dream? Not that much difference.

Or you come to the end of your life and suddenly you think back all those years, that was a long dream. Was it a nightmare? And you become kind-hearted as a grandmother.

Nice image, the grandmother who's already been through everything. It's a little bit like the big-bellied Buddha that you see that is influenced, the Taoist-influenced Buddha, the Chinese big-bellied Buddha. He sits there.

Sometimes people who think they have lots of problems in their lives, I recommend that they should get a big-bellied Buddha and look at it quite often when they think they have problems. And because the Buddha, he's actually laughing, he's had a huge belly and he always goes, ah, ah, ah, oh, it's not serious. It implies that he is connected with something deeper.

He doesn't take the world that seriously. And so his influence is beneficial. It's only people who take the world not that seriously, they can actually be of benefit to the world and improve the world.

But if you think that the world is absolutely serious, you're not going to improve it. You can just contribute to the madness. You will be fighting one or somebody or some organization or some group of people.

It's serious, serious. That little bit of detachment, you become the Buddha, the big-bellied Buddha or the grandmother, and dignified as a king with a certain dignity or integrity to who you are. The same dignity and integrity that each animal has that many humans have lost.

One with itself, every, I feel always when I look at a dog or a cat or a bird, whatever it is, it is one with itself, with who it is. It has enormous dignity. And then sometimes you can see the contrast if you look at a particularly silly human being.

And sometimes silly human beings have a dog that's very dignified. And the only times when they get out of their silliness is when they pet their dog. For a moment, they can truly be themselves for a moment.

With all other people, they're playing some kind of silly roles, not knowing that they're playing roles. And then they come in. For a moment, their dog gives them the ability to relax for a moment and be who they are without pretending.

And that's why they don't know it. That's why they love their dog or their cat so much, because they can be themselves. They find themselves through that.

That's the integrity of the animal, the dignity of the animal. But it's in you also. This is a nice one about people who are in control of something, of an organization or a country or whatever, how to rule a country or an organization.

When the master governs, the people are hardly aware that he exists. Next best is a leader who is loved. Next, one who is feared.

The worst is one who is despised. If you don't trust the people, you make them untrustworthy. The master doesn't talk, he acts.

When his work is done, the people say, amazing, we did it all by ourselves. So the greatest ruler is you don't even, are not even aware that he or she is there. Hardly aware that he or she is there, does not interfere.

Never says, look at me, I did that. Identifying with their actions and taking credit for what they did. Look, I did that.

Or arguing with somebody, you didn't do it, I did that. That same thing can exist. This is talks about having gone beyond ego and beyond mind and identification with action.

You also find this phenomenon in some very simple people who haven't developed an ego yet. They sometimes do wonderful things, but there's no entity that says, look, I did that or how it feels, I did that. Beautifully expressed in the film, Forrest Gump, where the hero or the antihero does not have an ego, but he is below ego.

He helps many people and many good things come into his life but he has no sense of a separate self. He lives in the right way, not what this describes because this describes of going beyond ego, but he hasn't arrived at ego yet. So he still lives in the sense of oneness.

And if you live in the sense of oneness, the universe to a large extent becomes helpful. Helpful things come into your life because you are no longer separating yourself from life. That begins with being in a state of oneness with the present moment, accepting the moment as it is.

That's really all you need to do. Then you're in a state of oneness with life, not imposing anything on the present moment, judgments, reactions, and if they are there, accept that they are there. So you can always accept what is, whatever level.

I'll accept what is externally or accept what is internally. And now here's a very wonderful thing about how your state of consciousness affects the world, that there's a correlation between the collective consciousness of humanity and the state of the planet. And there is a correlation between your state of consciousness and whatever happens to you, not always apparent immediately, but there is a correlation between what's within you and what happens to you or what you attract into your life.

And furthermore, it's not so much that what happens to you is your fate or your destiny. Your destiny is determined not by what happens to you, that's what people think, that what happens to me determines my life. Your life is determined, your destiny is determined by how you respond to what happens.

And what happens next is determined by how you react or respond to what happens now. So something seemingly bad happens, something goes wrong. If your reaction is negative, you attract the next negative thing.

If your reaction is a response that says, well, this is how it is, now let's deal with that. The next thing will reflect that state of consciousness. Many people are trapped their whole lives in a stream of same kind of unpleasant things happening continuously to them because they don't realize at any given moment there's a freedom for them to change their lives by reacting differently to what happens.

Your present reaction determines the future, not what happens. Your reaction to what happens determines the next moment. That's how you can change your life rather than being trapped in bad karma for a very long time.

Very easy, but it requires awareness. And here we talk, the Tao Te Ching talks about how the collective consciousness affects the planet. In harmony with the Tao, the sky is clear and spacious.

The earth is solid and full. All creatures flourish together, content with the way they are, endlessly repeating themselves, endlessly renewed. When man interferes with the Tao, the sky becomes filthy, the earth becomes depleted.

The equilibrium crumbles. Creatures become extinct. The master views the parts with compassion because he understands the whole.

His constant practice is humility. He doesn't glitter like a jewel, but lets himself be shaped by the Tao, as rugged and common as a stone. Beautiful images.

When humans collectively live out of touch with the greater consciousness, the Tao, the transcendent, the reality, whatever they manifest externally reflects that state of disconnectedness. And then the planet around them suffers. It's simply a reflection of a state of consciousness.

And so this eternal principle, he already saw 2,500 years ago. And that also implies that the solution to what is happening to the planet cannot be found exclusively on the external level. Yes, of course we need to change things that we do on the external level, but unless the consciousness, the state of consciousness that is our habitual state changes, even if we remove one evil from somewhere out there, it will be replaced by some other thing that has the same harmful influence on nature and the planet.

So the fundamental is the shift in consciousness in humans, in humanity, but not waiting for others to change. Humanity is you. Humanity is I.

You are humanity. The shift in consciousness needs to happen in you, and then the planet will be saved. So that is vital.

Here we have the two beautiful lines. The master, the master always means the enlightened being, the being in touch with the Tao. Here he happens to use the he pronoun, but he changes continuously in this translation.

Chinese doesn't differentiate apparently with the pronoun. Traditionally, it's always he in the old translation of the Tao Te Ching, but in this Stephen Mitchell translation, he shifts continuously from he to she. It happens to be he here, but it doesn't matter.

The master views the parts with compassion because he understands the whole. He understands the whole. He's connected with the whole.

Then you can look upon the parts, the individual human beings and the many different life forms with compassion, because you recognize them as expressions of, manifestations of the one life that you also are. Manifestations or expressions of the one consciousness that is the essence also of who you are. And you see it, you feel, when you don't impose thoughts on, continuously impose thoughts on reality, but allow things to be, allow a flower to be with that spaciousness, spacious perception, a moment, another human being.

That's compassion comes out of that state. It's, and compassion has a deeper level to it. And that is the recognition of oneness.

Out of that comes true compassion. The recognition that in essence, you and I share a common source and consciousness, not just not a source in the distant past, a source we share a common source now. And that's not an intellectual thing.

The realization comes, the less you impose thoughts on other people, judgments, definitions, and on yourself. You start thinking about my life. What about my life?

And then you define your life as either good or bad, fulfilling or unfulfilling, satisfying or unsatisfying. And you have all kinds of opinions, all kinds of opinions about me and my life. And you have a whole structure in your mind develops that you call my life.

And for many people, that's that mental consists of thoughts all clinging together. This is all part of the edifice of my life. And it's here and they're all clinging together.

And people think that's who they are. It's just thoughts about its definitions about them. They're just thoughts.

And when you don't know that, that cuts you off from the power that is there underneath all that, the power of consciousness itself, the Tao, you're cut off and you live as if that thing were real. And you try to somehow make it better on the level of the thought structure of my life, or try to convince yourself that, oh, my life isn't that bad after all. And then you get a little bit of, okay, I'm feeling a little bit better today because I just had the thought that my life isn't so bad after all.

Or you see somebody who is in suffering, say, oh, I'm better off than that person. Then you have a little bit of happiness. My life isn't so bad.

Many people's lives are far worse than my life. Okay, I should feel good. Okay, a little bit of feeling a little bit good for a few moments.

But the structure of my life is not a satisfying one for almost anybody. If you don't go beyond that structure, you might think the people you read about in People Magazine or wherever are better off. They're just as unhappy as everybody else because unless they've gone deeper, some may have.

My life, it's a figment of the imagination. There's no such thing as my life. I don't have a life.

How can I have, what does it mean I have a life? I am life. I am an expression of the one life, the one consciousness, the Tao, expressing itself briefly through this form.

And the very power of all life is here. Why have some mental structure that gives me a sense of identity, that tells me who I am with definitions and judgments and not good enough or better than all kinds. Unnecessary, as sometimes called in the Tao Te Ching, unnecessary baggage.

Walking around with unnecessary baggage. My life is so heavy and it's hard. I have a hard life.

Where's your hard life at this moment? Uh, can't see it. It's only when I start to think about it, this is back, oh yeah.

But where is it ever now? It's an imaginary entity. The me that is up there, it's consisting of all kinds of thoughts and opinions is an imaginary entity, unreal.

And it's wonderful to see that in this moment, you don't have that baggage of my life. You are life right now, I am. I don't need to define myself mentally as either good or bad or better than, or success or failure.

All that cuts you off from the power that's actually there of the Tao. So this is why it says, as we read earlier, empty yourself of everything it said, which means empty yourself of these ideas that otherwise dominate you, the ideas of who you are. Jesus said the same thing.

Almost literally to me, it means exactly the same. Blessed are the poor in spirit. Poor in spirit, that means inside you do not carry baggage.

The baggage of your thoughts of who you are. So the same thing, blessed are the poor in spirit means you are internally unencumbered by heavy thinking and identification and creating an image of who you think you are that becomes my life. And then you even believe that you could lose your life.

I'm going to lose, he lost his life. There must be, he must have been separate from life. Who was he if not life?

Without life, he isn't. He couldn't have been. You cannot be, you are life.

You can't separate yourself from life and say, I have a life. Who are you then? Separate from life?

What is it other than life? Well, I, that's life. But you don't have it, you are it.

Only the mind tells you that you have it. Insane. But normal, normal and insane.

One more, he who stands on tiptoe doesn't stand firm. He who rushes ahead doesn't go far. He who tries to shine dims his own light.

He who defines himself can't know who he really is. He who has power over others can't empower himself. He who clings to his work will create nothing that endures.

If you want to accord with the Tao, just do your job, then let go. He who stands on tiptoe doesn't stand firm. Look at me, me, my life.

Unhappy or look how miserable I am. Look how great I am. He who rushes ahead doesn't go far.

Always looking to the next thing. What do I have to do now? Always grasping for the next, or the next, what's the next thought that I need to worry about?

And the next thing rushes, entire civilization stressed, stressed out. All disconnected from the Tao. They're all rushing ahead.

No time for anything else. No time, no time. He who rushes ahead doesn't go far.

You don't really reach anywhere. He who tries to shine dims his own light. By trying to play roles or identifying with yourself as special, look at me, you cut yourself off from the power of the Tao.

It's by not directing attention to yourself, the power comes through you. Not identifying with anything, anything that you do because you don't do it. If it's a pity in a way that I wish sometimes, it's a little joke.

I wish I had written The Power of Now when I still had a big ego because now the ego would feel so great. Me, me. But then of course, The Power of Now couldn't have come through the ego.

And here, important, he who defines himself can't know who he really is. This is what we were talking about, this constant definitions of who you are in your mind. Why not just be the consciousness, be the presence right now?

That's where the power is. What a wonderful teaching, timeless. It helps, of course, to have a translation that makes it more accessible by somebody who is deeply in tune with that state of consciousness.

Traditionally, the Tao Te Ching has been always translated by academics who had a wonderful knowledge and command of ancient Chinese but absolutely no idea of the spiritual dimension. The alpha and the omega, the beginning and the end, stillness, we started with it, we end with it, moment of stillness. Well, I think it was Oprah who once said, silence doesn't look good on camera.

So we can always edit it out if necessary but Oprah tried it for a minute and that seemed to work. Usually the belief is that you can't have silence on a TV screen, at least not these days. When I was a child, there actually was silence.

Well, there were only two channels and often in between programs, you would just see an image and sometimes some background music, image of a building or city. Or it said, we'll be back soon. And so the TV wouldn't draw you into continuous, what comes next, one exciting image after another, each one lasting just a few seconds as it does these days but you could actually be still and look at the TV screen and so perhaps here's another opportunity for doing that and as you look at the stillness, become still inside, tune into the stillness.

The most precious thing there is, your deepest identity is stillness. If that gets covered up, then you don't really know who you are anymore and then you look for yourself in all kinds of things without ever finding yourself until you regain what had always been there covered up by the noise, the stillness. Stillness is very patient.

Stillness is space, inner space and it's as tolerant as outer space. It allows everything to be and it cannot be touched by anything, cannot be spoiled, only covered up. So every human being, that's the amazing thing, has that dimension within, no matter how insane they seem to be on the surface.

Becoming comfortable with stillness also means becoming comfortable with yourself, the rare state for many human beings and then you're able to be somewhere in your room, at home or outside in nature, wherever, without needing some kind of additional stimulus in your life, either some kind of excitement, nothing wrong with excitement, but you don't need it to give you a sense of aliveness anymore because the aliveness comes from a deeper place than any excitement could ever come from and then you don't need drama to give you a sense that you're still alive. That's another form of excitement and you don't need to desensitize yourself to mental or emotional pain that is there when you're not in touch with that dimension within and it's so close.

It's just, there's a mental noise or the emotional wave movement and underneath it, the sea or the lake is still. The deeper you go, the stiller it is. Now, most people can only go there when they go to sleep, so they go to a wonderful place but don't really know that they're there.

They just derive life energy from it. They wake up again and perhaps if they're lucky, say, I had a good night's sleep. I feel so good.

I don't know if you have ever done this consciously and that is, well, we all have experienced being tired and some people regard that as a negative thing but being tired, if you can bring some consciousness into being tired when you are tired, very tired. I'm not hypnotizing you. I hope nobody's going to sleep.

And your eyes are getting heavier and heavier. When you are very tired, what people call tired, what is that actually? What does it feel like?

What is that? So if you can put some attention into be alert, this is almost a paradox, have some awareness to investigate what does it actually mean and what does it actually feel like to be very tired? It feels like something from somewhere is pulling you and it almost says, come this way.

It's like a magnetic pull. And the pull is very sweet. The pull is to a place of such wonderful sweetness and rest and peace that it becomes irresistible.

And then people say, I can't keep my eyes open anymore. I'm going to, but really what that is is something is pulling you away from this world and it's so precious. And this is why when you finally go into bed and close your eyes and for the brief time span, when you're very tired, that you're still conscious, it's deeply, extremely enjoyable.

We all experience how nice it is when you're very tired and finally you lie down. All your problems are gone, forgotten. You can't, there's no energy left to think about your problems.

And so you're just moving towards that beautiful place and then you disappear in it. And it's, the pull is so powerful that even people who, there have been stories about people who were lost in the wilderness or lost out in the cold and snow and they got more and more tired. And finally, although they knew if I lie down and close my eyes and go to sleep, I'm not going to wake up again, they did it anyway because the pull became so irresistible and the beauty and sweetness of going into sleep, so overpowering that they gave in and there was no fear.

There was no fear of death, they knew they were going to die but in that moment, there was no fear of death anymore. There was just being pulled, giving in to that enormous pull. So that's the strange thing then for humans and other life forms on this planet is that every day or every night, they drop unconscious.

The entire population of the planet, half their lives they spend in gone. It could be a science fiction story, you visit a planet and then suddenly the whole population drops, becomes unconscious and it's normal. And it's called planet Earth.

So there's a, really where you're moving to the source, every human being and every life form that experiences sleep returns to the source, the unmanifested source and then comes back into the manifested, recharged but it's an unconscious return movement. It does not free you from suffering in this world of the outer world of manifestation when you come back to it. The spiritual path is about finding that realm without losing yourself in it, realizing your essential identity with it and remain conscious.

And that happens, for example, if you stop thinking without falling asleep. At first, you may not notice the same overpowering sweetness of being that you have that pulls you towards sleep. It's very subtle.

At first, there seems to be a kind of blank, empty space but there's enormous power there to the mind that looks like nothing and that's why it's sometimes described as nothing or no thing or emptiness because the mind is used to noise. It's not really capable of grasping that. It cannot be grasped.

I sometimes compare it to stepping after you're spending several hours in a noisy discotheque which is a metaphor here for normal existence. You step out, close the door behind you and you find yourself, it's the middle of the night and you're out in nature somewhere. There are very subtle sounds and there's an all-pervasive silence, an alive silence around you but because you're deafened by the noise, you cannot yet, it's too subtle for you to then perceive that.

So at first, you go into place, it seems, oh, there's nothing here. So it's gradually you become attuned to the inner stillness and realize its depth and its sweetness and its aliveness. I brought with me today a book.

We're just going to look at a few lines from that ancient book. This is our second session. We had at some previous point, we already had a session on the ancient Chinese book of wisdom, the Tao Te Ching and this is our second session on the Tao Te Ching and something important to remember is we are not really studying a book.

We are using the words of that book to look at our essential reality. We are not studying something outside ourselves and that applies whenever you read any book that is spiritually, vitally alive. You're not studying, it's not an academic subject.

You're not studying a book. You're not absorbing information outside of yourself. You are, if it's a spiritual, true spiritual book, the book is about you.

Every true spiritual book is about the most essential dimension of who you are. Rediscovering it, finding it, living from that dimension, that's what any spiritual book is about and so somebody even called the Tao Te Ching that was written 2,500 years ago, the world's first self-help book. Sometimes these days, people speak dismissively about self-help books and perhaps the reason is because there are so many and there's such varying quality and depth and inevitably, there are always more self-help books or books of any kind that are not so powerful and not so deep and relatively few that actually are vitally alive because they were written from that place within the author, which ultimately means they were written by consciousness itself. So there are always more false diamonds than real diamonds, of course.

Some and some books are mixed back, that you have some beautiful insides and a lot of fluff in between. That's fine too. It's sometimes worth reading a book just for the two pages.

If you could summarize all the insights in some books, you could get it down to two pages and that could change somebody's life and that's fine. If they had to read another 150 pages in the process, fine, at least they got that. But then you have some books that are almost undiluted wisdom.

What elsewhere is dispersed throughout a book. Sometimes you get it in literature. You get deep insights occasionally.

Every 30 pages, you get one sentence that stands out as wow. And so there are some books, however, that are the cream instead of skimmed milk. And those are the books that are eternal, well, not eternal, but relatively speaking, they survive for a very long time and they are beyond the particular culture out of which they came.

Otherwise, how could a book written 2,500 years ago in China speak to us now? It's like something coming from a different planet, from a different galaxy. But since it touches the deepest dimension of human existence, its essence is timeless.

And that's why it's still alive and that's why it's still read these days and valued, appreciated, and is helpful for many, many people. An amazing thing for a book to survive that long. One miracle is that even its physical form survived for that long.

And then to survive, to be still not just of interest to some historians, but of vital significance to a human being, amazing. Miraculous thing, 2,500 years ago. And of course, the same thing applies to the teaching of the Buddha, for example, which is still as vitally true and alive as it was about the same time, 2,500, 2,600 years ago.

The author of the Tao Te Ching is Lao Tse, who lived about the same time, give or take 100 years, which isn't much, as the Buddha in India. Lao Tse lived in China. The Buddha lived in India, as I pointed out already at some stage.

So at that time, just a brief recapitulation, there was an enormous wave movement of spiritual awakening, not as all-pervasive and powerful as it is now, but for that time, it was an incredible thing. When at the same time period, teachers arose in different parts of the planet and teachings, and many people, relatively few, but still, people responded to that. There was the Buddha in India.

There was Mahavira in India. There was Zoroaster in Persia. There were the ancient Greek pre-Socratic philosophers, very deep insights in ancient Greece, all at the same time.

All happened virtually simultaneously. And so this book, then, Tao Te Ching survived, and miraculously, of course, it has to get translated. How do you get that across from ancient Chinese symbols?

How do you, and there are about 100, translations into English available now. And sometimes you compare translations, and you see, are they translating the same book? Is that the same text?

So for the translator itself, now this is another important point. It's not only that the book, to be spiritually, vitally alive, needs to come from the deepest place. When a book like that gets translated, even the translator needs to be attuned to the essential message of the book.

And so many translations have been done of the Tao Te Ching, and all the translations that were done initially were done by academics at universities. They had great knowledge of Chinese language, but no attunement at all to the essential teaching. And so you got many mistranslations of that, and only recently, relatively recently, people came in who translated, who had both knowledge of Chinese, and most importantly, inner attunement to the essential message of that.

Tao Te Ching, a strange title, not to be confused, by the way, with the I Ching, which is another book, also Chinese, also interesting, but this is the Tao Te Ching. Tao has never been really successfully translated. It doesn't lend itself to that.

You need to keep that in Chinese, but even if you're Chinese, you won't be any wiser as to the meaning of Tao. So even Chinese people don't have that advantage. When you talk of Tao, their mouth opens, and you ask them, what does that really mean?

They go, oh, when I first heard of the Tao Te Ching and read it, that was a few years after a shift in consciousness. Immediately, I said, wow, yes, wow, wow. And then I asked my next-door neighbor at college, graduate school.

He was Chinese, student of mathematics. I wanted to talk to him about the Tao Te Ching, and he said, what? Never heard of it.

Just very briefly, the Tao has also different shades of meaning, dimensions of meaning. On the one hand, the Tao is the is-ness of all things. Tao is the suchness, the is-ness of this moment as it is.

That's the Tao in its manifested aspect. The Tao is also the source, the unmanifested source out of which the is-ness of all things emerges. So it's manifold meaning.

The Te, again, traditionally, that word Te is traditionally translated as virtue, which is not really a good thing anymore since virtue is a relatively dead word. When was the last time you said virtue? Really, the Te refers to the flow.

Anybody who is in tune with the Tao is an expression of Te, which is right action, right living. Ethics comes into it, but in the sense of virtue, but it's not something that needs to be learned externally, something that naturally comes from the source of life. When you're in tune with the Tao, the source of life, then all your actions and your speech are virtuous, which really means charged with the power of the Tao.

So Te really is power, the power of the Tao, the intelligence, the intelligent power of the Tao. When you're in tune with that, you don't need to think about ethics anymore because then that flows naturally from the core of your being. In that sense, you can say virtue, but the closer translation actually would be power.

And if the book didn't already exist, a good translation for Tao Te Ching, I think, would be the power of now. Because Tao is inseparable from the present moment. There is, Tao only is timeless presence.

There is no past or future in Tao. Let's look at a few lines. The translation, I have two translations here.

One that I like very much, or version, Stephen Mitchell's version, and another version is by Jane English and Jia Fu Feng. They translated it together. But you may have others that are your favorites.

You have to look around, whatever you respond to. Now, Stephen Mitchell, fortunately, does not exclusively use the masculine pronoun as it's done in most other translations. He, the master, he varies between she and he.

So sometimes the master is seen as feminine and sometimes the master is seen as masculine, which is a wonderful thing, since the Tao has many qualities that are closely related to the feminine, the openness and so on. There are many images in the Tao Te Ching that are feminine images to point to the essential nature of the Tao. Not that the Tao itself is feminine, but to get a feeling for what Tao is, the Tao Te Ching uses feminine imagery.

So here we have a little few lines about the master. The master keeps her mind always at one with the Tao. That is what gives her her radiance.

The Tao is ungraspable. How can her mind be at one with it? Because she doesn't cling to ideas.

The Tao is dark and unfathomable. How can it make her radiant? Because she lets it.

Since before time and space where the Tao is. It is beyond is and is not. How do I know this is true?

I look inside myself and see. Let's look at it again and see. The master keeps her mind always at one with the Tao.

That is what gives her her radiance. Keeps her mind at one with the Tao. In the next line it says, if it's ungraspable, how can her mind be at one with it?

And it says because she doesn't cling to ideas. Interesting. She doesn't cling to ideas.

That reminds me of the famous Zen saying. I don't remember who said it, but Zen master said it. Don't seek for the truth.

Just cease or stop cherishing opinions. That is, I believe, points to the same inner state of disidentification from thinking. Thinking.

She doesn't cling to ideas. Cling to, it doesn't mean she doesn't have ideas, the master, but the master does not cling to ideas. And the Zen master, when he said, don't look for the truth, just stop cherishing opinions.

Opinions. He didn't say, stop having opinions. Just as Lao Tzu does not say, don't have ideas.

Says, don't cling to ideas. And the other master says, stop cherishing opinions. So this clinging, which is the same as cherishing, is self-identification with thoughts that arise.

In other words, you then believe completely in every thought that comes into your head.

Amazing. You believe in it, that means you are it.

And that is self-identification with thinking. So how then to be at one, always at one with the Tao? So simple.

On the one hand, you could call it, stop cherishing opinions. Now, any thought that arises ultimately is an opinion, you could say. Stop cherishing, stop your self-identification with that.

Or don't cling to ideas, in the words of Lao Tzu, or this present translation here, so that there's always a space between you and your thoughts. Or rather, you are not the thought, you are the space for the thought. This is how I put it sometimes.

You're familiar with that. And perhaps in yourself, you know it. You don't have to be in your thoughts, but you can be the space for your thoughts.

Then no matter how weird your thoughts are, it doesn't matter that much. You don't say, oh my God, I shouldn't be having these weird thoughts. No, because that's another thought.

I'm supposed to be spiritually advanced, and why am I still having these thoughts? There must be something wrong with me. Does that sound familiar?

That's also thoughts. That's more thoughts that say, I shouldn't be having these thoughts, there's something wrong with me. And then you believe in those thoughts.

Thoughts that judge other thoughts. That may sound familiar to some of you, and there's nothing personal in it, it's the human mind. So you don't need to eliminate thoughts or to say, I should only have pure thoughts because I'm a spiritual person.

Because by now, I should have transcended all impure thoughts. Well, then you're in a dilemma because in this world of polarities, if you only want to have pure thoughts, you're creating the other polarity in the unseen. And sooner or later, the other polarity will come up from behind, creep up.

And this has been done sometimes by Christians who try to practice the teachings of Christ without entering the state of consciousness out of which that comes. So they try to be pure and spiritual and good Christians and denied the other polarity, repressed it. And then suddenly they get overpowered by something deeply destructive and negative.

So you have these occasion, you have a nice, wonderful person who always talks in spiritual, just so gentle spiritual. And before you know it, he's screaming at his wife or even hitting his wife. Whoa, where did that come from?

And he can't even admit to himself that this is what's happening. So if you push away certain thoughts because they do not fit into the mental image of who you are as this or that, then they assume a life of their own. And before you know it, they invade your mind again, if only in your dreams.

And suddenly you have dreadful nightmares. During a day, you're such a spiritual person. And at night, you suddenly have dreadful nightmares.

Monsters come or you become a monster. Oh my God, this shouldn't be happening. And that's because you're pushing something away.

The true spiritual does not lie in one thought or another thought. It lies in being there as the space for your thoughts. Then it doesn't matter anymore, really.

Whatever thought arises is no more than that. It's a form that arises at this moment. You don't resist it.

You don't need to resist it. But you are the space for it. You don't become it.

Somebody sent me a sticker to put on the car. I haven't put it on my car yet. A very wise sticker.

I don't know where it originated. It says, you don't need to believe every thought you think. So this is the practice then of being the space or the witness for your thoughts rather than being the thought.

And you can practice with your opinions. Many thoughts are actual, most thoughts can, all thoughts could be called opinions, but there are certain things that are definitely, clearly recognizable as opinions when you are talking to people every day, when you're having a discussion or talk with friends or colleagues or neighbors. So they will express their opinion, whatever it may be about, and you may express your opinion.

And you can then observe whether or not there is self-identification with your opinion. And your opinion, of course, is a mental position, the position of the mind. Are you identified with a mental position?

If you are, then you are cherishing opinions in the words of the Zen master, or you are clinging to ideas in the words of Lao Tse. And how do you know that? You know that when, as you discuss things, you become either defensive or aggressive in the expression of your opinion.

Emotion flows into, and you get worked up in, huh, why is that happening? Why are you becoming defensive or aggressive? And of course, you have to look inside yourself to see whether this is the case or not.

Are you becoming defensive or aggressive? You feel the influx of emotion. And why is this happening?

Because unconsciously, you feel threatened by somebody who attacks or questions or contradicts your mental position. Why do you feel threatened by somebody who questions your mental position? That is a sign that you had identified with a mental position.

And identified means your sense of self was in it. So the person is not attacking your opinion in your unconscious viewpoint. The person you're being attacked in your very, a life is being, is under attack because you identified this.

This is not true, but this is how it is perceived, as if they were attacking your very existence because you identified with a mental position. There was a self in it. So anybody who questions it questions your very existence.

It's unconscious process. So that's an amazing thing to realize in yourself. And it's a deep seated unconscious pattern in most human beings.

And of course, as you become conscious of that, you can usually see it much more clearly in others, more easily in your friend or whoever you're having, then in yourself. Usually says, oh, yes, that's what he always does. Of course, now I understand what my husband or my wife does.

I understand completely. That's step one. And that's why I was so happy when I heard Obama say, you don't have to be disagreeable when you disagree with someone.

What that really implies is, because if you do become disagreeable and you disagree with someone, you're identified with a mental position. So you can express, you don't have to relinquish all opinions or mental positions, no. But is that who you are?

Or is that something in you as a mind movement? Enormous difference. And if you can have a discussion between people who are not identified with their respective viewpoints, it's a wonderful thing.

It's quite beautiful. An exchange of ideas. But nobody is identified with their ideas.

And that's a conscious discussion, a conscious group of people. We call them then conscious, as opposed to unconscious people who are identified, because that's the difference in spiritual terms between conscious and unconscious. Conscious means non-identification with form.

That's what conscious is. And primarily, forms appear as thought forms. Those are the primary forms.

That's where you experience life, the life of form in yourself as arising thoughts. So occasionally one is able to witness that and it's always beautiful. Then a discussion is actually a beautiful thing.

Whereas normally in the old unconscious state, but as soon as people start discussing something, I feel the strong impulse to leave the room in the unconscious state. Or you can also try to be there as the one conscious presence while the others identified. Or it may be possible to pull the entire group into consciousness.

It may be, but depends how overwhelming the force of the unconsciousness is in the room and in the people. So either you stay there as the conscious presence in the room, and then you might say something from not against anything or anybody, just put forward your opinion. That might change the vibrational frequency in the room or you may have to remove yourself because ultimately it's insane and nothing good comes of it if each person is identified with their mental position.

Nothing will come of it. Perhaps some kind of compromise, if you're lucky, some kind of compromise that everybody dislikes. So to be at one with the Tao, with the source of life, so that the primordial intelligence can operate through you, you don't have to look for it.

Where's the, how can I connect with the primordial intelligence? He, Eckhart was talking about primordial intelligence. Well, it's already there.

Rather than looking for it as something, just stop doing certain things that block it. And then naturally it's there. So you can also, you don't have to find your true self.

That would be quite hard. Yeah, I'm looking for myself. Because how could you not be your, if it's your true self, how could you not already be it?

So it's just stop obscuring your true self if you want to use that expression. So the vital, a very vital practice then for everyone is stop identifying with thoughts. And that requires an alertness as you go about your life, especially when engaged with, in conversation with other people, but also in the continuous self-talk that goes on and on in most people's minds.

There also it is vital that you are not totally identified with the arising self-talk. And it's a very strange thing, that self-talk, that you have to look at your own self. Do you have one voice that says I in your head?

I, I'm this, I'm that. Or do you have a voice that addresses you as you? It varies from person to person.

What kind of self-talk do you have? Is there some self-talk that is predominantly negative? Is there self-talk that is very critical of yourself a lot of the time?

Is there self-talk that is very critical of others a lot of the time? Is there self-talk that is critical of situations? Is there self-talk that's critical of places where you are?

Or self-talk is critical about what you are doing, but really don't want to be doing. You just have to do it now. But really, as the sticker on the car says, I'd rather be fishing, or I'd rather be surfing, not driving.

Look at the kind of self-habitual self-talk, or do you have two voices that argue with each other? Why can't you ever do the right thing? Well, I'm doing my best, but...

All that is an amazing thing, that the voice in the head. I say the voice in the head, and of course, for many people, it's the voices in the head. What I just mentioned, I believe there was a psychologist who identified those two voices as the top dog and the underdog.

The top dog says, you're no good, why can't you do that? And the underdog says, oh, well, I'm trying so hard. And of course, which is the true one?

Are you truly the top dog, or you're neither? So you are the space for those thoughts. So all these things are really the vital spiritual practice is for you to become the awareness underneath your thoughts, the awareness around your thoughts so that you're no longer totally controlled by, and your life is not controlled by, the thoughts that arise that say this or that.

And then you don't feel good, this is a little superficial, and say, okay, I must think positive thoughts, otherwise I won't feel good. I'm really better off than most people on the planet. I have to remind myself that I'm actually, that most people are worse off than me.

Just think about that to make myself feel a little better. Okay, I have to think about all the poor people who are in this place, and then I can feel better about myself. The true sense of aliveness doesn't come through the medium of thought, it comes from a more vital place within.

It comes from the awareness itself or the consciousness itself. So the shift then is you step back from your thoughts and look at them and say, oh, the thought. Occasionally, sometimes Buddhists, they practice mindfulness, which is closely related to this, which is becoming aware of whatever your mind does.

I don't think the word mindfulness is such a wonderful translation because it sounds as if your mind were full. But we know what they mean. So it's awareness practice so that you are not your thoughts.

And then naturally you feel a deeper sense of aliveness and connectedness. And spaces, when you're not identified anymore with every thought, then you have spaces in between the thoughts where there's no thought but simply a conscious presence. And that is the Tao, and that is who you are.

And that has no form. And you couldn't say anything much about it, not really. It is ungraspable.

The Tao is ungraspable. And this is a pitfall of many spiritual seekers. They're looking for something to grasp, some kind of experience or some kind of realization, thunder and lightning experience, looking for something as if, or looking for God, as if God could be found as an object in consciousness.

And that's why the Zen master said, don't look for the truth. We could all say, don't look for God, don't look for yourself, just step out of the mind. Be the space.

The Tao is dark and unfathomable. How can it make her radiant? Because she lets it.

She doesn't need to understand it. It cannot be understood. In fact, in that becoming conscious, understanding plays a very insignificant role, if at all.

Perhaps understanding, the main part of understanding is understanding the obstacles to it, but not it. So again, many spiritual seekers think they need to arrive at some greater or deeper understanding of reality or of God or whatever, or of who they are. No, it's not.

The realization does not arise from increased understanding. And that's almost insulting to the human mind which says, well, why then have I been studying all these books for 25 years? Well, at least you're here now and realize that that's not the way.

So she lets it. The Tao is dark and unfathomable. This implies you cannot understand it because the moment you understand it, it's no longer unfathomable.

You say, oh, now I've got it. You can never say, now I've got it. If you say, now I've got it, you haven't got it.

How can it make her radiant? Radiant means when you are connected with that, the power flows through you. The radiance comes through.

And so she lets it. She doesn't understand it, but she is attuned with it. So in the Course in Miracles too, it says, you still think that your understanding is a great contribution to the truth, but that is actually not the case.

I don't know what the second part of that statement is, but basically it's your understanding is not an important contribution to the truth. Now, what is the case, however, is that when you are in tune with the Tao, if there is anything here in this world that you need to understand, you will understand it. You don't understand the essence.

You cannot understand that. You can't understand God. You can't understand consciousness.

You can only be consciousness. You can be conscious, in conscious connection with the consciousness, but you can't understand it. This is why I cannot answer questions when people ask me, can you please define what consciousness is?

No, I can't, nor can you. But you are it. You can be it.

You can realize that you are it. Then out of that realization, minor understandings arise as whatever in any situation that you find yourself in, the intelligence operates through you and suddenly you know what is right for this situation. In that sense, understanding comes out of it, but the understanding comes out of the prior position of non-understanding.

The most basic not knowing is vital because it is a state of not thinking. It doesn't come out of your own thinking. You embrace the spaciousness of not thinking.

And then understanding in a limited sense comes out of that, but not understanding of the deepest, that deepest unmanifested, uncreated dimension. Since before time and space were, the Tao is, is and Tao is one. It's just is in it, no past, no was, no will be.

It is beyond is and is not. What does that mean? It is beyond is and is not.

Beyond existence, what exists or does not exist. There's existence, which is the all forms of life exist. The vaster dimension, what I call being or what is the Tao is the unmanifested out of which all existence comes.

Existence comes from Latin. It means to stand out. X means out.

So, and existence means a form, but underneath and within each form, there is the formless essence of all life, the Tao. Underneath it, so to speak, all language is very limited because language comes from this world of up, down, left, right, and so on. Underneath it, there is the unmanifested, the being, and then there's the existence.

All existence comes out of being and is essentially being, expressing itself in form. So you yourself have the two aspects. You exist as a physical and psychological form temporarily, and in your innermost, there is the timeless dimension of being that frees you from being totally caught up in the temporal existence, which is a dreadful thing.

How do I know this is true? I look inside myself and see. The ultimate truth of the universe is within you.

You find the ultimate within you. Wherever you go, it will still apply. I'll read the first line of another verse, just the first line for the moment.

Verse 20, I mean a poem. I don't know if you call them poems. Chapter 20, stop thinking and end your problems.

Stop thinking and end your problems. All problems are generated by thinking. How do I know this is true?

The famous test that I've many times mentioned to people, and I recommend that you, if you still need it, that you write it on a little card and put it on your bathroom mirror or wherever else you tend to look quite often. And I'm not talking about affirmations such as I love myself. Well, that's fine too.

It's better than hating yourself, but it's still within the polarities. No, what I mean is to write something a little like, what's the problem now? What's the problem now?

If you think you have lots of problems in order to touch reality, because problems are generated by continuous thinking. It's not to do with right now, no. The problems exist in the mind in the future or the imaginary situation that's going to arise perhaps in the future.

Maybe it will arise, maybe it won't. But usually the imagined situations are far worse than the actual situations when they happen. So what's the problem now?

What happens when you look at that phrase? What's the problem now? Your attention then goes from being absorbed in, okay, oh my God, what's going to happen, to now, okay, is that a problem now?

And then you have to wake up into now to answer the question on this little card. What's the problem now? You have to actually wake up into the now because you never know there might be a problem now.

You have to focus attention and look. And so suddenly your attention moves into the present moment. And there you stand in front of your bathroom mirror and look, okay, what's the problem now?

I don't know. You look, well, then the mind says, oh, you're looking old. It looks in the mirror.

That's the problem. No, of course it's not a problem. It's a thought that arises.

And usually the mind has, of course, more complicated things to say, but then you realize that at this moment, it's not actually a problem. But the mind says, yes, but it will become a problem in the next moment. But of course, when the next moment comes, it comes again as this moment, and then you have to ask a question again.

What is the problem now? And the amazing realization will come to you that there never is a problem now. Only a situation.

You can deal with it or leave it alone for the time being. It's never a problem. Some situations demand immediate action.

And then, of course, it's not a problem. There's no time for it to become a problem. If it demands immediate action, you look and you act.

Other things you may have to think about, you might occasionally have to think, okay, what are the possible solutions to this situation? And what you do then is to apply focused thinking, but before you do that, you become still, present. And then you, out of that, then it comes, okay, what are the possibilities in this situation?

I could pick up the phone and make a phone call to that person. I can look, go to that place and ask for help. I can go there too, and I can do that.

One, two, three, four, five, write it down, put it aside, okay. And then, which one of these can I do now? And then you do it.

It's never, it's not a problem. If I juggle ideas, thoughts in my mind uselessly, that's a problem. What if, what if?

Attention back to now. What's the problem now? And so it's always amazing to realize that the now is free of problems because you're breathing, you're perceiving your senses, you feel the aliveness in the body.

More than enough to deal with any situation that may arise or may be there. Of course, that's why people love dangerous activities. Some people get addicted to danger because it stops their mind and they have no problems while they're climbing up the mountain.

They're totally present. So for a little while, they can't, you can't carry your problems up the mountain wall if you're climbing up a sheer wall of a mountain. If you carry your problems with you, you're going to fall off.

So you have to leave your problems and be totally present. And so that's why it is so, you feel so much more alive there because the mind, the parasite that otherwise sucks up your energy is not active at that time. Or you go surfing, you can't think about, I wonder how high this, you just, you look and you do, or you look and you don't do, or you fall in, it's all fine, there's no thinking.

You can't think, you're not going to go be very good at it if you're thinking. Stop thinking and end your problems. What difference between yes and no?

What difference between success and failure? Must you value what others value? Avoid what others avoid?

How ridiculous. What difference, it says, between success and failure? What is meant by that is that success and failure are mental labels that you attach.

And so the master, she does not live, or he does not live according to these mental labels where you go, wow, I am so good at this. I am so successful, and then attach yourself to that idea because it may turn into the opposite. Or you don't describe yourself as a failure or a success because both are ways of identifying with a form in your mind.

I am a great success. I am the best-selling author. Okay, what if three years from now, nobody buys the book anymore?

What happens to my sense of identity then? Well, I can still then cling to and then just say, I once was a best-selling author. So deriving your identity from a conceptual sense of self, and very often success or failure is part of one's conceptual sense of self, and it gives you your sense of who you are.

It's a very limited sense of who you are. Now, if you, a conceptual identity, either as a successful person, and of course there's always a fear that it may not last, and of course it probably won't because nothing lasts forever. So successful person, precarious conceptual sense of self, and continuously you'll find the more successful you are, the more things come in that the conceptual image is being attacked.

They're beginning to write about you in People magazine, or they're beginning to, People is still quite benign, but there are other magazines that will tear you to pieces. And so you have to, your conceptual sense is very shaky concept if your identity is derived from myself as the one who is successful. When many people want that, there's nothing wrong with achieving.

The question is whether you need that to give you an enhanced identity, or whether you simply enjoy the play of form in this world, and you contribute, but there's no self-identification in a conceptual way, and that is great freedom. Identity, then failure, another very strong sense of identity for people, another conceptual identity of thinking of yourself as somebody who has failed at something. My life has been a failure.

It's too late now. I've made so many mistakes. I've married the wrong person.

I chose the wrong career. I tried, but it didn't work out. The world didn't recognize my talents.
